POTATO SCAB.—My seed potatoes were treated with formaldehyde before planting but I find that my early potatoes are scabby. I am sure I used the right strength solution, one pint to 30 gallons of water. Why didn't it prevent scab? J. M. C., New York.

A.—Sometimes in an old garden patch which has been in potatoes for several years, and which has been heavily manured each year, potato scab will develop in spite of seed treatment. This is because the organism which causes scab lives in the soil from year to year. Soil rich in lime is much more likely to carry infection than sandy soil. Any soil which is alkaline in reaction may carry the disease, but sandy soils which are slightly acid are not commonly known to show the disease unless it is introduced with the seed. Treatment of infected soils is a difficult matter. Full particulars may be found in special bulletin 85, published by the Michigan Agricultural College.

The First Step Toward Winter Eggs

AS I told you last month, culling is the important work just at this season, for, with the present price of feed, no one can afford to keep "dead-heads."

The indications that a bird is physically qualified to produce eggs are: A clear, full bright eye, the eyelids wide open and not sluggish; a good pair of shanks, with straight, well-worn toe-nails, showing constant use in scratching. Only a healthy fowl is a laying fowl, and such a bird must of necessity have a good appetite. A hen that is laying has an enlarged abdomen, due to the enlarged intestines, ovary and oviduct, and the body is deeper at the rear than at the front of the keel. These points are not so well marked when the hen ceases laying.

In the non-laying hen there is likely to be an unusual accumulation of fat in the abdomen and under the skin of the body, so that a plump appearance presents itself; the fat under the skin of the shanks, especially in the back, causes that part of the leg to have a round appearance. When a hen is in her laying period, the surplus fat to a certain extent is used, and the shanks lose their round, plump appearance, and the same is true of other parts of the body, especially in the region of the pelvis and vent. The face appearing more plump and fat, thins out, and the skin of the face, comb, earlobes, wattles, and also over the body, becomes more soft and pliable as the hen passes for a non-laying period to a laying period. These changes in the comb, earlobes and wattles are sex characteristics, and become changed, as just stated, as the ovary and oviduct become enlarged and active. When the hen passes from a laying to a non-laying state, the ovary and oviduct shrink, and the comb, wattles and earlobes lose their soft, pliable and red appearance, becoming more dull in color, and the comb looks as if it had been powdered.

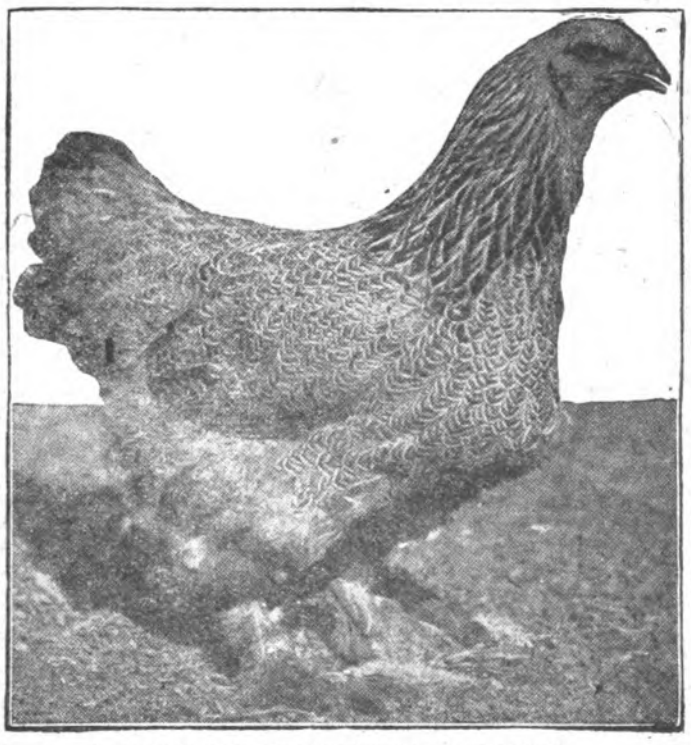
The pelvic bones are wide apart in the heavy producer, but contract again when she ceases to lay. The fullness of abdomen and the width of the pelvic arch will depend on how heavily the hen will lay during the next two or three weeks. At the same time the pelvic arch enlarges, the abdomen also enlarges, and the vent grows larger and flabbier. A heavy-laying hen has a soft skin all over the body. The non-laying hen has a hard, plump body, with bones not too evident. A pinched body indicates a small capacity and a poor producer. The meat type of bird has a tendency to turn her feed into fat, which is indicated by the thick pelvic arch and a hard abdomen. In the laying hen the ischial bones of the pelvic arch are thin. In the heavy-laying hen there is noted bleached shanks, earlobes, beak, eyelids and vent.

The yellow color is due to xanthopyll, which occurs principally in the green feed; thus the more green feed the bird consumes, the slower will be the bleaching of the parts when the laying period begins. In the heavy-laying hen the capacity will be indicated by the distance from the posterior point of the breastbone to the pelvic arch, which should be three or four fingers' breadth, and the pubic bones in the region of the vent should be two or three fingers in breadth. In the non-layer these pubic bones may be scarcely one finger's breadth apart.

And when on the job of culling, don't forget that there are many advantages in the capon over the ordinary roasting fowl. He is much larger, attains weight more cheaply, is always in demand because of a large carcass, and sells at from ten to twelve cents a pound higher than the rooster because of the quality of the meat.

After cockerels have reached the age of four and a half or five months they become quarrelsome, and are hard to keep in flocks of more than four or five, whereas capons can be kept in large flocks, and are as docile as a flock of pullets. Being inactive, they put on weight rapidly, and, although their bodies reach an enormous size, they never become tough.

It is not advisable to caponize the lighter breeds, such as the Leghorns, etc., as the large carcass can never be obtained from such fowls. The American type, such as the Plymouth Rock, Rhode Island Red and Wyandotte, and the Asiatic type, such as the Brahma and Langshan, are breeds which may be caponized profitably.



Caponizing is not at all a difficult operation; almost anyone of ordinary ability can perform it. Any small, strong table which can be easily moved to a window will do to operate on. The bird should be confined to a clean coop for twenty-four hours without food or drink, to insure the intestines being empty. Prepare two pieces of strong twine, with a slip-noose at one end and a weight at the other. Half a brick or stone will do. We had two old pound weights with slots in them, that fitted over a scale bar, and as they were easily attached to a string, we always used them. The string should be long enough, after the noose is made and the weight attached, to reach from the center of the table to within a foot of the ground. When you are ready to perform the operation, slip the noose of one cord around the bird's shanks just above the foot, then draw the wings up over the back until they touch, and slip the noose of the second string over the wings, below the second joint. Lay the bird upon its left side on the table, allowing the ends of the strings to which the weights are attached to hang down on each side of the table. This keeps the bird's feet and wings perfectly still and out of the way. Now dampen the feathers on the bird's side with cold water, to keep them flat, and also to check bleeding. Then with the left hand press down the skin toward the leg, and hold it in position whilst with a sharp knife you make a cut about an inch long between the first and second ribs, above the hips, following the shape of the ribs. The bird will start as the cut is made, but will lie quite still the next moment. Of course the point of the knife must be used, and the skin only cut. Place the wire stretcher which comes with the tools in the cut to hold it open. You will then be able to see the white, fiber-like skin which encloses the bowels. This must be attacked with the sharp hook belonging with the kit, and carefully picked open. Naturally every precaution must be taken not to pierce the intestines, but as they will be empty after the bird's long fast, there is not much danger if care is used. As the breaking of this skin causes the bird no pain, there is no necessity to hurry or get flustered, but it is well to work as quickly as you can. After the inner casing is open, one of the testicles will be in sight—a creamy white kidney-shaped membrane lying near the backbone.

Before commencing the operation at all, you must thread the canula with a fine steel wire (both of which belong to the kit), letting the wire form a loop at the curved end, and ends well out at the other end.

Sometimes both testicles are in sight, but not often, as the other usually lies beyond and more to the other side.

Now comes the only dangerous part of the whole operation—getting hold of and removing the testicles. But with a steady hand and a plenty of light not one bird in a hundred should be lost. Attached to the testicle and lying back of it is one of the principal arteries of the fowl, and this, if ruptured, is sure to cause death. It is here that the proper tools prove of the greatest advantage. The wire, being small and very fine, is easily slipped between the testicles and the artery without injury to either, and a clear, clean cut made. Take the canula in the right hand, and adjust the wire in it so that the loop, about one-half an inch long, will extend from the small end of the tube, leaving the two ends of wire extending far enough out of the open end to secure a good hold. Insert the end of the tube that has the loop on it very carefully, and slip the loop over both ends of the testicle and entirely around it; hold end of tube close down to the testicles. When it is entirely encircled by the loop, take both ends of the wire which comes out of the other end of the tube with thumb and first finger, holding it tight, and draw it up firmly but carefully until it is severed; then remove the wire spreader and allow the hole to close in the other skin which you pressed down with your hand at the beginning of the operation, and as the skin resumes its natural place the outer cut will be upwards of an inch above the inner cut; in this way the outer skin makes a covering for the inner cut, and keeps out all dirt and insures its healing quickly.

To complete the operation, turn the bird on its other side and proceed exactly as before. Some experts can work entirely from one side, but it is risky, and difficult for an amateur to try. After the operation, keep the bird in a small coop and feed lightly for a few days, and there will be no ill effects.

J. Y.—Egg eating is a bad habit, usually starting from the egg being broken accidentally and the birds finding out what good food it contains. Once started, the whole flock soon acquires the taste, and lays in wait for every egg that is laid. The best remedy is to place the nests about two feet above the ground, with the opening facing the wall, and not more than two feet from it. Buy some china eggs, put one in each nest, and throw two or three in the middle of the floor. The birds will spend much time picking at them, and, as they will get no satisfaction, soon tire of the habit, especially if the eggs are gathered several times a day for a few weeks.

L. C.—The pullets are suffering from rheumatism. Possibly the chicken house is poorly ventilated and damp. Even if the ground is dry, the walls and atmosphere may be damp, if the ventilation is not good, especially if the house is small, and the birds are overcrowded on the perches at night. Feed plenty of green vegetables; if you give them the table scraps, be careful that there is a very small percentage of fat in them. As soon as a bird shows any sign of lameness, remove it from the flock and put it in a small coop in a sheltered place. Cover the floor of the coop with a deep layer of cut hay or straw. Rub the bird's feet and shanks with a mixture of sweet lard, or vaseline and turpentine. For internal use add fifteen grains of iodide of potassium to every quart of drinking water. Put a small dish in each coop being used for sick birds, and as a matter of precaution, remove the regular drinking dish from the chicken house, and substitute a small one containing the same mixture for a fortnight at least.

J. T.—I am inclined to think that you have got some hens in your flock which are slightly infected by one of the spores or mold diseases, for the microbes which cause the disease of the liver which most frequently attacks turkeys, and is commonly known as blackhead, are parasite microbes. Until the last few years it was supposed that this disease was confined entirely to turkeys, but now we all know that all fowls are subject to attack though they rarely show any outward symptoms, and the disease never gains very much headway with them, though the germs are spread broadcast through the agency of the droppings, and when picked up by young turkeys or chickens, enter the digestive organ with their food and drink, and an inflamed condition of the intestines causes rapid death in the young stock. The condition of the liver in any of these three diseases is caused by the blood carrying germs into the liver, when numerous centers of the disease begin to appear, and show yellowish spots, which, when cut across, will be found to be irregularly globular in shape. It is not positively known whether the germs of these diseases are present in the eggs laid by affected hens or turkeys, but there is no doubt that they are present on the shell, which collects the germs as the egg passes through the egg passage from the bird. It is for this reason that all eggs should be wiped with alcohol before being put under hens and in incubators. The germs of the above diseases are apt to linger in incubators and brooders, and frequently originate in old hay, moldy ground, or other waste matter. So, as a matter of prevention, incubators should be disinfected after each hatch, and brooders before each new lot of chicks is put into them, and nesting material for setting hens should be clean, sweet hay. As you have a good flock of hens, it seems a pity to part with them, and really not necessary, if you will work along the lines of prevention the coming fall and winter. Thoroughly clean and disinfect all houses at frequent intervals. Have the yards or ground where the hens are in the habit of congregating covered with fresh lime, which should be turned under after twenty-four hours. If it is possible to seed the ground, so much the better—it will sweeten it. As soon as you stop using eggs for hatching, add a thimbleful of permanganate of potassium to every four quarts of drinking water, until November. This will kill the germs which the hens may be carrying. For young chicks attacked there is no cure, though giving them sour milk to drink from the time they are hatched is supposed to act as a preservative.

H. D. McC.—Chicks dying in the shell is one of the most discouraging troubles the amateur chicken man has to face, and apparently the one which mystifies him most. Yet there are several causes for even the strongest chicks dying in the shell. When the incubator has been used, the cause for chicks dying in the shell is usually want of proper ventilation, or the heat running down, or the door being opened during the last forty-eight hours. Ventilation can be best gauged by the appearance of the air cell when the egg is held before the tester. The so-called air cell is the space at the large end of the egg. In a newly-laid egg it is very small. After the egg has been in the incubator for seven days, there is quite a visible space, and as evaporation progresses, it increases until the nineteenth day, when it should occupy one-fifteenth of the entire shell. If there is not sufficient ventilation in the incubator, evaporation will be retarded, and there will not be sufficient room in the shell for the chick to twist its head and break its way out; and it will die, though fully developed. If the development of the air cell is too slow, the ventilator in the incubator should be opened a little wider, and the eggs aired a little longer each day when you take out the traps to air the eggs. If the development of the air cell is too rapid, reverse the conditions and put a sponge of hot water in the machine on the nineteenth day. After turning the eggs on the morning of the eighteenth day, don't open the machine until the hatch is over, and be very careful that the heat does not run down during that time. It may go up to 104 degrees or even to 105 without doing any harm, but it must not go below 103.

W. J. R.—Without doubt your hens are too fat, and are dying from liver trouble. About chicks dying in the shell, please read answer to H. D. McC. in this issue.

O. A.—Lumber. Tile is likely to be damp.

U. R. B.—This letter describes the condition so prevalent in fall and spring, that I am going to answer it very fully, in the hope that it may help many who have not written for advice, as well as those who have. First of all, I want our readers to realize that sudden weakness, staggering about, comb going very dark or pale, twitching of the head, or the head being drawn back from the body or falling down onto the ground, are all symptoms of acute intestinal trouble, and no matter what has caused the trouble, or which special organ may have been attacked, a tablespoonful of castor oil, given without delay, will nine times out of ten prevent the case from becoming dangerous. Poisonous substances, such as paint skins, strong fertilizer, spraying fluids, fresh lime, soda, or washing powder, are some of the unsuspected causes of miseries, illnesses, and sudden deaths in the spring. Stagnant water and moldy bedding, new or moldy grain, decaying or putrid animal matter, are frequently answerable for fall and early winter troubles, for all of the above materials are likely to be within the reach of birds running loose about the back yards and farms. Some of the materials irritate or inflame the crop and gizzard, these produce a condition very much resembling ptomaine poisoning in human beings. But in all and every case, the first step must be to clear the intestines, and if this can be done before diarrhea sets in, a cure can be effected; but if diarrhea has had twenty-four hours' start, it is extremely difficult to save the patient. The castor oil removes the poisonous matter, and is soothing; but the bird must be confined in a clean, sheltered coop, and fed lightly on food that will not irritate. Stale bread, toasted, and then just moistened with milk which has been scalded; rice or oatmeal which has been thoroughly boiled and allowed to become cold, are all suitable invalid diet. If the diarrhea has got any headway, give the water in which the rice has been boiled as a drink, and the first day give twenty drops of laudanum to every half cupful. When the diarrhea ceases, the rice water may be replaced by plain water. After a few days, give a little ground corn mixed with bread or oatmeal; add gradually bran or green vegetables, until the bird is getting almost ordinary feed before allowing it to return to the flock. Of course, it is a waste of time to doctor sick fowls unless the cause of the trouble is located and removed. In your own and your neighbor's case it was undoubtedly the moldy rotten grain which made the birds sick. Unripened grain of any kind will cause indigestion, and if the supply lasts for any length of time, gastritis or liver complaint.

I would like to say to Black-Eyed Susan's question: Yes, if you know that the future husband is naturally fond of children he will in all likelihood be good to your children and they really deserve a father and you are too young to live alone the rest of your life. I have seen such marriages happy and successful. I would like to hear from you personally.

Texas Blue Bonnet, I certainly think you deserve your fern back again and a whole bunch of plants besides. You are doing what I would call real, everyday, Christian work. How many of us can say that we have done as much? We can't help a girl who has made a false step if we scorn and shun her. It's up to us to make her feel that she has made a mistake and that we know she will be a good citizen and a credit to her community. You cannot uplift people by trampling on them.

And mothers, right here is where I want to put in a word or two. When we begin teaching our boys that they have no more right to sow wild oats than their sisters have, then we will have fewer girls go wrong. Let us teach them that they cannot commit every crime on the calendar and expect to marry a good, pure girl. That has been the man of the past, but it shouldn't be the man of the future. Let us spend less time praying to save our own little souls and more time teaching ideals to our boys and girls, to respect women and motherhood and that sex is a sacred thing. Teach them all that is good and beautiful in life as well as in books. Don't send them to Sunday School and stay home yourself. Go with them. I think if we share in their sports, joys and sorrows they will share with us their little confidences. If we can have them confide in us we have a good chance to help mould their future in a better way.

If any of the sisters care to send this rough-neck Westerner a view postal, will return the favor.

With very best wishes to you all, just address

DEAR WORRIED MOTHER:

My heart goes out to you in your trouble and I cannot resist the call to write to you, strangers that we are, we are mothers, and if I can only help you I will be so glad and thankful. My dear friend, I, and hundreds of other mothers, have passed through what is before you. My boy, my only one, brought this same trouble to me. It almost killed me, care for him alone kept me, for he called to me for help in his trouble. It was hard to be brave and help him to be brave and do the only manly thing he could do—marry the girl, and today she is as dear to me as one of my own daughters. She has proved herself a daughter in every sense of the word and I am repaid by her care of me for all I did for her. Dear friend, don't scorn this girl. She needs you. Make her your daughter in every sense of the word. Help your boy do his duty by her. It is the only just thing for him to do. She has made this mistake but has not sinned alone. Should she suffer alone? I know it is hard but the fault is your boy's as much as hers and if you condemn one you must condemn both, both are equally to blame, and the girl suffers most for the boy will soon be looked at the same as before he sinned but the girl must always bear the brand of shame if they do not marry. Can your boy expect a good girl to marry him after his betrayal of this girl? He, or any boy, cannot expect to be blessed with the love of a good, true girl, knowing he has committed this sin and not done the right thing by the girl. Marry and protect her. I hope, dear friend, you will be given the strength and courage to do your duty by this unfortunate girl. It is your flesh and blood you are protecting, remember, just as near to you as any grandchild, if you have any. I hope and pray you decide for the girl's protection.

FROM A MOTHER WHO HAS BEEN WORRIED.

ST. LOUIS, 4225 Lindell Blvd., Mo.

TO WORRIED MOTHER, TENNESSEE:

I read your letter in COMFORT regarding your son. I must say you are a great deal like a lot of other women, in other words you are not thinking from the right standpoint, and your mind can only be changed by associating with people who are broad minded and look at things from different angles. I know how sincere the Southern people are, as I am a Southerner myself, but have lived in St. Louis long enough to realize that there is harm and sin in anything if we wish to make it so. In the city of St. Louis there are 1,115 illegitimate children in the eight public institutions here. Of this number there are only 173 father's caring for their illegitimate children. Of course this does not include any illegitimate child that is not in a public institution. Some of our greatest men of the world were born out of wedlock. Children born

MINERALIZED WATER ROUTS CHICKEN LICE

Tablets Dropped into Drinking Founts Banish Vermin, Make Fowls Grow Faster and Increase Egg Yield.

Any poultry raiser can easily rid his flock of lice and mites, makes chickens grow faster and increase their egg yield by simply adding minerals to the fowls' drinking water. This does away with all bother, such as dusting, greasing, dipping and spraying. The necessary minerals can now be obtained in convenient tablets, known as Paratabs. Soon after the fowls drink the mineralized water, all lice and mites leave them. The tablets also act as a tonic conditioner. The health of the fowls quickly improves, they grow faster and the egg yield frequently is doubled. Little chicks that drink freely of the water never will be bothered by mites or lice.

The method is especially recommended for raisers of purebred stock, as there is no risk of soiling the plumage. The tablets are warranted to impart no flavor or odor to the eggs and meat. This remarkable conditioner, egg tonic and lice remedy costs only a trifle and is sold under an absolute guarantee. The tablets are scientifically prepared, perfectly safe, and dissolve readily in water.

Any reader of this paper may try them without risk. The laboratories producing Paratabs are so confident of good results that to introduce them to every poultry raiser they offer two big $1 packages for only $1. Send no money, just your name and address—a card will do— to the Paratab Laboratories, Dept. 869, 1100 Coca Cola Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and the two $1 packages, enough for 100 gallons of water, will be mailed. Pay the postman $1 and postage on delivery, and if you are not delighted with results in 10 days—if your chickens are not healthier, laying more eggs and entirely free from lice and mites—your money will be promptly refunded. Don't hesitate to accept this trial offer as you are fully protected by this guarantee.

Science Discovers Greatest Lice Killer

Changes Old Methods. No Dusting or Spraying. Birds Delouse Themselves. Gives Lasting Relief.

A recent discovery promises to revolutionize all the methods accepted up to now for keeping poultry free from lice and mites. This wonderful lice killer keeps the birds always lice free without the poultry raiser doing any work. It is the simplest, easiest, surest and best method ever discovered.

Hick's Lice Kill, which is the name of this sensational lice killer, is added to the drinking water. The medicine taken into the system of the bird comes out through the pores and every louse or mite dies or leaves the body. It does not injure the hatchability or flavor of the eggs or meat; is harmless to chicks and does not affect the plumage. A few days treatment at the start and then a little in the drinking water each month.

A Trial Costs You Nothing

So confident is Mr. Hick that Hick's Lice Kill will kill every louse or mite, that he is making a special guaranteed offer of two regular full sized, double strength, $1.00 bottles and a regular $1.00 package of Hick's Egg-Lay Tablets all for $1.00. Use one bottle yourself and sell the other at one dollar, thus getting your own free. Send $1.00 today (currency, money order, check, etc.) to Chas. M. Hick & Co., Dept. 1176, 1018 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill. If you prefer, send no money, just your name and address, and pay postman $1.00 and postage on delivery. If after two weeks trial you are not absolutely satisfied, write Mr. Hick and your money will be refunded.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

THERE were so many questions this month that my intentions were to say "Howdy" and then go to work, but I came across a letter from a girl in Nebraska, whom we will call Edna, just to be friendly and to show that we are sorry for her, which she asks me to print as a warning to other young girls. Here it is. Think it over.

I wasn't quite seventeen years of age when I married a man of twenty-five. He left me after we had been married a few months but I let him come back to me, then he left me again after my baby was born. He wouldn't work very long at a time. I took him back again but he didn't stay with me. He would just walk out as though he was going to work and I wouldn't hear from him for a month and then I'd learn about him from someone else. I stayed with my folks until I was able to get a job I don't get very big wages but I'm better off this way than living with him. He wants to come back again but I won't have him. I think my experience would be a good lesson for other girls. Go to school, or work at something, and keep boys out of your mind until you are old enough to know what you are doing, never under eighteen at the least. I wish someone had given me this advice. EDNA."

IRISH, Mo.—You shouldn't be held to an engagement made when you were only fourteen and the man, being nine years older than you, shouldn't have bound you by any promise at that age and should release you now if you wish it. Naturally, at eighteen your ideas have changed (and will continue to change) and, as you say, you are too young to marry, anyway. Why not have another talk with him and tell him you want two or three years of freedom in which to meet other men as an unengaged girl. You may decide before the end of that time that he is the one and only and he may meet another girl that he likes better than you for, of course, he is to be as free as you are, unless he wishes to show his love by patiently waiting for you, and men, as a rule, aren't good waiters.

E. R., Kansas.—If you do not love the man you are engaged to, break the engagement. At his age he should have acquired a job and not have to depend upon his parents for everything. Don't let the material possessions of the other fellow influence you unduly for No. 1 may be all right once he starts in. Sometimes fellows need a good jolt in order to make them amount to something and fear of losing you may be just the jolt he needs. Being naturally tender hearted and sorry for the other girl, I dislike to advise No. 2 to break the engagement. That's something he will have to decide for himself, taking into consideration the length of time he has been engaged to her, the time he has kept other fellows away from her, and her claim on him. On the other hand, if he doesn't care for her it would be kinder to tell her so. I hope everything is settled by this time and that all are happy.

KIND HEARTED, Ga.—See above answer to Irish, Mo.

JOE, Tenn.—If you had complained that your sister had more advantages along educational lines than your parents have given you then I'd have stood up for you, strong, but when your chief grievance is that your father doesn't allow you to go to social gatherings and buggy riding with boys, then I'm not so sorry for you. He doubtless knows what is best. Both amusements are all right unless made the chief interest in life. I don't know why your father should consider buggy riding with a boy worse than walking with the same boy unless there is danger of going farther. Tell your parents that if they will give you the same opportunity for an education that they gave your sister (not necessarily along the same lines, but equivalent) that you'll think less of boys and buggy riding and more of your studies until you are through school.

PAULINE, Va.—You are too young to have a beau. Mind your father.

CATHERINE, Pa.—If your hair is the fine, soft kind that clings closely to your head, don't have it bobbed. If it is curly, or the fluffy, wavy kind, it would be more likely to look good but that depends upon the shape of your face and various other qualities.

BELLE, Va.—Under the circumstances it would be better to write to him and tell him that your mother has changed her mind and will allow you boy callers this summer. That would be better than accepting the attentions of other boys and giving him reason to think you had been untruthful to him.

OKLAHOMA SCHOOL GIRL.—Your "hand wrighting" might indicate that you had finished grammar school but your spelling "dosen't." You should not be cross with your fiance because he "talks" to a girl you do not like; maybe common courtesy demanded it and merely speaking to her isn't anything. He should not be particularly interested in her, though, especially if her reputation isn't good. Maybe that's why he is. You are too young to take your love affairs seriously. Love at your age is more or less like mumps, acute while it lasts but of short duration.

ANNA, Va.—The dime may have slipped into the envelope by accident and he didn't know anything about it. You should have given him a chance to explain. My, what a hair-trigger disposition you must have to get cross over one thin dime. Give him a chance to make up if you still love him.

ALABAMA BEAUTY.—Don't marry him if he plans to go away to school and don't feel badly if you never marry him. He doesn't impress me, somehow, as one who would make you happy. He's rather selfish, isn't he?

BLUE BELL, Strawberry Plains.—From his actions it would seem that he cares for you only as a friend so think of him in the same way.

POLLY, Fla.—You sure are right—don't let him come to see you until he gives up the disreputable girl and I don't believe I'd have him anyway if I were in your place. Probably he isn't any better than she is.

BLUE EYES, Okla.—Don't be a piker, Blue Eyes. You wanted to get married and you did. Now that you have a home and baby to care for you want to be single and have a good time, and ask me if you should leave your husband. He is kind to you and you have a good home. In that respect you are more fortunate than a number of girls who marry as young as you did, so appreciate your blessings and don't be a rattle-headed little idiot. Maybe he is beginning to find out how shallow and worthless you are and wouldn't mind so very much if you did leave him. Try and make your husband admire you because you are such a good wife and mother rather than care less for you because you are trying to shirk the duties and responsibilities you brought upon yourself. You needn't give up the society of young people. Invite them to your home and go with them occasionally to dances and picnics. See that your husband has a good time on these occasions and he will be more anxious to go. If he isn't, tell him that you enjoy such things, that they make you happy and ask him to go with you. Don't get in the habit of going with his men friends, even if he isn't jealous. It is more or less dangerous and very likely to cause gossip. Read the letter from "Edna" at the beginning of this column.

EDWARD, Iowa.—Sorry, Edward, but it is out of the question for me to furnish you with the names and addresses of twenty girls. This isn't a matrimonial agency and while I'm plump, I'm no Mrs. Cupid and besides I don't know you. You might be a horse thief or a dish washer for all I know.

BROWN EYES, Ky.—I'm not taking your letter seriously for this time you have changed your mind and the future doesn't look so black and old maidey as it did when your sweetheart married another. Stick to your resolution, though, about not having anything to do with married men. Your life may not be all pleasant at home but it might be as bad, or worse, away from home. Better stay where you are and study hard until you are older and better fitted to care for yourself. Get all the education you possibly can.

JAZZ HEARTS OF INDIANA.—Just "Thank you" is sufficient in both cases. (2) The most suitable style in engagement rings is what the man can afford. A plain gold band is always good for the wedding ring though the newer rings are of green or white gold or of platinum, engraved or set with diamonds. (3) It is proper for an engaged couple to kiss each other.

MATTIE, Ark.—I hope I'm not mercenary but if he has his mother and sister to support and only a little money, you'd better look around for a man with more money or no dependents, who could care for you and your children, should there be any.

IDA, Wisc.—It isn't always a question of how much money a man earns as how much he saves. If this boy has been working steadily for three years, with only himself to care for, and has no money saved, I don't blame your parents for objecting to him. However, you are young and can afford to wait a couple of years, or longer, and if he really cares for you he will begin to save money and prove to your parents that he is capable of caring for you.

MARY, Texas.—You'd better forgive and forget if he is truly sorry, and don't do anything just for spite or to get even. That isn't showing a very generous spirit. Maybe I've used this quotation before, but it is a favorite one of mine.

"Be noble! and the nobleness that lies
In other men, sleeping, but never dead,
Will rise in majesty to meet thine own."

Hoping you are all the same,

COUSIN MARION.

How to Overcome Sleeplessness

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IF you are a sufferer from that distressing complaint, insomnia, if you go to bed tired expecting and perhaps desperately needing a good night's rest and lie tossing about on your bed unable to get even a wink of sleep until the small hours, do not take drugs to put you to sleep. Such things should never be resorted to except in desperate cases and by the advice of a skilled physician. Perhaps there are reasons for your sleeplessness which if corrected would gradually overcome the difficulty. The first thing to do is to thoroughly review your mode of life and try to discover what you are doing or leaving undone that could have caused this condition.

Do you eat indigestible suppers late at night? Do you get so tired every day that you can hardly drag one foot after the other when you get into bed? Are your hands and feet cold a good deal of the time thus showing poor circulation or do you suffer from dyspepsia or intestinal indigestion or worse than all have you let yourself get into the bad habit of worrying? All these things will produce insomnia. If you drive yourself day in and day out the brain becomes so full of fatigue toxins that sound, restful sleep is difficult, nearly impossible. The remedy of course is to take things a little easier in the daytime. But the sort of fatigue that causes insomnia is always mental, not physical. In fact one of the commonest causes of insomnia is lack of exercise in the fresh air. Sometimes a short walk just before going to bed or even sitting on the piazza in the evening will entirely cure incipient cases of insomnia if the bedroom window is also kept wide open so that you will get plenty of fresh air every night.

Another cause of sleeplessness is going to bed with the stomach too empty. When more than four hours has elapsed since the evening meal, either dinner or supper, a cup of hot milk just before retiring is often a great help or, if milk does not agree with you, take a cup of bouillon or some light soup with a cracker or a piece of toast. When sleeplessness is caused by indigestion or poor circulation a hot-water bag at the feet or a bag that is just pleasantly warm, not hot, placed across the stomach often effects a cure. A hot bath taken just before getting into bed is also extremely soothing.

Sleeplessness is not only a very distressing condition in itself but if continued for any length of time leads to all sorts of bodily ills. It is not really a disease but rather a symptom of some physical disturbance or mental strain. It is, as a famous physician calls it, "an invaluable danger signal the prompt heeding of which will save us many a breakdown." The average individual in good health requires about eight hours of sleep every night to keep in condition though constitutions vary in this respect, some people requiring a little less while others need more, nine or ten hours. Children should have from ten to twelve hours. One of the puzzling things about insomnia is the difficulty of discovering exactly how long the sufferer has slept for it is easily possible to hear the clock strike every hour and yet to have dozed off a good deal between times.

ones to a better life. I haven't time to write more now on this subject, but if you ever get an opportunity to read any of Senator Reed's articles on the Maternity Bill, please do not pass them up. This would improve your mind considerably.

Very truly yours, CORINE J. ROBERTS.

OURAY, UTAH.

DEAR COMFORT FAMILY:

I am a lonely woman, living away out on Green River, six miles from the postoffice and on the Ute Reservation. I have my husband, two sons and a daughter and it is a comfort to work for those we love.

I make pin money selling cakes and pies to the Indians, who are the only neighbors I have.

I enjoy COMFORT and especially the Sisters' Corner and it is a great help to me.

I am going to ask a favor. Can someone give me the address of a bead factory where I can buy beads for fancy work, the kind the Indians use?

Your COMFORT Sister, MARY M. BARNEY.

Mrs. Barney.—Do you use COMFORT recipes? If so, I shall think of you when a particularly good cake recipe is published and wonder if you will make that cake for Chief Chocolate Frosting or Chief Cream Puff. Tell us more about the Indians.—Ed.

A PENNSYLVANIA HILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

May I talk for a few moments to Worried Mother?

Dear Worried Mother, has your boy confessed how many hours of coaxing and promising and love making it took to get the girl to be "that sort?" No, no, boys don't do that.

When I was fourteen years of age I met a boy whom I came to care for very much and we were engaged.

I remember quite a few of his arguments but he forgot all about these when I told him my secret. I was only fifteen, no mother. No one knows the hours I childishly lay crying, praying for death. At last my baby came, a dear little thing. Then he came back and we were married. He now loves me as much as a man possibly could but I remember the tears and heartaches and how he failed me when I needed him the most.

I now have boys of my own and if ever they deceive a girl and I cannot make them realize their duty, it is the girl who will get my sympathy.

ONE OF "THAT SORT."

DENVER, 115 Sherman St., COLORADO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Since my letter condemning the immoral motion pictures was printed in the August, 1921, issue of COMFORT, there have appeared a few letters (in the Sisters' Corner), of disapproval, criticizing my letter, and it is evident that I have been misunderstood; I didn't wish to convey the idea that the indecent motion pictures were to blame for all the crime and immorality, but every sane person must admit that the present low standard of motion pictures—and also the majority of vaudeville and drama—is one of the chief causes of juvenile delinquency; and for the benefit of "M. M." (whose letter appeared in the December, 1921, COMFORT), and other "doubting Thomases" I will quote from the pen of a well-known motion picture producer: "America has no taste for uplift in drama. Our people don't want good plays. They want smutty things. The drama of America is degenerating." Is not that sufficient proof that the majority of the motion pictures are indecent? And if you do not think the above statement sufficient evidence that these deplorable conditions do exist, attend any so-called "high class"(?) motion picture show, vaudeville or drama, and then you will be convinced of the truthfulness of the above statements.

If America has no taste for uplift in drama, if the majority of people prefer "smutty things," who is to be blamed? The producers are to be blamed (to a certain extent), for they are commercializing virtue, and the degraded minds of the majority of people are demanding that type of pictures and drama. Consequently the film producers and theatrical men are blinded by the almighty dollar, in their attempt to satisfy that demand for the impure class of pictures and drama. Nevertheless, we must not censure the producers and theatrical men too much, for they are only human. They are not much concerned with the moral welfare of the American people, for they are thinking too much about how much cold cash they will make out of the degrading class of pictures or plays they are producing to satisfy the general public's demand.

Since the World War, it seems that our moral standard has lost its equilibrium, the majority of people—particularly the male sex—have allowed their modesty, self-respect and better nature to deteriorate. They have been overburdened with sorrow, sickness, worry, strife and all manner of unpleasant conditions. Indeed, civilization has gone through the greatest change of conditions that has ever taken place in history, during which time, most of the Americans have neglected the development of their moral nature so long that they have lost their desire for many of the really good and worthwhile things of life. Therefore, under those circumstances, is it any wonder that our moral standard has degenerated?

And we must not place too much blame upon the movies, dance halls, card parties, joy rides, prohibition, short skirts or low-neck dresses. True, they have some evil influence upon the morals of the young people, but they alone are not the fundamental cause of our present low standard of morals.

My opponent, "M. M.," says that I should spend several years among the South Sea Islanders, stating: "I want to tell Mr. Smith that all the sin there is in a film show is in the minds of the spectators and not in the films. There is beauty in everything that God made. If you don't see godliness in a beautiful woman or a strong man, the devil has infused your mind with immoral thoughts and you are weak enough to listen to him."

I certainly do agree with what my opponent says. Sure, I can see godliness in a beautiful woman, and I know that the sin "is in the minds of the spectators and not in the films." But I wish to make this clear: my mind is not infused with immoral thoughts. Certainly, I said the movies are immoral, but they are only immoral as long as people think they are; but since the majority of people will not change their thinking, as long as they continue to indulge in salacious thinking and demanding "smutty things," some pressure should be brought to bear whereby these carnal temptations will be (to a certain extent) taken away from the general public. In other words, as long as the young boys and men (and others) have lustful minds and cannot look upon the opposite sex dressed in a semi-nude costume without immoral thoughts, we should establish a more modest style of dress for young girls and women; and the producers of motion pictures and drama should cease producing pictures and plays wherein women pose in semi-nude costumes. Indeed, it is our duty, as American citizens, to resort to such drastic measures in order to protect our children from their evil influence; for if most of the young men cannot see purity instead of evil in a beautiful girl or woman, if they haven't enough moral backbone to resist evil temptations, then the temptations should be removed from their sight.

The causes of all the evil existing today are varied and too numerous to mention, but suffice it to say that the fundamental causes are: heredity, lack of proper training in childhood, wrong environment, and our abominable double standard of morals. And we need not anticipate any marked decrease in crime and immorality until a single standard of morals is established—until parents teach their boys that what is wrong for a girl is wrong for a boy, for purity and modesty are redeeming qualities of character that belong to boys as well as to girls. In other words, all parents should place as much stress upon the training of their boys as their girls. Furthermore, parents should not allow their boys to think it is wrong for them to become "sissies," for if there were more so-called "sissy" boys there would be less crime and immorality, because the so-called "sissy" boys are more modest and reserved—more like girls—and, therefore, they are not involved in every manner of mischief and "Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

ROSY POSY, Owatonna, Minn.—If you have been in the habit of calling this boy you have known for a year by his first name, you would so address him in a letter, saying, for instance: "Dear Jack," or "My dear Jack." But you will have to arrange for yourself what you think best to say after this conventional opening. (2) Let your escort give the order when you are dining together in a restaurant—you having first signified what are your choices as to food.

MRS. S. G., Lebanon, Pa.—Most assuredly a man should remove his hat when in attendance at a funeral.

MISS L. N., Chapel Hill, Texas.—If you meet this boy you know at a dance or other entertainment it makes absolutely no difference who is the first to speak. However, if you know him to be bashful, as some timid young swains have been known to be, it might be kind of you to help him out by speaking first a friendly word of greeting.

GRAY EYES, Church Road, Va.—It is not necessary to give any thanks, formal or informal, to this boy who treats you to ice cream, unless you choose to smile at him a little more charmingly while you are eating the frozen offering. Of course, you may, if you wish to be precise, say: "Thanks; that was delicious."

B. P., Pueblo, Colo.—You should have small plates and fruit knives with which to properly serve your guests the fruit you describe. The same plates which they have used for the fruit may also serve for your nuts. It is best to have these last carefully cracked and this will make your nut picks unnecessary unless your nuts are of some native and tenacious sort.

ANXIOUS SIS, Wisconsin.—Of course you must not speak with strange boys on the street. That they speak first has nothing to do with the matter. (2) You may talk for a while, if you wish, either at the gate or in the car with the boy who has brought you home. But "for a while" means minutes and not an hour or two.

UNHAPPY, Kansas.—Some of us are born more sensitive and self-conscious than others. A painful bashfulness is not rare when one is young and unused to meeting others in the social game of give and take. You will find it will help by ceasing to think "people have a queer way" of looking at you "and laughing." That is just your difficulty: you are watching and thinking that they are watching and thinking of you, when you should forget the you entirely in taking your part in the talk, games, etc., of your evening gathering. You must have your interest more in others than in yourself and cease to watch yourself and your surroundings so carefully. You are not the only one present and everybody is not interested in you alone and the errors you make or think you make. Sink your self-consciousness in the spirit of the gathering; be as natural and sincere as you can in your conversation and actions; feel that you are doing your best and having a good time—and then worry no more about what others may be thinking of you. Time will remedy the most of your troubles, we are sure. As an extremely self-conscious and bashful person, you fail in making friends because you prevent others from knowing you well by the barriers you erect. When you have learned to be more yourself you will have more friends. Be sincerely friendly and you will soon gain friends. Give, and you will receive.

E. F., Hancock, Minn.—A girl does not receive gifts of jewelry and anything so valuable as a diamond ring except from the man to whom she is promised in marriage. Your parents are entirely correct in telling you to return this ring. Why do you ask us, "Should I do it?" A fifteen-year-old girl should do exactly as her parents tell her in this and other matters. (2) You should not have been car riding with this young man and then the difficulty you describe could not have occurred. Take this as a warning and do not accept such invitations in the future unless you can go properly chaperoned. You need not tell this familiar young man that you are sorry for having "bit and scratched him." It is he who owes you an apology.

v A. M., Pueblo, Colo.—You say, "Pardon me," if you have sneezed or coughed in a disturbing or alarming manner while in the company of others.

L. J., Starbuck, Minn.—This boy seems to be the right sort of a chap, and that he continues to "go" with you after you quite properly refused to let him kiss you would indicate that he is sincerely fond of you. (2) Answer his letters if you like, but tell him that he must not use such foolish phrases as the one you quote. Perhaps he will mind you this time, too,—as he did about the kisses.

B. R., Rockland, Mich.—You are not supposed to know what the Juniors of your school think about the matter, nor do you have to believe what you have heard they have said. The fact remains that they have invited your class to a reception which will doubtless include your faculty and the school board. It would be the pleasant and correct thing for you to accept the invitation and attend. What if you do not care for dancing? Probably the faculty and the school board will not do much dancing either. Do not take the opportunity to have a misunderstanding between your classes, when no such difficulty need occur. Attend and enjoy yourself as much as possible. If the Juniors enjoy it more because they "love dancing," why you should be glad that they are having this good time. Isn't this the best spirit?

VIRGINIA BABY, Rhoadesville, Va.—A veranda dance would be a happy way of entertaining a crowd of young people after a birthday supper in the month of July. If your veranda will not admit of this, have your dance in rooms that have had surplus furniture removed and that are open as much as possible to your veranda or to the air. If you have a veranda, have this lighted by paper lanterns and serve refreshments of ice cream and cake at midnight. Your lawn can also be lighted, if this is possible to accomplish, and chairs and benches placed there for the rest and coolness of dancers.

PEGGIE, Muncie, Ind.—Of course you should give your brother's fiancee a sincere and hearty greeting—which means that you should kiss her when he first brings her to your home.

BLUE EYES, Mississippi.—It would be correct for your escort to aid you in putting on your heavy cloak. (2) If this observant escort tells you your skirt is not hanging properly, it would be best for you to leave him for a moment and adjust this—not only to please his exactitude, but to feel sure that you are correctly dressed. Powder upon your dark gown may be brushed off in his presence, but we think he and others would find you more attractive if you did not have a surplus of this article to overflow upon your gown. It appears to us that you have the attention of a critical young man, and you will have to watch your appearance closely if you are to continue to find favor in his appraising eyes.

L. E., Auburn, Ind.—We think your escort should consult your wishes as to where you prefer to sit in church. If not, we would pick out a more considerate escort the next Sunday. (2) Wear black silk stockings with a black satin or messaline gown.

MRS. K. P., Ukiah, Ore.—There will be time enough for you to put on your outside wraps after your escort calls for you. When he arrives, you can ask him if you should go at once, and if he replies affirmatively, you may leave him while you get on your out-of-door attire.

BILLIE'S GIRL, Iowa.—In your letter you have the town, state and date at the upper right-hand of the sheet, which is its correct place. (2) A girl of seventeen should accept attentions from only those young men whom her family looked upon with approval.

had my share of sickness. I help my mother at home when I am not at school. I can sew and cook and do many other little things about the house. We take Domestic Science at our school and there are three classes of us—four or five in each class.

I live about twenty miles from the greatest oil field in the world which is at Eldorado, Arkansas. They are now putting in a test well about three miles from here.

Uncle Lisha, will you please publish my letter, as this is the first letter I ever wrote to any paper. I will love Billy forever if he does not get my letter.

From one who loves you all,
MAURINE MITCHELL.

The next time you go to that double-decked school of yours, Maurine, just take a look in the dictionary and find out what that newsy volume will say "inhibition" means. Then you'll know why I laughed so hard I stripped a gear in my typewriter and three buttons off my vest when I read what you wrote about Locust Bayou having "75 inhibitions." There are many villages, Maurine, where inhabitants are well supplied with inhibitions of various sorts, but seventy-five is a decidedly generous number and ought to interfere some with the workings of the Locust Bayou town board.

I was ever so glad to know you were at last free of your rheumatism, Maurine. Mother-care and olive oil make a sovereign remedy when well mixed. I am a firm believer in the efficacy of olive oil when applied either internally or externally. We would all be healthier and happier with less hog fat and more of the rich vegetable fat of the olive. As your mother used it, with long and careful massage, the oil penetrated to your affected joints, Maurine, and accomplished softening and dissolving effects. To any one of rheumatic tendencies, it should be a preventive and a curative to rub olive oil well into the skin after each hot bath, and this method would be particularly valuable during the cold months. I have often told Billy this, but he persists in sticking to yellow soap and liniment and gets lamer every winter, I'm sure—any way, his grunts sound lamer. Now if that new oil well near you, Maurine, could just be arranged to gush olive oil, why I would feel sure that you could continue free of aches and pains for all the rest of the well and happy years I hope you'll add to the present fourteen you now have successfully attained. And remember, Maurine, that inhibitions are even worse than rheumatism—and even olive oil can't work a cure.

LACENTER, WASHINGTON.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Pst! Sh! Where is he? Yes, I mean Billy the Goat. Do you think I can make it through the door before he gets his gleaming eye on me? I joined your corner some time ago and although for ten years I've desired to enter into conversation with the cousins this is only my second attempt to do so. I would have tried it oftener but brave as I am, somehow when I see the gloating grin and wicked twitch of Billy's whiskers, I flee like the veriest coward. However, having come this far I'll chat for a while even if it is only for Billy's benefit.

I say, Uncle Lisha, how I do enjoy your talks and answers to the cousins. I sit and giggle hysterically and fairly hug myself with enjoyment as I read some of them. How I wish I could do it for it would come in handy in my career as a "great writer," which leads me to the question on which I desire a little advice. What do you think of journalism as a profession for a woman? Speak right up, Uncle, and dish me up as much discouragement as you like. I'll swallow it all. I've determined to take up this profession whether or no, but thought you might drop me a helpful hint or two.

There are just "oodles" of subjects I should like to talk upon but—not today. For there's a glorious and beautiful day outside, a-callin' and a-callin' and I'm going right out and into the arms of it pretty soon. It's a beautiful world, the Great-Out-of-Doors, isn't it, Uncle Lisha? And I'm glad—glad, that I am one of those upon whom has been bestowed the eyes, the ears, and—the Heart, which allows me to find joy and happiness in the sunshine and flowers, peace and contentment in the silent woods and hills, and strange longings and wonderful "dreams" out under the stars.

Perhaps you're all wondering what sort of "wild rosebud" I am so I'll give you a little data on the subject. I am eighteen (though I hate to admit it), look sixteen, and feel less than fourteen. In addition I'm a giantess of somewhat less than five feet two inches and a weight of 110 pounds. Have fluffy, blackish-brown hair and people insist that I've got typical "Irish" eyes, though for my part I like to think of them as plain "American" grey. I'm a high school graduate and at present am attending business college in Portland, Oregon, where I'm being taught the "Whang Whang Blues" on a typewriter. Please, say a good word for the poor "stenogs," Uncle, for I know dear Uncle Charlie used to knock them unmercifully. Perhaps some of them need it, but on the whole a nicer lot of clean, ambitious girls can't be found anywhere. My business course is just the intervening step between high school and university. With its help I hope to make my university course in about two years. I'm all for an education for both boys and girls. Being able to bake good bread is a fine thing, girls (though I've never tried it) but a mental scope beyond a kitchen is one of the first and absolute essentials in a happy marriage. So get into the race for an education, cousins, for it's a great life. A good motto will help a lot, too. Mine has been simply forced upon me and I can't get rid of it now. Every time I feel certain of failing, "Don't give up the ship," rings in my ears and I keep steadily on. My old ship has almost foundered several times (mostly due to sickness that has kept me from school months at a time) but I haven't been able to let go and so she's still a-sailing and without falling behind, either. Of course, I've had to study and work hard but you know—what's not worth working for is not worth having.

My favorite pastimes are "readin' and writin'." I read continually and can always find some good in every book. I love poetry, too, and Tennyson is my favorite. As for "writin'," I'm always doing something in that line. I wrote the class poem for our graduating class in high school. There's quite a little tale connected with that poem. You see, ever since I was down in the grammar grades I used to have a dream that some day if I ever graduated from high school I would write the class poem. However, it seemed as if it might always remain only a dream for my senior year found me in a new high school. I missed more than three months of school on account of illness and so for a time almost gave up hope of graduating with the class. However, the whole class was told to write a poem. I was only a "stranger" in the large school (which I had already learned to love) and in the class of about a hundred I never dreamed for a minute that my little poem would be voted the best of all. But it was—and it only goes to show that sometimes our dreams may come true after all.

Now will also state that I love music, am tremendously fond of all athletic sports, and—(sh! whisper it)—am crazy about dancing. There now you——

But mercy! There comes Billy the Goat and it's up to me to shake the dust of Manhattan from my oxfords in a hurry. There's one thing, however, that perhaps Billy and I agree upon and that is that Cousin Theo Carmichael in January COMFORT certainly must be our handsomest "Romeo" all right. I was almost persuaded to write to him but after reminding myself of all those little cute blondes that would probably besiege him with letters I gave up the idea. Thanks for letting us have your picture, Uncle Lisha. It's a good one and I'll bet even Cousin "Curley" can't beat it.

Help! There is Billy just entering and now it's a race for life and death. Who will win, Billy or I? But as I flash through state after state on my desperate sprint for home and safety let me just spare breath enough to shriek as I flee past: "Please, Cousins, won't you write to me? I'll answer everybody!"

Earnestly yours, HELEN M. BENN.

Helen, ten years is a long time to wait to have a talk with us—particularly when you can converse so well when you get started.

I have not a crumb of discouragement to offer your journalistic ambitions, Helen. Your letter is a good specimen of an active, clever brain. Go ahead, and God bless you. You must know how many women have become eminently successful pengineers after a beginning in the newspaper game. Fanny Hurst and Mary Roberts Rinehart are the first two shining names that come to mind, and there are many others. You say, "our dreams may come true after all." Of course they may. Thoreau wrote: "If you have built castles

26-Piece Table Set

Given For A Club Of Only Five

WE have made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a reward for so few subscriptions. "Peggy" The New Summer Doll

PEGGY first saw the light of day in New York but she didn't like the big city with its noise and confusion and was mighty glad to come to Maine on a brief vacation before looking for a permanent home somewhere in the country.

She doesn't care where she lives so long as as it is in some cozy little town or on a nice, big farm, and provided she can find some little girl who will be a kind mother to her. She just loves the horses and cows and doggies and kitties and—yes, even the little "piggies" make her laugh until she can hardly stand up.

Peggy says that life on the farm is the only life for her, so we want to give her to some little girl who lives on a farm, where she can romp and play to her heart's content and be happy all day long. Please remember, however, that we have but a limited number of these Dolls on hand and if you want one your order should be sent in at once.

A New York manufacturer who wanted to keep his help busy during the dull season sold us these Dolls at about one-half the regular wholesale price, so we are enabled to give them away for almost nothing.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you "Peggy" free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8621.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. E. H. B., California.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the man who died left no will, and that if his only relatives were a daughter and a brother and sister, his daughter would be his only heir at law and would receive the whole estate to the exclusion of the brother and sister.

X, Maine.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the man who died left no will, and that if his only relatives were two children and a sister, his two children would be his only heirs at law, and would receive the whole estate to the exclusion of the sister.

MRS. E. H. H., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the property of an intestate descends and is distributed if there is no child or descendant of a child, and no parent, brother or sister, or descendant of a parent, brother or sister, or no widow or surviving husband, to the next of kin in equal degrees (computing by the civil laws), there being no representation among collaterals, except with descendants of brothers and sisters, and no distinction being made between kindred of the whole and the half blood.

MRS. G. E., Ohio.—We think the laws of your state provide for a tax when the succession of the property comes by will or by the intestate laws of your state from a resident thereof and in some cases from a nonresident, if the property is within your state, this inheritance tax law provides for a graduated scale of taxation and exemption depending upon the relationship of the person receiving the property to the decedent, and depending upon the amount received. There is also a Federal law providing for an inheritance tax upon estates exceeding $50,000; this is also a graduated tax, depending, however, only upon the amount of the estate, and running from one per cent. on the first $50,000, above the exemptions and deductions to 25 per cent. on the excess above ten millions above such exemptions and deductions.

MRS. W. C. H., West Virginia.—If, as you state, your grandfather died intestate as to a portion of his property, we think same should go to the persons entitled to receive same under the intestacy laws of the state of which he was a resident. We think this property, as well as the property disposed of by his will, should be administered by the executor of the will if there was an executor named in the will who qualified thereunder.

MRS. C. E. P.—You should submit your address with your inquiry.

MRS. B. C., Mississippi.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of your father, without a will, your mother, in addition to her homestead rights, if any, and certain small allowances from the personal property, was entitled to a child's part in both the real and personal estate, the balance going in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share.

MRS. L. B., Tennessee.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, his widow, after payment of debts and expenses, in addition to her homestead rights, if any, would receive all of the personal estate, absolutely, and dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, the balance or remainder of his real estate going to his heirs at law. The dower interest in the real estate is without abatement for his debts, except such mortgage or other debts as she may have released from her dower claim.

MRS. M. H., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of Kentucky, we are of the opinion that the man you mention has a legal right to leave his whole estate to his wife if he elects, and that such a will would be a valid one provided the testator, at the time of executing same, possessed testamentary capacity, and provided no undue influence was exercised upon him, and provided the will was legally drawn and executed and expressed testator's true intent.

MRS. W. M. A., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, her surviving husband would receive one-half of the real estate and the whole of the personal estate, absolutely, after payment of debts and expenses.

MRS. C. P., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we do not think your children have any interest in your husband's property; we think such property as you may own will, upon your death without a will, leaving a surviving husband and children by a former marriage, after payment of debts and expenses, go one-quarter to your surviving husband, and the balance in equal shares to your children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share.

MRS. F. P., Minnesota.—We think that in order to make your adoption a legal one it will be necessary for your foster parents to procure a court order or decree for your adoption.

K. M., Oklahoma.—We think the wife of the man you mention should proceed against him to compel him to properly support her and his small children; we think she should make a complaint against him to some local magistrate or justice of the peace if he continues to beat and ill-treat her.

A. L., West Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your neighbor has no legal right to divert the water of the stream you mention so that it overflows your land; we think you can collect such damages as you have suffered by reason thereof in the proper action brought for the purpose.

MRS. J. C., Tennessee.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, his widow, after payment of debts and expenses, would be entitled to receive the whole of the personal estate, and that she would also be entitled to dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, and her homestead rights in the homestead if any.

MRS. W. N. P., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and no child nor descendant, his widow, after payment of debts and expenses, would be entitled, absolutely, to such of the personal property as shall have been acquired by the intestate in virtue of his marriage with her prior to April 4, 1877, and remain in kind at his death; she shall also be entitled to one-half of the residue of such surplus after payment of debts and expenses, and to dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate.

MRS. M. E. G., Indiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, and no parent, his widow would inherit the whole estate, in case she survives him; we do not think the child who lives with this man and wife would have any interest in their estate, unless some provision is made for her by will or unless she is legally adopted under the order or decree of some proper court. We think that if this man survives his wife and dies without a will, his own relatives will inherit his estate to the exclusion of the child you mention.

MRS. A. E., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the signature of the wife is necessary to the deed of conveyance of the property of the husband in order to release her inchoate right of dower in such property.

S. I. A., Pennsylvania.—We are of the opinion that the laws of your state exempt to the debtor from levy under execution property, either real or personal, to the value of $300, but that no exemption is allowed upon judgments of $100 or less obtained for wages for manual labor, nor for judgments obtained for board for four weeks or less.

G. F., Ohio.—Under the laws of Michigan, we are of the opinion that the husband of the woman, you mention, would have no interest in her separate property during her lifetime; we think that in case he survives her, and she leaves no will, he would be entitled to a share of her estate.

MRS. C. A. McC., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the judges of your county courts have a legal right to pass sentences upon those who have been convicted in their courts.

MRS. I. E. P., Missouri.—We think it will be necessary for the woman whose husband continues to beat her, after being put under bond to discontinue doing so, to bring him before the magistrate again for such punishment as may be necessary to teach him better habits.

MRS. A. H. B., North Carolina.—We think that the life insurance upon your brother's life, upon his death, became payable to the beneficiary named in the policy.

Poems Requested

The following poems have been requested by readers of COMFORT and sent for publication.

My Friend

How restful in the hour of need,
When all the world seems drear,
When life is very sad indeed
And everything's devoid of cheer—
How fine, how dear, my loyal friend,
To have your faith until the end.

Your handclasp and your sympathy,
Your gentle words, so true,
Make me feel the immensity
Of life—and I have hope anew.
I will not flinch—I will not bend
So long as you're my loyal friend.

I count myself among the blest,
For you have made me feel,
In spite of every acid test,
This life is beautiful and real.
My bitter thoughts have changed their trend
Since you believed in me—my friend.

Oh, may I be a friend to you,
And to all human kind;
For somewhere, somehow, sometime, too,
Someone will need us, we will find
In strong and weak—alike—my friend.
We will have faith until the end.

Or wif big nasty sticks,
Or abuse you wif kicks,

Tell me dat,
Did dey holler w'enever you cwied?

Did it hurt werry bad w'en you died,
Little Cat?
Oh! W'y did't you wun off and hide,

'Cause I almost always cwies
When a pussy cat dies,

And fordget all de kicks of the town.

Our Parents

When Pa Is Sick

When pa is sick,
He's scared to death,
An' ma an' us
Just holds our breath.

He crawls in bed,
An' puffs an' grunts,
An' does all kinds
Of crazy stunts.

He wants "Doc" Brown,
An' mighty quick;
For when pa's ill,
He's AWFUL sick.

He gasps an' groans,
An' sort o' sighs,
He talks s' queer,
An' rolls his eyes.

Ma jumps and runs,
An' all of us,
An' all the house
Is in a fuss.

An' peace an' joy
Is mighty skeerce—
When pa is sick,
It's somethin' fierce.

When Ma Is Sick

When ma is sick,
She pegs away;
She's quiet, though,
Not much t' say.

She goes right on
A doin' things,
An' sometime laughs,
Er even sings.

She says she don't Feel extry well,
But then it's just
A kind o' spell;

She'll be all right
Tomorrow, sure.
A good old sleep
Will be the cure.

An' pa, he sniffs,
An' makes no kick,
For women folks
Is always sick.

An' ma, she smiles,
Let's on she's glad—
When ma is sick,
It ain't s' bad.

This Life Is What We Make It

Let's oftener talk of noble deeds,
And rarer of the bad ones,
And sing about our happy days,
And not about the sad ones,
We were not made to fret and sigh,
And when grief sleeps to wake it,
Bright happiness is standing by—
This life is what we make it.

Let's find the sunny side of men,
Or be believers in it;
A light there is in every soul
That takes the pains to win it.
Oh! there's a slumbering good in all,
And we perchance may wake it;
Our hands contain the magic wand:
This life is what we make it.

Then here's to those whose loving hearts
Shed light and joy about them!
Thanks be to them for countless gems
We ne'er had known without them.
Oh! this should be a happy world
To all who may partake it;
The fault's our own if it is not—
This life is what we make it.

depredation; it is usually the "boy boys" who develop into bad boys and often criminals. Of course, one must also bear in mind that there are always exceptions in all cases.

Before closing this letter, permit me to say this to the parents, mothers especially: fill your boy's heart with love, let him know that he can always come to mother with his problems and you will guide and direct him in the right way, and above all else, don't let him think for one moment that he is—or ever will be—too big to receive your love and caresses. True, many say that too many caresses "spoil" children, but they do not; for it is the lack of discipline that "spoils" them. The child can be the recipient of many caresses and yet be taught to obey and respect his parents.

Inculcate ideas of purity, modesty, honesty—and other kindred qualities of character—into the mind of the child, especially the boy; provide him with clean, wholesome literature; select his playmates; give him a sufficient amount of constructive work, play and exercise, and then your "boy problem" will certainly be nearer a sane solution. Of course, the same applies to a girl, but I have placed so much stress upon the training of the boy because so many boys just "grow up" without scarcely any training at all. So many parents seem to think because he is "just a boy" he doesn't require so much care and attention as a girl.

True, even though many parents do their part in training their children, the child often steps from the path of rectitude, but that is because all parents do not do their part; or because the child is influenced, in the wrong way, by others, or because some children have inherited an immoral or criminal nature. Nevertheless, we can certainly improve the human race by the proper training in childhood.

Sincerely, ROY R. SMITH.

VERMONT.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

May I enter your circle? Many years ago I did and I still feel that I know you all.

Heartbroken Wife, I have been through this heartbreaking sorrow and while what I am going to say may sound unreasonable it is true nevertheless. Nearly every man, after he has been married for some time, thinks he falls in love with another woman, but it is seldom more than an infatuation or some charm about the other woman that appeals to him. I am speaking from experience. A while ago a woman came to this town and soon she and my husband were great friends. Their names were mentioned together and finally a would-be friend called me on the 'phone and asked if I knew my husband called on Mrs. ——— every evening. I told an untruth to the woman (but I am not sorry I did), that I knew where my husband was and that we enjoyed Mrs. ——— very much and were quite congenial in our triangular friendship. Then I made friends with her to see what charm had attracted my husband. It was a simple little thing—she never talked of herself but was always ready to listen to his side of the story. It was just a sweet, sympathetic disposition. After that I tried to do the same and almost without his knowing it he stayed home more and talked more to me and finally forgot all about his little love episode with another woman. I don't think leaving a husband forever or for any time helps. He needs you now more than ever. But find what power this other woman has over him and use it yourself. There are many men unkind to their wives; if you have a kind husband, keep him. A.

When drawing threads from linen, rub soap on the cloth and the work will be accomplished more easily.

Before working in the garden or doing other rough work, rub under and around the finger-nails with soap. This will prevent the soil or dirt from getting under the nails and when the hands are washed the soap comes off, taking the dirt with it.—MRS. MARY FLOYD, Brainerd, Minn.

When making lemonade, run the lemon through the food chopper and the juice will be so strong that it will go twice as far and have a better flavor.

If you plunge fish in boiling water, you will be surprised to see how quickly the scales will come off.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address, The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. R. C., Avondale, Mont.—For the "dull headache," take a teaspoonful of Warburg's tincture, well diluted, after meals.

MRS. J. E. B., Bluff Springs, Fla.—The continual trembling or shaking of your hand is paralysis agitans. Take five-grain tablets of bromide of sodium after meals. This condition is not dangerous, but persistent and very annoying.

MRS. L. L. W., Jefferson, Mo.—Have the bleeding vein cauterized. The cause of your nose-bleeding is due to a weak or exposed blood-vessel.

MRS. C. A. S., Boyd, Mont.—If the case is one of genuine tuberculosis, contact, clothes, etc., are all to be avoided.

MRS. J. H. L., Porter, Minn.—Cut out sweets of all kinds from your diet and exercise in the open. You may be living on too rich foods. One cannot live very long with the percentage of sugar in the urine you mention, especially if the person is young.

MISS E. D., Scott City, Kansas.—For the hay-fever with which you are troubled take a teaspoonful of pertussin, well diluted, after meals. To correct the hyper-acidity of her stomach your mother should take ten-grain tablet of bicarbonate of soda after meals, and avoid all foods that disagree with her, and eat in moderation. Your sister can take, for four days, before the expected period, a teaspoonful of Jamaica Dogwood well diluted to increase menstrual flow.

MRS. M. J., Alto, Mich.—Dobell's solution can be compounded by any druggist worthy the name, and so can Basham's mixture. Look up another druggist and have them compounded.

MISS M. H., Covington, Okla.—For the scaly eruption on the scalp, soak the scalp with linseed oil over night and then wash out the oil with some tar soap and after the hair is dry apply to the scalp a two per cent. solution of resorcin in equal parts of alcohol and rose-water.

MRS. J. W. S., Knott, Tex.—Oleo-resin of aspidium is the remedy for tapeworm. Take for the constipation a compound cathartic pill at night.

MISS R. S., West Plains, Mo.—The only way to be sure as to the kidney condition is to have the urine examined at once. If Bright's disease is present, your daughter should live almost exclusively on a milk diet and take some good iron tonic, such as Basham's mixture, in tablespoonful doses, well diluted, after meals.

MRS. P. B. B., Bevegan, N. C.—For the constipation take a tablespoonful of American Oil with your meals and at bedtime take two or more cascara sagrada pills. Also eat bran bread and plenty of fruit.

MRS. L. R. W., Clarkton, N. C.—Take two cascara sagrada pills at night and, with your meals, take a tablespoonful of American Oil. Also live on green vegetables and fruits.

MRS. M. G., Lima, Ohio.—You should avoid the crackers and the peanut brittle, as both add to your weight. To reduce your weight, try living on one quart of skim-milk every other day and, on the alternate days, eat only green vegetables. Also exercise daily in the open.

MRS. L. W., Knowlshurst, N. Y.—You can get tincture of benzoin at any drug store worthy the name. If the druggist does not have it in stock have him write to any wholesale druggist and get it for you.

MR. D. D. C., Munnulin, Ga.—Varicose veins have no relation to cancer in any sense. Get a woven bandage long enough to completely cover the leg from the foot to the upper thigh. If the veins are too large, and do not benefit from this method, have them operated on.

MRS. E. M., Lucerne, North Dak.—High blood pressure can only be detected by having the blood pressure taken in the usual way by your local doctor. The symptoms are vertigo, fullness of head and, in some cases, defective vision with head noises. Causes are mostly those due to excessive eating of sweets and those foods that make for rheumatic conditions.

MRS. J. McM., Beaver Dam, Ky.—Try a teaspoonful of Warburg's tincture, well diluted, after meals. You seem to have a chronic malarial condition.

MRS. S. N., Mt. Morris, N. Y.—For tapeworm, have your doctor prescribe for you oleo-resin aspidium, and also tell you about dieting before taking this remedy, and also about taking a cathartic after taking the remedy.

MRS. W. S., Lucca, N. D.—Constipation is not hereditary. Insanity is. Mumps will not cause sterility, even if it descends to the testicles. Abscesses of any membrane can be cured without permanent injury.

MR. A. J., Powderville, Mont.—The hard ball in the lid is known as a chalazion. It must be removed by operation. You probably need glasses for eye strain. You may apply to the lids at night a one per cent. ointment of yellow oxide of mercury.

MISS M. M. M., Mount Vernon, Ohio.—Apply to the eyelids at night a one-half per cent. ointment of yellow oxide of mercury; you can also remove the hair trouble by using on the scabs on the scalp the same ointment, but you must not use the ointment more often than once in two weeks. After using the ointment, wash the hair with some good tar soap and apply, after the shampoo, a one per cent. solution of resorcin dissolved in equal parts of water and alcohol.

MRS. M. D., Los Angeles, Calif.—Just write the suppository people as per ad. in COMFORT, and you will get the remedy referred to, no doubt.

MRS. C. B., Pocahontas, Va.—Have the tonsils removed as recommended by your local doctors. You will be benefited in every way by this operation.

MRS. B. B., Bowus, Minn.—Ichthyol ointment does not cause any pain in any case and it is the best ointment for varicose ulcers, if inflamed. Continue the ointment and bandage the legs with an elastic bandage during the day and remove the bandage at night.

MRS. L. T., Stern, North Carolina.—For the neuritis, take a teaspoonful of Warburg's tincture after meals, well diluted.

MRS. I. W., McRoberts, Ky.—You better take a good tonic such as Basham's mixture, in tablespoonful doses, after meals. This will help your blood pressure and also your general condition. Normal blood pressure is about one hundred and forty for one of your age.

MISS F. M. B., Lock, Wash.—The problem of intermarriage of blood relations has been a mooted question. Some cases turn out well, and others not so well. As a rule, it is not advisable to marry a near relative, but circumstances supervene at times that seem to warrant such a union. In your case it will probably be all right, as you say there are reasons for the marriage. Your health will undoubtedly improve after marriage in every way.

MR. L. A. H., Prosser, Wash.—Soak the toe-nails in a saturated solution of Rochelle salts which will soften them so that you can cut the nails as desired.

MISS L. A. T., Kaycee, Wyoming.—Apply, to the goiter, once a week, tincture of iodine and take, internally, five drops of a saturated solution of the iodide of potassium, well diluted, after meals. You can gradually increase the dose of the iodide until you take thirty drops three times a day. Then you should return to the original dose.

Antique Wall Clock

Hand Colored Face

Reward No. 8194.

For A Club Of Four

If you like things unique, you will be charmed with this novelty clock which is very similar in design to those used in some parts of Europe in the Eighteenth Century.

As shown in our illustration, which is greatly reduced in size, the face of the clock consists of a beautiful landscape hand painted in four colors, beneath which is a metal dial with large, easily-read figures. Then there are the brass chains and weights and brass pendulum with regulator which give the clock that antique appearance so much in demand nowadays.

This clock is useful as well as ornamental, being an excellent timekeeper. It has a fully guaranteed brass movement, key wind, in a polished nickel case. This movement is regulated by the disk on the pendulum which is easily adjusted to make the clock run faster or slower as desired. A hanger attached to the back of the clock enables one to hang it on any desirable location on the wall.

We were so sure that our club raisers would be pleased with this clock we had a large quantity imported for us at a special low price. We are now giving them away free on the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this unique novelty clock exactly as illustrated and described free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8194.

Worm Capsules for Horses

THE newest and it is said the most successful treatment for worms of the horse is to administer oil of chenopodium (American wormseed) in gelatine capsules. The horse is first starved for 18 to 24 hours; then the veterinarian administers 15 to 20 "mils" of the drug mentioned. A "mil" amounts to 16 drops and a dram to 60 drops, so one can calculate the dose in measures more commonly understood by the farmer. The 15 mil dose amounts to 240 drops, or four drams, or half an ounce, and the 20 mil dose to 320 drops, or five and one-third drams. Oil of chenopodium is strong stuff and therefore has to be given in a capsule or in oil. The capsule is the handiest method of administration but the amateur will have to give it by means of a balling gun. The expert gives it by hand, protected by a glove. The dose of chenopodium is at once followed by a quart to a quart and one-half of pure raw linseed oil. Colts take from 10 to 15 mils of the drug and it has even been given to a pregnant mare without causing ill effects. This treatment will remove all sorts of worms from the horse, but it is not considered effective for bots in the stomach. To dislodge those parasites the modern and only effective treatment is to give bisulphid of carbon in capsules. One bran mash or more is given, without hay; then the veterinarian gives a gelatin capsule containing aloin or an ordinary dose of Barbadoes aloes to clear the bowels. When the physic has ceased to operate he gives at 6 A. M., in a gelatin capsule, two or, at the most, three drams of bisulphid of carbon and repeats the dose at 7 and 8 A. M. This is for an adult horse. Give a yearling half as much bisulphid. Treatment with the capsules mentioned may be repeated in two weeks if thought necessary.

BLACK TEETH.—Will you put this in COMFORT for Mrs. A. M. T.? Do you examine your hog's mouth? I have often found black teeth when they won't eat. They get black teeth sometimes from eating corn. Get some one to pull them out and they will go to eating. O. W. C.

A.—It has been proved at all agricultural experiment stations that the black color of the teeth in little pigs has no special significance, but as such teeth often are very sharp and lacerate the sow's teats or the mouths and faces of the pigs, it is therefore well to snip them off at birth provided it can be done without bruising or lacerating the gums.

POLL EVIL.—I have a horse that has poll evil on his head. I would like to know what is good for it. E. G.

A.—If pus is discharging from pipes or sinuses in a bunch or abscess behind and between the ears, constituting a "poll evil," it will be necessary to have a qualified surgeon open up the cavities and pipes to secure free drainage for pus and at the same time cut out dead or diseased cartilage or other tissue. It would be very dangerous for one not acquainted with the anatomy of the part to attempt such cutting. Meanwhile syringe out the openings once daily with a solution of one dram of chlorid of zinc and one ounce of sulphate of zinc and one pint of soft water. Clip off the hair and apply a blister if the bunch has not opened to discharge pus.

SCOURS.—My pig, six months old, ate heartily and did fine until a month ago when it took the scours and grew stiff in its limbs. I have given liniment and stock powders but they didn't do any good. I feed corn bread, mush and buttermilk. A remedy will be appreciated. G. McG.

A.—Do not give liniment to animals. It is for external use only. If directed for internal use it is not a true liniment. Neither should stock powders be used. If an animal is sick it should be given medicine for the ailment present. Animals that are not sick should not be given medicine of any kind. Feed the pig milk containing an ounce of lime-water per pint. Gradually add wheat middlings. If scouring persists, give 20 grains of subnitrate of bismuth two or three times daily in any way found most convenient.

DISEASED COWS.—I have had three cows, one about two years ago, another one year ago and one recently, after freshening their breath came hard. The first two came all right. The last one died in three days. She ate everything that was given her. P. H. S.

A.—There can be little question that the cows have tuberculosis which is incurable. To find out you should have each of them tested with tuberculin. The milk of an affected cow is dangerous for use by persons or animals. A swallowed nail, wire or other sharp object penetrating the wall of the second stomach, diaphragm and sac of the heart might cause similar symptoms. That, too, is incurable. We are taking it for granted, of course, that the cows were not choked with feed.

SORE FEET.—My dog has had sore feet for nearly one year. Lumps form between the toes then they break, discharging, and look as though they had been scalded. J. H. D.

A.—Twice daily immerse the feet for five minutes or more in hot water containing all the boric acid it will dissolve, then dry gently and apply compound sulphur ointment. If that does not suffice, apply a mixture of one part of compound tincture of benzoin and three parts of glycerine after the immersion. A mixture of one part of balsam of Peru and three of alcohol is also healing in such cases. Boots of light leather or strong duck or canvas may be put on the feet if the dog is used for hunting.

SHRINK IN MILK.—My cow is in good condition and gives about three gallons of milk a day. She is going dry in one teat. She has plenty of feed such as shorts, bran chop and hay, also runs on pasture. She is milked regularly twice a day. MRS. M. S.

A.—It usually proves impossible to stop such a quarter from becoming permanently dry. Germ infection and garget cause the condition. Try the effects of milking and massaging that quarter every two hours and in the evening rubbing in warm melted unsalted lard or sweet oil.

SICK HOGS.—Please tell me what is the matter with my hogs. They won't eat and seem short of breath. Their sides thump and they lie around for days. Some have a swollen foot—the leg that is affected is furred up and the hoofs come off. Before dying, the nose turns a purplish red nearly to the eyes. I have fed bran, also ground oats and corn. Please tell me what to do. MRS. L. R.

A.—Always screen ground oats to remove hulls if it is to be fed to pigs; also make bran a very small part of the ration. Allow remaining pigs clean colony houses and let them graze a succession of green crops and also feed mixed meals including digestor tankage from a self-feeder. Keep them absolutely away from old hog houses, yards, wallows and other places polluted by adult swine. Filth and the germs it contains cause most of the symptoms described but swine plague may be present and should be vaccinated against by the veterinarian. The symptoms are similar to those of cholera, but vaccination is not so effective as for cholera. Cleanse, disinfect and whitewash the old hog houses. Plow, crop and seed down the old hog yards, lots and pastures.

DEATH OF COW.—Can you tell me what caused the death of my cow affected as follows: She was as well as usual at milking time in the morning, but at night was not able to get up and died before midnight. Lying on her side, she would almost go into convulsions, pawing the air and bellowing. Raising her off her side, she would become easier. There were no other symptoms. The veterinarian thought it was milk fever. She had been fresh one month and there was no swelling in the udder. F. K.

A.—Milk fever sometimes occurs a month after freshening but that is rare. Still, it would have been well to have inflated the udder with air as is done to cure milk fever. We think it much more likely that the cow was attacked by hemorrhagic septicemia for which there is no successful remedy, but it may be prevented by hypodermic injection of a special bacterin with a fair degree of success. Bloody froth issues from the nose or mouth after death, and sometimes from other natural openings of the body, when hemorrhagic septicemia has been present. That also happens after death from anthrax. Again consult the local graduate veterinarian about the matter. It may be added that heart disease caused by a swallowed sharp object may also cause such a sudden death.

STUDYING VETERINARY SCIENCE.—Please send me your terms on veterinary schooling as I am going to study veterinary. J. M.

A.—In order to obtain a veterinary diploma from a recognized veterinary college you will have to attend such an institution for four sessions of nine months each and pass all examinations. The entrance requirement is graduation from a high school or the equal of a similar course of instruction in some other recognized school. Particulars regarding fees, etc., may be learned by writing to the various veterinary colleges. A list of accredited veterinary schools may be had on application to the Bureau of Animal Industry of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Comfort's League of Cousins

in the air your time has not been lost; that is where they should be. Now put the foundations under them."

For the young to learn to write, Helen, is largely a matter of practice. Hawthorne locked himself in a lonely room at Salem and plugged away with pen and ink. Stevenson tells us how long he played "the sedulous ape" to various authors before he stepped forth to fame himself. You will be helped, Helen, by continual and omnivorous reading which will furnish you a background of thought, of vicarious experience and a vocabulary. When you read, strive to keep to the best—that best which has received the verdict of time. There are many good books on journalism which you can find on the shelves of any large library. Read these and put your precepts into practice. But do not spend all your time on reading. Write articles for your home paper and those in nearby towns. Get jobs of reporting local social events and other happenings of news interest. Write as much, as often and as well as you can—and all the time your dream may be coming truer and truer.

OAKDALE, TENNESSEE.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

If you will turn your face this way a minute, I think I can get by Billy. I do not know what I will look like when I come out on the other side, but I'll assure you that Bill will have to be going some if he heads me off. I think Billy is like one of your New England senators: he wants to chew up everything that comes along. I believe he would devour the Peace Treaty if it should fall into your hands.

I visited in New England a few summers ago. One of your leading intellects said of her senator: "I think he is an old fossil!" I don't think it is nice of New England people to talk so about one another. While I was in Boston the police went out on strike. And just between you, Billy and the writer, I don't believe that all the inhabitants in that neck of the woods are "little angels" by any means. I have heard that education would solve all problems. By the eternal! it didn't solve them in Boston, the intellectual hub of the universe. And I returned to my home in the Tennessee mountains, where you find Nature in her wildest dress and most romantic mood, feeling that we have about as good a country as the sun ever shone upon—"Sunny Tennessee." And here in the mountains we are several hundred feet above the Troubles of the World.

Truly yours, JAMES BURTON.

I agree with you, Cousin James, that there is no place like a mountain top from which to look serenely down upon the Troubles of the World. Petty details are blended into the valued landscape, and the wide outlook helps to wide views both in front of the eyes and behind them. You are fortunate to be able to look forth from your eyrie in Sunny Tennessee and contemplate the troubles of Boston. I'm sorry, James, that you were discouraged by Boston in your little journey into New England; but you are not the first to be worried by present conditions and by the things that go on right under the shadow of the State House's Golden Dome surmounted by the Sacred Codfish. One of our magazines has been publishing articles entitled, "What is the Matter with Boston?" and other investigators, both American and European, have rushed into print crying that the old New England is no more. Ancient Puritan stock and traditions are said to have become swallowed up in the rising flood of the New World generations that have been brought into New England to serve overlords of loom and spindle, and the sons and daughters of these overlords are often those who now cry, "Americanization, or we perish!" Bristol, R. I., one of the oldest of New England's seaports, once beautiful with century-old homes looking out on Narragansett Bay, has now a population of about ten thousand, some six thousand of whom are Italian and Portuguese. This is a typical condition of what industrial wealth made in New England has brought in the way of shifting populations and living standards. Perhaps you are more lucky than you know, James, when no whir of spindles and no sound of mill whistles come up to echo among your mountain gaps and coves.

I am glad you did not go into details about exactly which New England senator was in danger of becoming a geological specimen, James. Such things have been known to happen, but when known, it is best to keep the sad occurrence a dark, stony secret. The trouble with the fossilizing process is that it starts within and works out. It can go on for some time without being evident on the surface, except to a discerning eye. However, if you fellows in the South keep on sending up lively-mannered legislators to Washington, perhaps things can be kept moving fast enough so that any senatorial petrification can be slowed up, if not entirely stopped.

As to education, James; don't let anyone fool you by saying it can solve all problems. Not our present higher education, at least. Some one has wisely hinted that to be "cultivated" is another name for having become irritated, and there is more in this than a clever remark. Our higher education today—the institutions from which we look to get men to strive with our higher human problems—are not particularly interested in turning out the men that our human difficulties demand, but rather in sending for those who can fit the most successfully into the peculiarly organized society of which our higher educational system is a product and part. The heart has always to use what the brain has been taught, and it is the thinking which is done in the heart that makes the man. We fool ourselves a lot, James, as we juggle such terms as education and progress; but the men who have brought what has meant the most for humanity into the world have never been themselves products of highly-organized educational systems. And they have generally been sufferers under, or martyrs of, what the world of their day has chosen to call "progress." James, I am sure you have a lot of time to think about these and other things, as you sit up among the sunny mountains of Tennessee and gaze, with an expansive smile, upon the fossils rising up from the landscape to the northward.

BELT, BOX 236, MONTANA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I thought I would write you a few lines explaining the West. I am twelve years old and in the eighth grade; I hope to finish school this year. It is a stormy month here now and the weather is very cold. The mountains are about a mile away from us. I trap wild animals and snare and hunt rabbits. I can ride horses and get the cows from pasture. I live on a farm of four hundred acres. I have a pet horse. It is quite small and it is tamer for me than for any one else. I have had a lot of experience with wild animals. I will tell you one: One time when I went to look at my traps, there was a large wildcat in one of them. I shot once at it from quite a distance, but the bullet went through the hip and it didn't die. Then I sent another shot which hit on the neck, and the wildcat fell on its nose. But when I came up to look at the trap, it jumped at me and nearly caught me by the foot. I had to spring quickly aside, and I fell right on some porcupine quills. Then I got up again and shot it through the head. I had a hard time getting it home because it was so heavy.

If Billy the Goat is close by, don't show this letter to him, please. I will close now.

Your loving nephew, MATT KOSKILA.

I am not sure if I quite like the way you have of "explaining the West," Matt. As you tell about it, the West seems to be a place altogether too full of wildcats for my quiet tastes. Our tame Brooklyn cats are bad enough and the city government, alas, will not allow Bill and me to set any traps on the backyard fences from where we get nightly serenades. There is one tortoise-shell soprano who can do warblings sunshine by mail. Miss Rosa Watts, care of Rosa Eller, McAdenville, N. C. An orphan girl stricken with a serious disease. Described by those who know her as "a true object of charity." Aid of any sort will be welcomed. W. B. Balew, Sparta, Tenn. Second-hand clothing or money will help this man, himself an invalid and partial shut-in, and with a sick wife on his almost useless hands. Miss Margaret Bowen, Tomahawk, Ky. Completely blind, and without parents to comfort and aid her. This is a case that is pitiful indeed. Walker Turner, Ft. Wayne, Ala. This is a crippled boy who sends a happy letter of gratitude for the flood of postcards and letters of cheer sent him by members of our League. Good work, cousins!

Longer than usual this month is the list of those who need so sorely the aid our League generously gives to its unfortunate members. Give them the boosts of cheer and dimes, of happiness and greenbacks, that will make their lot a little easier for a time at least. The light that we can shed in the darkest places is the best light of all. With your hearts as warm and open as the summer sun, cousins, help these shadowed lives to carry on.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C." a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

R. A., Gould, Okla.—The address of the headquarters of the Girl Scouts, Inc., is 189 Lexington Avenue, New York City.

R. L. A., Roanoke Rapids, N. C.—There is a difference in the cubic capacity of a dry and a liquid quart. What this is you can note for yourself by filling a dry quart measure level full of beans and then attempting to put these into a liquid quart. You will find the beans will considerably more than fill the liquid measure. Many people, like yourself, are ignorant of this difference and often accept cranberries, beans, and other dry commodities which have been incorrectly measured in tin liquid measures. The use of a tin liquid measure for such dry commodities is now illegal in most communities.

H. W., Kevil, Ky.—The National Headquarters of the Boy Scouts of America are at 200 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

P. A., Brush Creek, Tenn.—Write to the U. S. Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C., and ask that particulars be sent you of such positions as are open in the U. S. Forestry Service and in the National Parks.

I. A. U., North, S. C—In the millinery trade positions for "learners" and apprentices are frequently open in the big and little shops of the larger cities. If you already have some experience in the trade, there is no reason why you might not obtain one of these jobs, although it would mean that you would have to move to a city and make direct personal application for work. No girl should leave her home and move to a city with the intention of supporting herself there, unless she has friends or relatives in the city who can help her to "get her bearings" and aid her by hints and instructions in her new surroundings. She should also have a sufficient sum of money to care for her support until she has succeeded in gaining work. City living is fiercely competitive and there are always many eager hands reaching for every job offered.

Miss R. E. B., Oakland, Me.—Your dimes of various dates are worth no more than their face value. A silver three-cent piece of 1872 would be valued at from twenty to forty cents according to condition. Three-cent pieces command a premium in the price-lists of all coin dealers—some of whom are COMFORT advertisers. Write to them about your coins.

R. K. W., Franklin, N. C.—There are several large and good correspondence schools in this country, all of which offer courses in electricity. We believe you might gain a good knowledge of the subject, particularly the theoretical work, from one of these courses. We would not care to make any recommendation of any particular school, and this would require an expert comparison of the matter of the home study courses offered. (2) The Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Mass., and the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Troy, N. Y., are perhaps the two best-known schools of their class in the country. You have a mechanical school in your own state at West Raleigh.

J. C., Trenton, Tenn.—There is no article of mystery and magic which will "find hidden treasure," and so we cannot give you the name of any firm that could supply you with such a remarkable product. We have stated this fact many times in this column. If such "rods" or "needles" are offered for sale, it is only with the object of deluding foolish buyers who have not yet found out that there is no short cut to wealth or treasure, and that the road of thrift and industry is the surest and safest path to riches.

J. J., Roberts, Mont.—While the raising of such fur-bearing animals as silver foxes and skunks is profitable when successful, the successful ones in this modern form of livestock raising are few. You would be interested in reading Farmers' Bulletin No. 587. You can obtain this from the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

In the central place of our hearts is a wireless station. So long as we receive messages of beauty, hope, courage and power from God and from our fellow-men, we may know the current comes clear.

For a Club of Four

BEADWORK is all the rage again. And here is a wonderful yet simple Bead Loom with which any woman or girl can take up this fascinating work at home and easily make the handsomest bags, chains, necklaces, purses, bracelets, belts, collars and cuffs, dress trimmings, shirtwaist sets, slippers, watch cases, fob chains, card cases, pocketbooks,—in fact there is no limit to the number and variety of exquisitely colored bead work articles that can be woven on this Loom.

Anybody can use the "Kanibas" Bead Loom—it is very easy to understand as everything is fully explained in the instruction book sent with the outfit.

Everything you need to work with is included free with the Loom, so you can begin making the articles at once.

In the outfit you will receive one "Kanibas" Bead Loom, five packages of beads in assorted colors of black, white, blue, green, pink, etc., one dozen special bead needles (very long and slender with an unusually long eye), one spool of specially prepared waxed bead thread, and a 44-page instruction book containing more than seventy-five photographs and designs of popular bead work, together with easy, detailed instructions on just what color of beads to use and how to work them.

This book shows how to make different styles of bags, chains, necklaces, purses, belts, collars and cuffs, shirtwaist sets, slippers, watch cases, fob chains, card cases, pocketbooks, dress trimmings, any letter in the alphabet, any numeral, etc., etc.,—giving full directions for all designs. The popular secret order emblems can be worked with great effect in beads for fob chains, bracelets, card cases, etc., and this book illustrates designs for Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Knights of Columbus, Elks, Royal Arcanum, also Christian Endeavor, Epworth League and others.

Any woman or girl will be delighted with this practical Loom Outfit because she can make so many pretty things not only for her own use but to give away as presents and to sell. While the beads themselves cost but little, the finished work brings a high price so that there are big profits in the business, if one desires to sell the articles after they are made.

Special Club Offer. For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the "Kanibas" Bead Loom and Outfit free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 8234.

and trills in a manner that convinces me she must be a prima donna in the Brooklyn Cat Opera Company, and she is always willing to grant any number of encores. But I'm hoping that all of the West is not so full of ferocious felines whose motto is "Never say die," and that it is because you live in the wildcat belt, Matt, that nine-lived and bullet-proof mountain pussies are so numerous.

Matt, you are polishing off school in quick shape by finishing up lessons when you are only twelve years old. You must be a good knowledge trapper, too. But why not keep at this game of capturing wisdom a few winters more? The best open season for knowledge is when one is young, Matt. The mind's steel springs are strong and quick then, and you can sell at a good price in later years all the knowledge-pelts you are able to tack up on your brain walls during these trapping days. My advice is not to hang up your traps yet; there are too many years ahead of you in which they might grow dull and rusty. Keep 'em shining and active for a few years more, Matt, old boy.

Your little pet horse, Matt, who is tamer for you than for anyone else, is something like Billy in this. For Bill is quite tame to me, while he might act like a genuine Montana wildcat when some cousin sends in letter written in pencil and with six misspelled words to the square inch. No trap could hold Bill then! You wrote a good letter, Matt, but you did spell one word in a very funny way. I corrected this and did not show it to Billy. For if I had, Matthew, all your experience as a trapper and animal tamer would have been useless. Your letter would have vanished between Bill's steel jaws and been torn to shreds by his sharp pivot tooth.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for July

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Mrs. Warren B. Woodruff, Delaware, R. R. 2, Ohio. Asks financial aid that will enable her to secure proper treatment for her two-year-old crippled son. Well recommended. A genuine chance for greenbacks to get in good work. W. S. Roberts, Indiana, R. R. 6, Box 16, Pa. Long a helpless shut-in with no means of support. Often lacks even food. Mrs. Mathilda Higgins, care of Mrs. M. V. Hartman, North Branch Depot, Somerset Co., N. J. A shut-in of seventy-six years of age. Asks for a postcard shower of cheer. This is easy, cousins. Get out your fountain pens. Mrs. Rosella Daniels, Lassiter, N. C. Has but one arm to support three children of nine to fourteen years. A dime shower will give her real help and renewed strength in her struggle with poverty. Miss Dilly F. Dolan, Endicott, Va. Her mother asks for cards, picture books or quilt scraps to cheer the lonely hours of this invalid girl. Money is not asked. Jesse Trotter, Rockwood, R. R. 3, Tenn. Send a shower of dimes to this orphan boy of fourteen who has lost his right leg above the knee—and add a word of cheer. Mrs. Mary J. Overby, Brooklyn, Md. Has a paralytic husband and four children to support. Surely aid is needed here. E. D. Beard, Charles City, Iowa. A boy of fourteen who has been an invalid for eleven years. Send him some

Three Wheel Chairs in June

646 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The three June wheel chairs go to Amy Belle Singer, Union Bridge, Md., 163; Claude Wilson, Vanceboro, N. C., 80; Dwight T. Crow, Jamestown, Ala., 74. The figures following their respective names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Amy Belle Singer, age 14, for three years past has been and still is crippled by severe pain and swelling of the joints to a degree that renders her almost helpless in all ways. She is suffering from a spinal trouble and these distressing symptoms accompany it in her case. Her mother writes that the much needed wheel chair will be a great help in caring for this unfortunate girl.

Claude Wilson, age 28, is so crippled that for nine years past he has not been able to walk; before that he could get about on crutches, but now is almost helpless.

Dwight T. Crow, age 7, has been an almost helpless invalid from birth. His head is too large and his limbs undersize and weak. Until three years old he could not hold his head up, but since then has been getting better and his limbs are slowly developing. The wheel chair will be a source of joy to him and a great help to his parents in caring for him, and I hope it will be instrumental in improving his health.

Don't relax your efforts in behalf of our Wheel-Chair Club during the hot season. Bear in mind that, if the weather is too warm for your comfort, the heat must be oppressive to the crippled shutins who are suffering for the open air because they are in need of a wheel chair.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Surely Enjoys Her Comfort Wheel Chair

Pine Grove, Ohio.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I take pleasure in writing you to let you know that I am still able to enjoy my COMFORT wheel chair, and here is my picture after so long a wait for it. I surely do enjoy my wheel chair and feel that I could not do without it. I thank you for your kindness in helping me to get it. I love to read COMFORT and have been a constant reader of it for many years. I surely admired Uncle Charlie for his fine Christian character and the great good that he did. I trust that God will bless you in your good work, and that some day we shall all meet on the other shore where the troubles of this life will be over.

Sincerely,

Mary A. Layne.

Wedding Rings

In Norway marriage customs are very peculiar. As soon as a young man and woman are engaged betrothal rings are exchanged. These rings are worn ever afterwards, by the men as well as the women, consequently you can always tell a married man, or at least an engaged man, in Norway, in the same way you can tell a married woman in England. Another feature is that as soon as a man is engaged he has calling cards printed with the name of his fiancee immediately beneath his own.

In Russia the bride wears her engagement ring on the third finger of her right hand, instead of on the left, as we do. She will also wear her marriage ring there.

The German women, according to the custom of their native land, wear a ring on the third finger of their right hand.

The brides and wives of Switzerland wear a ring on the third finger of the left hand, but if overtaken by widowhood the ring is exchanged to the right hand.

During her engagement the Swiss bride, to be, wears the wedding ring with a jeweled ring under it, after the wedding ceremony the wedding ring is placed underneath. The married man in Switzerland is required by custom to wear a wedding ring.

Some Profiteer

Mrs. Schoppen—"I want five pounds of sugar, please."

Grocer—"Yes'm; anything else?"

"No, that's all; I'll take it with me if the package isn't too heavy."

"Oh! it'll only weigh three or four pounds, ma'am."—Philadelphia Press.

Resented Impertinence

Mike went to the telephone—"Is this Miller & Jones?"

"Yes."

"Well, you send up six bags of oats, and hurry up with 'um."

"All right; who are they for?"

"Arrah, now, don't you get gay; for the horses, to be sure," and Mike rang off.—Exchange.

An Apt Answer

"Water," said the temperance orator, "is nature's own beverage. It comes to us from the clouds. If, instead of water, it were to rain beer——"

"You would be too full for utterance," interrupted a voice from the gallery."—Chicago News.

Deaf to the Answer

A woman of ample proportions was giving a lecture on the human form divine. Her manner was of the type familiarly known as "highbrow;" it was, in fact, irritatingly supercilious and lofty.

"For example," said she, "twice round my thumb"—she held it up—"once round my wrist; twice round my wrist, once round my neck; twice round my neck, once round my waist."

Here she paused, and a shrill voice from the audience exclaimed:

"Twice round your waist, once round Hyde park."

The lecturer hastily passed on to another branch of the subject.—London Tid-Bits.

Why Not?

"Papa," said Tommy Tredway.

"Now, Tommy," replied Mr. Tredway, I shall answer only one more question today. So be careful what you ask."

"Yes, papa."

"Well, go on."

"Why don't they bury the Dead Sea?"—Household Words.

Had Set Her Cap

Ada—"Why does Alice speak of Tom as her intended? Are they engaged?"

Beatrice—"No; but she intends they shall be."—Tid-Bits.

Too Competent

The warden had just received the new prisoner.

"If you are skilled in some particular pursuit," he said, "we shall be glad to let you follow it here."

"Thank you very much, sir," said the prisoner. "I'm an aviator."—Cotton Yarns.

Puzzled Indeed

First Tramp (in the road)—"Why don't you go in? The dog's all right. Don't you see him waggin' his tail?"

Second Tramp—"Yes, and he's growlin' at the same time. I dunno which end to believe."—Tid-Bits.

Undoubtedly

Young Student, in higher school for girls, to teacher (saucily).—"Is it true, professor, that your father started in as goose shepherd?"

Professor (quietly).—"Very true, little miss; my ancestral heritage has particularly qualified me to handle geese."

Cubby Bear's Fourth of July

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

DR. Squilly Porcupine had been called to the West Forest to see Bob Catt, who had a carbuncle on his left hind paw. Squilly had washed, and lanced, and bandaged it, and was washing his paws, getting ready to go home again.

"Dear me, dear me!" groaned Bob Catt. "A carbuncle is a very painful thing, I can tell you! For four nights I have hardly slept at all!"

"Did you see any colored stars flying around last night, while the pain kept you awake?" asked Squilly.

"There were no stars to be seen at all, for the night was cloudy," answered Bob Catt; "but there were fireflies dancing all around."

"No, no!" said Squilly Porcupine. "I mean Fourth of July stars."

"I never heard of such a thing!" said Bob Catt. "Stop a while, and tell me about it."

"Yes, I will tell you the whole story," agreed Squilly, and sat down on a mossy log. "Just before you sent for me this morning," he began, "I was at Mamma Bruin's house, to see Cubby Bear. But that is not where my story commences, so I will start with the night before last. Some of us were out enjoying the beautiful summer evening, when Wollie Woodchuck came hurrying along, on his way home from the farmer's garden. He was terribly upset with fright, and his heart palpitated strangely.

"He told us of wonderful doings in the farmhouse dooryard—flashes of fire, loud explosions, lights sailing up high in the air, some of them bursting and sending down red, and blue, and yellow stars. Wollie was afraid they would fall on him, and ran all the way home.

"Of course we were all talking about it—some believed what Wollie said, and some did not. Then, yesterday morning, Shinyblack Crow told the same story. Furthermore, Shinyblack Crow had made an early morning trip to the farm, where the children were touching lights to some little things which burst with a loud bang! Then he went from there to the village, where he saw great doings.

"'It is the Fourth of July,' he told us.

"'What might that be?' asked Cubby Bear.

"Shinyblack Crow said he did not know exactly, unless it was the day to make all the noise one could. He said he had seen Fourth of July celebrations in other years—crowds of people filling the village streets, bands making loud music, flags of red, white and blue waving, horses frightened and prancing, and noise, noise everywhere!

"'Is it all over?' Billy Bluejay wanted to know.

"'Oh, no, indeed!' Shinyblack Crow told him; 'it will last all day, and far into the night.' Then he told us he had come back to the forest to see if anyone was brave enough to go to the village with him, to see the fun. Redtop Woodpecker, Robbie Reddie and Billy Bluejay all said they would go with him. Little Chirpy Chipmunk was the only animal who ventured to go. 'I am not afraid,' he said. 'I am so quick, I can skip out of anyone's way, and so small, I can hide anywhere.'

"I think we all worried a little about them through the day, but at sunset, back they came, all but Chirpy Chipmunk, who was having too good a time to leave; and what do you think they wanted?"

"I cannot say," answered Bob Catt, with a painful grimace, "but I know what I want, and that is, to be rid of this carbuncle!"

"Have patience," chided Squilly, "and do not whine like a sick kitten. Your paw will soon be well again. Shall I go on with my story?"

"By all means," answered Bob Catt; "what did they want?"

"Well," pursued Dr. Squilly, "Shinyblack Crow said to us: 'We have come back to coax all of you animals to go to the village with us—or as near to the village as you dare to go—and see as much of the fun as you can.'"

"And did you go?" asked Mrs. Bob Catt, who was listening breathlessly.

"Indeed we did," answered Squilly proudly, "all but Bunny Rabbit, who is a most timid creature, and Wollie Woodchuck, who had been too badly frightened the night before. On our way we met little Chirpy Chipmunk, coming slowly along the road.

"'Did you come to meet us?' asked Cubby Bear.

"'No, I did not!' he answered sharply. All the friskiness had gone out of him, and he did not smile once.

"'Are you tired?' I asked him.

"'I am tired, and I am sick!' he said. 'I ate too many peanuts. I kept finding them on the ground, where careless children had dropped them. After eating what I wanted, I shelled some and stuffed my cheeks with them, to carry home, but there were too many, and I didn't want to leave them, so I ate, and ate, till I could eat no more. And now I am going home.'

"Poor little Chirpy!" went on Dr. Squilly Porcupine. "I offered to go back with him, but he said all he wanted was to get home, and get to sleep. So we kept on our way to the village.

"We kept outside the village until after dark—a cloudy night, as you said—then crept through back yards and sheltered places, keeping out of the brightly-lighted streets. But we could hear and see plenty of the celebration. It would have been excitement enough to be so near to such crowds of people, who might, of course, discover some of us at any time—and then there was the fizz, pop, bang! all the time, the loud music, and all the things Shinyblack Crow had told us about.

"But the grandest, loveliest part of all was the shining, bright-colored stars, and the wonderful flashes of fire that went up, up, up in the sky, then scattered and fell. We could not help feeling a little frightened, though we knew it was all for a celebration; but, oh, I could have watched it all night!"

THE RED STICK BURST WITH A TERRIBLE NOISE.

"I wish I might have been there to see it all!" sighed Mrs. Catt.

"It was worth seeing," Dr. Squilly Porcupine told her, "but at last the fun was over, the crowds of people went away, and the streets were quiet. We passed through some of the deserted streets on our way out of the village, and Cubby Bear picked up a pretty little bright red stick which he saw lying on the ground. It had a white string hanging out of one end.

"'I am going to keep it to remember my Fourth of July,' he said.

"The rest of us looked for some, too, but could find only scraps of red paper, all torn and ragged. You have never been to the village, have you?"

"No, oh, no!" answered Bob, with a slight shiver.

"Well, the streets are smooth and level, oh, a beautiful place to play, or to run races, and Shinyblack Crow, who is a daring fellow, said: 'Who will play a game of hopscotch here with me, before we go home?'"

"Of course nobody did?" asked Mrs. Catt.

"We did!" declared Squilly. "That is, most of us did. Oh, it was a grand celebration! All my life, I think I shall laugh aloud when I think how surprised the village people would have been if they had looked out of their windows and seen a group of the forest birds and animals playing hopscotch in their streets, all in the silent night!"

"You might have had a surprise, too!" said Bob Catt.

"Yes," admitted Squilly, "we might. It was beginning to grow light when we got back to the Pleasant Forest. As you know, the days are very long now, and the dawn comes early."

"But you have not told us yet why you were called to see Cubby Bear," said Mrs. Catt. "Did he get sick, too, like Chirpy Chipmunk?"

"I am coming to that," answered Squilly Porcupine. "Cubby Bear went home, and went to bed, but it seemed as if he had been asleep only a few minutes, he told me, when he was awakened by hearing Mamma Bruin in the next room, getting breakfast.

"He went out where she was at work, to tell her all about the celebration. She had a fire, and was cooking flapjacks, to eat with fresh blueberries, for she had spent the Fourth of July berrying. He brought out the little red stick to show her, and somehow it slipped from his paws and fell into the fire.

"Cubby tried to pick it up, out of the fire, but the little white string burned with a hissing sound, and then the red stick burst with a terrible noise!

"Mamma Bruin had stepped back, and was not hurt, though her fur was singed quite a bit. Poor Cubby Bear's paw was badly burned, his nose is blistered, and the fur on his face was partly burned off.

"They sent for me at once. Robbie Reddie was near by, singing his morning song, and he flew swiftly to my house to tell me what had happened. Of course I got there as soon as possible, and did the best I could to make Cubby Bear feel better.

"When the stick exploded, fire and ashes went all over the room. Mamma Bruin was cleaning up the place. No trace had been found of the flapjacks when I came away, though Grandma Bear was searching for them. I think they must have fallen in the fire, and been burned up!

"Cubby will soon be all right again, but he will beware of little red sticks with a short string hanging out of one end if he ever happens to find one lying on the ground again!

"Ah, well, it was a great time, and when the Fourth of July comes next year, I, for one, shall go to the village to celebrate, and so, I am sure, will the others."

"Oh, let us know when the time comes," begged Mr. and Mrs. Bob Catt, "for we want to go with you, too!"

Nations must learn to act as one if civilization is to keep men civilized.
Great men are often known to the public only through a ficticious personality.
To help others best, we must first put down what we hold in our own hands.
Only one thing we need fear, and that is the consequences of our own sins.
We should honor best not those who are achieving, but those who have overcome.
Many people have all the qualities of success except the courage of their convictions.
There are plenty of things in this world that do not matter as much as we think they do.
The body is like a piano and happiness like music; it is needful to have the instrument in good order.
The world is blessed most by those men who do the things, not by those who merely talk about them.
If we read too much we have only the thoughts of others; if we read too little we have only our own.
It is wrong schooling which has for its primary object the fitting of the pupil for taking, not giving.
The world puts on a glory for him who with a fervent heart goes forth under the bright and glorious sky.
All the places that are worth having in life are further up our road than the part of it we may now be traveling.
Life is a great and noble calling, and not a mean and grovelling thing to be gone through carelessly and with haste.
Philosophy is a bully that talks very loud when danger is distant, but when hard pressed by the enemy she gladly leaves the battle's brunt to be borne by her humbler companion religion.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

National Menace in Lawless Spirit that Inspired the Massacre of Non-Union Miners Near Herrin, Illinois

RARELY, if ever, has the country been so horrified as it was by the atrocious massacre of the non-union miners employed at the Southern Illinois Coal Company's mine six miles from Herrin, Illinois, on Thursday, June 22nd. This mine, in which the coal lies so near the surface that it can be uncovered by steam shovels, was being worked by non-union laborers from away under protection of guards brought by the Company from Chicago to prevent interference by the union coal miners who were on strike. Of the mines in that district this was the only one that attempted to operate regardless of the strike, and there had been threats of forcible interference, but the first outbreak of violence was early in the afternoon of Wednesday, June 21st, when strikers ambushed in a clump of trees fired on ten mine guards traveling along the road in a truck and severely wounded three of them before the truck could get out of range. This was the beginning of a riotous uprising of strikers that within a few hours brought together a mob of more than five thousand men bent on attacking the non-union workers at the mine.

In the streets of neighboring mining towns crowds of strikers, incited by the harrangues of impromptu speakers, armed themselves with rifles, shotguns and pistols and started for this mine. At Herrin the mob invaded two hardware stores, bound and gagged the proprietors and clerks and forcibly took and carried away all the weapons, ammunition and explosives found in these establishments. Through that afternoon and the following night a battle was waged between the small force of mine guards posted behind a stockade and the thousands of strikers who surrounded them and from trees and other vantage points on the encircling hills directed against them a ceaseless rain of bullets. It is claimed that the besieged laborers took no part in the fight, but sought such shelter as was available within the works and consequently very few, if any, of them were hurt during the battle. The occupants of the mine lost their food and water supply by the capture of their provision car and the blowing up of the pumping station by the strikers.

As further resistance against such a vastly superior attacking force was hopeless the superintendant of the mine at sunrise ran up a white flag and yielded to the strikers' demands which included immediate surrender and assurance that the Company would cease attempting to operate the mine. The casualties among the strikers had been few—no more than two of them reported killed. The defenders had lost more heavily in the fight, but just how many of them were killed or wounded before they surrendered has not been ascertained because of subsequent occurrences. Thus ended the fighting but not the slaughter which was resumed with a vengeance as soon as the strikers got the helpless objects of their animosity in their power.

Massacred after Surrender

According to the Associated Press reports, the substantial accuracy of which stands unchallenged, more than fifty and maybe sixty mine guards and non-union laborers fell into the hands of the strikers, and after they had been disarmed and securely bound at least nineteen of these helpless prisoners were murdered in cold blood and nearly as many more wounded. The fiendish barbarity that characterized this massacre can hardly be matched outside of Turkey, Mexico and Soviet Russia. The report states that the mine superintendent was the first to be shot and fell dead; the others were tied together in small groups and then rushed off in different directions. Joseph O'Rourke, in the hospital at Herrin, with half-a-dozen bullet holes through his body gave the reporter a vivid description of the bloody work that followed. Mr. O'Rourke said:

"They tied five men with me, took us out on the road and told us to run. We ran and hundreds of bullets followed us. We staggered on, but finally three of our group fell, pulling down the others tied with us, several bullet holes being in me already. I laid there while men came up and fired more shots into us from three or four feet. Then everything went black. I woke up later and begged for water but there was not any. I remember being dragged along the road, but I don't know what by." O'Rourke's story was confirmed by two of the men tied with him, who, though terribly wounded, were still alive; the other three were killed. These were the six found beside the road that morning by the Associated Press reporter who tried to carry water to them, but was not permitted to help them, and he gives the following account of this incident and of other evidences seen by him as indicative of the utter savagery that actuated the mob and appeared to dominate the community:

"Out in a road near the mine, six men tied together, all of them wounded by bullets and blows, lay in a scorching sun, while hundreds of men and women laughed at their pleas for water. One of the men, his face bloody and one shoulder shot away, apparently was within a few moments of death. 'Please boys give me a drink,' he moaned. A laugh from the hundreds of spectators was the only reply. The A. P. reporter rushed to a house for water and when he returned he was faced by a crowd and quickly drawn pistols and told to keep away. When the man begged again for water, 'For God's sake,' a young woman with a baby in her arms placed her foot on the body and said, 'I'll see you in hell before you get any water' The men apparently had been dragged down a rock road behind an automobile. Their clothes were torn and pieces of gravel were imbedded in their flesh." Of other sights that he beheld that Thursday morning he says:

"The scenes of death today were gruesome. Bodies, many with limbs shot away, lay along the roadside or were strung from trees. Men wounded and dying were stretched out on roads and in fields with none of the hundreds of passers-by able to lend a helping hand. Attempts to assist the wounded in the early part of the day brought rebuffs from the spectators, backed in some cases by drawn guns. Later the feeling quieted down and some of the wounded were taken to hospitals." Besides the nineteen dead in the Herrin morgue and the wounded in the hospitals how many more fell victims to the rage of the union strikers and their sympathizers will never be determined because an unknown number were burned at the mine, and other bodies are said to have been thrown into a pond. Most of them were strangers and but few of the corpses have been identified. It seems hardly probable that any of those who surrendered at the mine could have escaped unhurt; if so, they are not telling of it.

A Community Pervaded by a Defiant Spirit of Lawlessness

Extremely revolting as was the horrible inhumanity of the mob the affair assumes a graver aspect as an example of a community pervaded by a defiant spirit of lawlessness not only manifest in the prevailing sentiment of the populace but also apparent in the apathetic inaction of, if not positive encouragement by, local officials charged with the duty of upholding the law and preserving the peace. On the day following the massacre Governor Small, of Illinois, indignant because of the neglect of duty on the part of these officials both as to efforts to prevent the tragedy and to bring the perpetrators to justice, appointed a military commission consisting of Maj. Gen. Foreman and four other National Guard officers to make an investigation. The Governor's view of the recreant conduct of the county officials is reflected in the reported instructions to Gen. Foreman "particularly to learn why the District Attorney had not taken steps toward convening a special session of the grand jury; why the coroner's inquest had not been held, and why these officials repeatedly refused to authorize Col. Hunter (representing the Adjutant General) to call for troops, even after an indignation meeting of miners was held the day before the fighting started and even after the miners had marched on the mine; also to learn why Sheriff Thaxton repeatedly told Col. Hunter that he could handle the situation and yet ignored Col. Hunter's request that some special preparations for an emergency be made."

He was ordered to "investigate the failure of the local officials to send out an adequate force of deputies the night the fighting began and during the next day when almost unheard-of deeds of cruelty and brutality were committed; and why repeated requests from the Governor for information after the trouble started were ignored by county authorities, and why, when he was receiving scores of telegrams from private citizens telling of the outrages he was continually informed by the authorities that the situation was well in hand and that the troops were not needed."

Later the coroner went through the formality of holding an inquest which turned out, as expected—a disgraceful travesty, screening instead of bringing to light, the guilty. The few law-abiding citizens of that community who were not in sympathy with the outrageous purpose and action of the mob constituted so small a minority that they were cowed and powerless to oppose the dominant majority of the populace whose lawless and defiant attitude was exhibited in the brazen effrontery of their threats as well as by their flagrant misconduct. When it was rumored that the Governor might send the militia to restore peace and enforce a respectful observance of law they announced their determination to resist the authority of the State, and the generally expressed sentiment was that the way they had settled this labor dispute was exclusively their own local affair in which they would not submit to any meddling from outside, and that the punishment of the non-union miners by the mob was justifiable and no more than was deserved for working in the places of union men who were out on strike.

Lawlessness as a Strike Adjunct Must Be Sternly Dealt With

These murdered non-union miners died martyrs to the cause of human liberty, but their sacrifice will not have been in vain if, as a horrible example of the consequences naturally resulting from the policy of intimidation and violent interference with personal and property rights so commonly resorted to by strikers to gain their ends, it arouses the people and public officials throughout the land to an appreciative sense of the dangerous and wicked tyranny involved in any person or group of persons assuming to dictate the terms on which another shall sell his own labor, and spurs the Federal and State authorities to take measures to eradicate this evil. Touching on this subject in his Fourth-of-July address President Harding said.

"The foremost thought in the Constitution is the right to freedom and the pursuit of happiness. Men must be free to live and achieve. Liberty is gone in America when any man is denied a right to work and live by that work. It does not matter who denies.

"Every American has the right to labor without any other's leave. It would be no less an abridgement to deny men to bargain collectively. Government can not tolerate any class or grouped domination through force. It will be a sorry day when group domination is reflected in our laws. Government, and the laws which government is charged with enforcing, must be for all the people, ever aiming at the common good."

REFORMING FATHER

MR. Deane cast a gratified glance over the sparsely-filled Pullman, opened his brief case, and settled himself to a consideration of a recent Supreme Court decision.

His peace was, however, of short duration, for at the next stop two girls entered the car and, amid much chatter and high-pitched laughter, found their chairs opposite his.

Their bright, restless eyes raced up one aisle and down the other.

"Antiques!" sniffed one disgustedly as she applied herself to the retouching of an already overdone face.

From that moment Mr. Deane found concentration impossible. Explosions of mirth battered against his ear-drums and fragments of conversational rubbish entangled themselves in his brain till, in sheer self-defense, he retreated to the smoking compartment.

The only other occupant of the compartment was a stout and affable stranger. "What is it, brother?" he queried, smiling at Mr. Deane's wild look.

Ordinarily Mr. Deane would have resented the familiarity, but in his present state of mind he ignored it.

"Those dratted girls!" He smiled at his own vehemence.

"Know what they're doing? Gambling, if you please. That is, when they're not using lipsticks or discussing petting parties or reviling the railroad companies for not providing women a place to smoke. In heaven's name, where is the present generation headed?"

The stranger's shrewd eyes twinkled. "I take it you haven't a little fairy in your home," he said.

"I have a daughter, if that's what you're driving at, but if she dressed the way those girls are dressed or talked the way they talk, old as she is, and she's seventeen, I'd paddle her."

The stout man chuckled. "Either familiarity has bred blindness," he observed, "or your daughter is a darned lonesome girl."

Mr. Deane bridled. "Of course my daughter is modern," he said, "and as keen as a brier, if you'll take a father's word for it, but she's a gentlewoman."

"Conceivably, by the world's standards, those girls out there are, too."

"Then they conceal it admirably. There's something deucedly wrong with our system. The youngsters are running away and are headed straight for destruction. Something ought to be done."

"Well, the insurrection began in the home, and I guess it will have to be stopped there."

"What do you mean?"—sharply.

"Why, I have a notion that the trouble began when paddling as a family institution went out of fashion." The fat man sat back and drew firmly at his cigar.

"You may be right," assented Mr. Deane doubtfully. "But my Deborah never needed it. If she had, my wife would have seen that she got it."

He reverted once more to the offensive girls outside whose shrill laughter frequently reached their ears.

"Why," he said, "if my daughter was like that, I'd drive her out into the country some dark night and lose her."

The stranger laughed softly. "Well, if she didn't choose to be lost, you'd most likely find her on your doorstep the next morning. The chances are, though, that she'd thank you for the lift and run ahead to meet new adventure."

Mr. Deane, more troubled than he would have cared to admit, leaned forward, a little surprised that he was finding it so easy to talk with this stranger.

"You know," he began, "admitting that you're right about the paddling—what are we going to do about it now? We can't turn our children back to the paddling age—we've got to start from here. Not," he added, straightening, "that it's my problem."

The stranger rose and collected his bags, for the train was already slackening for his station.

"We've got to give the youngsters a job," he said seriously. "They need an outlet for their vitality. Their splendid energy that ought to be turned into power is wasted in foxtrotting. Set 'em to work and the problem will solve itself."

Mr. Deane rose. "I believe you're right," he said as he held out his hand.

The stout man turned in the door of the compartment, his cheeks pink. "I'll never see you again," he began diffidently, "or I wouldn't be saying this.

"I'm not a Godly man; I'm a traveling man, no better, no worse than the average, but I believe that when parents had family prayers and took their brood to church, they raised a steadier crop of youngsters than we're doing today.

"There's something incongruous about a vanity case in church, and a boy hesitates to light his cigarette on the way home with dad and mother.

"We've made long and progressive strides away from Puritanism, but we've lost something, too. For one thing, we've lost sight of the structural value of work in character building. Here I go. Good by."

He turned and dropped off the car without a backward look.

Mr. Deane settled back with a smile. "I've heard worse sermons in my day," he soliloquized. "And the beggar's right. Oh, thank heaven that Deborah's steady. I'll get her some violets on the way up from the station. How she'll love them! I believe I have just begun to appreciate my daughter."

He finished his journey, his thoughts very tender.

Mrs. Deane met her husband in the hall and received the two bunches of violets.

"Lovely!" she cried. "You must have won your case."

"It happens I did, but those are not by way of celebrating that. It occurred to me on the way home, that I haven't half appreciated Deborah and what you have made of her."

Mrs. Deane smiled ruefully. "You mustn't over-rate us," she warned. "Dinner is ready, Dale; run along and brush up. I want to hear the news."

"Where is Deborah?" he asked later, as he seated his wife at the table.

"Not in yet. She went to a matinee with the girls."

"The Daily Dozen?" he smiled. "She's popular, isn't she?"

Mrs. Deane nodded. "There she comes now. Hurry, Deborah!" she called as the street door banged; "we've begun dinner."

But Deborah, it appeared, was in no haste. Through a mirror, without turning his head, Mr. Deane could see into the hall.

He saw the smart hat tossed carelessly on a seat; he saw Deborah's long, white fingers fluttering through the thick, bright curls of her bobbed hair; he observed the flash of a powder-puff and the swift, deft stroke of a lip-stick.

His heart lurched. All her gestures were those of the girls of the train. He felt his cheeks growing hot at the thought of his boasts to the stranger.

"You're late, Deborah," he said as she slid into her place.

"I'm not hungry," she replied indifferently.

"But a dinner hour is an engagement, Deborah."

She lifted the heavy lids of her fog-gray eyes. "What's an engagement between friends?" she said. "Besides," she drawled, "if you insist upon having your dinner at the prehistoric hour of six, you must expect your modern offspring to be tardy."

"Please see that you're on time in future, Deborah," he said, making his voice severe.

Deborah, with a gesture copied from the screen, laid her napkin beside her plate.

"Excuse me, mother," she said; "I am going to my room." And she went, with a stride also borrowed from the screen.

"You've done it, Dale," Mrs. Deane sighed as they heard her door close.

"Done what, I'd like to know," he said defensively.

"You've mounted her on her high horse. The modern girl is very jealous of her dignity, dear, and she doesn't like censure."

"Dignity! You've given them too much credit. Gad, Cynthia! Deborah surprises me. I didn't realize she was like that."

"Young people today are a problem."

"Are you afraid of her, Cynthia?"

She flushed. "Of course not Dale; don't be silly; but we've got to keep her from being defiant and hard."

He was silent for a few moments. Then, "I think I've taken Deborah a good deal for granted," he said. "I suppose I have just established an ideal in my mind and named it Deborah. I find myself rather shocked. Do you like her like this, Cynthia?"

"Of course I don't. None of us mothers does. But what are we to do? It's a vogue that we are hoping will soon pass."

"I suppose, mother, that we are, in the last analysis, responsible for what she is. I suppose it isn't quite fair to lay it all to the times."

"She is fundamentally sound, Dale."

"Well, she won't be long, assuming she's as bad as she's painted."

"You've just begun to think on a subject that has worried me for a year. I have tried to be tolerant and understanding, Dale. We can't fight the times; we can't force our daughter into a class by herself without making her miserable. And a happy girlhood is a precious heritage."

"But she doesn't look happy. We've got to think this thing through, mother."

His voice took a lower register as they heard Deborah's step on the stairs.

"Honey," called Mrs. Deane brightly, "I forgot to tell you that father brought you some violets."

Deborah, pretty, and as gay as a parakeet in her colorful frock, stood poised in the doorway. It seemed to her father, even before she spoke, that she was designedly insolent.

"Violets?" she scoffed. "Violets are like weak tea when you're expecting a cocktail. Why be a piker, old dear? Why not say it with orchids?"

"Where are you going, dear?" broke in her mother hastily.

"To the Rialto again, mumus. We are all cuckoo over Trentino. So long." The door closed definitely behind her.

The eyes of Deborah's parents met. "She was only paying her score, Dale," Mrs. Deane sighed. "After all, it may be better than sulking."

Mr. Deane rose abruptly and retreated to his library, but all the evening his brief case lay unopened upon his desk. The responsibility of parenthood suddenly appeared to him as a baffling task.

Clearly his wife was intimidated by the situation—obsessed by the fear that she might drive their headstrong daughter further along the path of recklessness. That put the matter directly up to him and he was as bereft of a constructive plan as an infant.

Late in the evening an impulse sent him softly up the stairs and into Deborah's room. Inside he stood, hands in pockets, looking curiously about. Pictures of screen favorites were in every conceivable place. There were several of the precious Trentino.

"If each one cost a quarter," Mr. Deane mused, "this gallery runs into money."

He strolled over to the dressing table and stood looking at the untidy jumble of jars and boxes, lip-sticks and eyebrow pencils. Between thumb and finger, he held up a cigarette holder and looked at it as one who distrusts the evidence of his senses.

"Deborah!" he breathed. "Oh, my God!" It was not a profanity.

"Well?"

How long he had stood there, he had no means of knowing, but at Deborah's sharp monosyllable he wheeled and faced her.

"Hello, Deborah!" Trained always to be on guard, he commanded a natural voice.

"I was just prowling around," he explained.

She flushed resentfully. "Oh!" she said.

"Jolly little room, Deb."

He was suddenly alert and feeling his way with the unerring instinct which had made him one of the cleverest lawyers of his state.

"What does mother say to all this?" His gesture included the entire room.

"She makes a noise like a mother," snapped Deborah.

He laughed. "She would. You and I know that mother is just a little bit—prudish—don't we, puss?"

Deborah's fog-gray eyes narrowed in suspicion. "You seem to have changed your tune since dinner," she said.

"Oh, that! That, my child, was for mother's benefit."

Puzzled, she sank into a chair and he hastily averted his eyes from a silken knee.

"Was it a petting party tonight?" he asked casually.

She flushed crimson. "What do you know about petting parties?" she shot at him.

"I am my daughter's father, Deb. And not so old as you seem to think."

He went over to her, and though she tried to elude him, he placed a hand under her firm little chin and tilted her face upward.

"Are we going to be pals?" he asked.

She lowered her eyes but he did not permit her to free her head.

"How about urging mother to go out to Oregon this summer with Aunt Carrie?"

"No!" said Deborah stormily, her eyes turning to black.

"Better think it over."

He held the cigarette holder to her and forced her reluctant hands to take it.

"Will you have a good night cigarette with dad?" he urged, his eyes holding hers.

"No!" she cried again. "I won it as a p-prize," she explained falteringly.

"Fine business. Well, if you won't smoke with me, I'll cut along. Night, Deborah."

She followed him to the door and without a word shut it behind him and stood with her back to it, her breath coming fast.

"Father!" she agonized. "Oh, my God!" It was not profanity.

She flung the cigarette holder into the grate and threw herself into a chair.

She had had a fairly steady diet of moving pictures. She knew from them that men often led double lives; that the gaming table or drink or designing women frequently ruined homes.

Some such vicious agency must be responsible for her father's attitude. And he thought that she would condone it! She shuddered at the monstrous suggestion.

How long had he kept his vice hidden—or could keep it? How long before his personal and professional honor would be dragged through the mire of public scandal? Poor mother! It would kill her. It might be the best thing for her to go away while she tried to straighten things out at home.

She went to bed but not to sleep. She had constructed a hasty but very convincing plot and had set herself to play the major role.

Mr. Deane also passed a white night. Tearing out of one's daughter's mind the ideal that has been proudly implanted is a painful operation. He awoke neither rested nor comforted.

For the first time in months, Deborah was on time for breakfast and her white cheeks and shadowed eyes tortured her father. However, he gaily brought up the subject of his wife's trip.

"Deborah and I had a conference last night," he began, "and we decided that you need a change, mother."

Denial leaped to Deborah's lips but she bit it back.

"Leave you two helpless infants?" laughed Mrs. Deane.

"Helpless! Are we going to stand for that, chick?"

Deborah braced herself. She wanted most terribly to put her head on her mother's shoulder and to cuddle her hand in hers. She wanted to be shielded from the blow which she feared. But to be shielded was no longer her line of conduct. From now on she must shield mother.

"Please go, mother," she urged gently.

Restless and uneasy, Deborah again went to the pictures in the evening. The plot was trite, but so apt as to seem to her to hold a psychic warning. There was the old-fashioned, devoted wife; the smart, pleasure-loving husband; a designing woman completed the triangle.

When it was over, she refused to go with her crowd for ice cream. She insisted upon going home alone, notwithstanding the fact that her parents would disapprove of her going up-town unaccompanied at that time of evening. She felt so old and tired that it seemed impossible that anything could harm her now.

She had reached the dark end of Main Street when a man fell into step beside her.

"Hello, girlie!" he began insinuatingly.

Deborah, until that moment unmindful that she was being followed, wheeled. She was not frightened; there was not room enough in her mind for another emotion.

"What do you want?" she demanded sharply.

"No up-stage stuff goes with me, girlie."

She peered into his weak, not ill-natured face. "What do you think I am?" she asked quietly.

He stared at her in turn and her face and breeding got across to him. "I see," he said. "You're a false alarm. Run along home to mamma. And take it from me, sister, it's rotten business to advertise unless you intend to deliver the goods."

He slouched away, leaving Deborah to race home, her blood at fever heat from rage and humiliation.

She crept softly up the stairs and went to bed without turning on the light. She was thankful for the darkness; thankful for the safety of home. And she must keep it safe. For mother.

Mrs. Deane, her objections overborne by her husband and her daughter, began preparations for her trip, and Deborah, much to her mother's surprise, voluntarily separated herself from her crowd to help her.

"We're running up some frightful bills," protested Mrs. Deane when urged on to some fresh extravagance.

"Don't you care, mother. If you only knew how desirable you look! It pays to dress to the nines, mums, even if you are married. You'll come home rested and prepared to vamp dad," she finished with a wise nod of her bright curls.

The day came when the last bag was closed, and Deborah, her heart heavy, went with her father to see her mother aboard her train. For the first time in her life, responsibility, like a cumbersome garment, descended upon her shoulders as she watched the train round the curve and disappear.

She drove her father up to his office, he settling back on the cushions with a deep breath.

"Now for our little holiday, sister," he said.

"Don't call me that," she said sharply.

"What's the matter, Deb? You look like a ghost. Did you leave off your make-up as a last concession to mother? Well, she's gone now. Go as far as you like."

"I'm not using any more," said Deborah stiffly.

"Oh, well, suit yourself, though personally I'm for it. And, Deborah, I may not be home to dinner tonight. Amuse yourself with the Daily Dozen. Have them all over to dinner, if you like."

Deborah narrowly missed a truck. "Father," she said, slowing down. "I shall be most awfully lonesome tonight. I don't feel like larking. Please come home."

He sighed. "I thought," he said, "that our freedom began today."

Deborah drove home and wandered disconsolately over the house. She had just slumped in a chair to give herself over to woe when the telephone shrilled.

"No," she answered Sylvia Gray's impetuous summons. "I can't go on a picnic—or to the country club—or to the movies tonight. No, I don't want to dance on your piazza. I'm busy. With mother away, the cares of this house are on my shoulders."

Her color rose hotly as she listened. "Laugh!" she cried. "Laugh all you like. No, it won't do you any good to come over.....Well, I'm not trying to be polite. Bye."

That call electrified her. With broom and duster and flowers, with alluringly-placed chairs and magazines within easy reach of them, she contrived to re-place a soul in the rooms that, with her mother's absence, had seemed so drearily empty.

Then she went to the kitchen, presided over by chocolate-colored Edna.

"I want a perfectly scrumptious dinner," Deborah told her. "Everything that father likes."

Nice thick steak," Edna said good-naturedly. "And apple pie."

Deborah's face fell. "I thought eclairs or meringues, or something like that."

"You leave it to me, Miss Deborah; I know what Mist' Deane likes."

"All right, light of my life," Deborah sighed. "Make it snappy, though, and never mind the bills."

Mr. Deane brought a martyred air home that evening. He but faintly praised the excellent dinner, grew uneasy over his coffee and deferred lighting his cigar.

"Now why don't you run along and play?" he suggested when they went into the library. He looked at his watch. "I have an engagement——"

"Break it," Deborah advised swiftly.

She pushed him into his favorite chair, drew up a smoker's stand and thrust an open magazine into his hand.

"I ran across this article today," she said, "and I knew you would like it."

He leaned back reluctantly. "What's the big idea?" he asked querulously.

"I'm lonesome," Deborah replied softly.

"All right," he said wickedly. "I'll amuse you by reading this article aloud."

Deborah was bored to tears and managed to look reasonably intelligent only by sheer will power. It was a long article and it was nearly midnight before she groped her way up the stairs to her room.

"It anchored him," she said sleepily, "and who cares if my brain does reel? Mother," she added as her drowsy head touched the pillow, "I've won the first round....."

The Daily Dozen were on hand early the next morning, but Deborah shook her head at their plans for the day.

"Count me out," she said; "I'm playing golf with father this afternoon."

"Playing with father!" they hooted.

"You're pozing, Deborah Deane," the astute Sylvia Gray accused. "You're trying this minute to look like Elsie Ferguson."

Deborah's eyes darkened and her color rose.

"She looks like something picked out of the garbage," a pert-faced girl jeered. "Here, honey; take my vanity case, and for the love of John, re-touch!"

"Oh," flared Deborah, "keep your old vanity case! You're all so darned young!"

On Sunday morning Mr. Deane came down to breakfast, beaming.

"No church for me today," he gloated.

"Don't fool yourself, dad," Deborah said calmly. "You're going with me."

He stared. "Why, I don't believe you've been to church for a year, Deb."

"Well, I'm going today. In mother's place. And you're coming, too, dad."

"But this is the limit, Deb. I spent Friday evening with you; yesterday afternoon we played golf together and dined at the club and I danced with you in the evening."

"If you've the nerve to call it dancing," Deborah giggled.

"And now you're planning to take me to church. What's the idea, Deb? I like you, but I ask you when my vacation is going to begin. Do you plan to personally-conduct me for two months? What?"

"There's the first bell, dad; run along and get dressed."

For the afternoon Deborah staged a motor jaunt with a picnic supper on the river, and her father, sighing inwardly for his easy-chair and the Sunday paper, was dragged along by his energetic daughter.

Those two days were a fair example of the ones which followed. Only a few evenings did Mr. Deane succeed in breaking away from the vigilant Deborah, and on those nights she sat by the window in her room, waiting anxiously for his stealthy tread on the stairs, and not till she had heard his door close would she go to bed.

It taxed all her time and ingenuity to keep him amused. She speedily observed that when the house became untidy or there was a slackening of the supervision of the meals, he grew restless and more difficult to manage.

So, unaccustomed as she was to responsibility and labor, and hating both as she did, she nevertheless put a little more of the weight of her young shoulders against the wheel she had determined to move.

However, she was not wholly unhappy. An inherited love of order gave bringing it about its own peculiar satisfaction, and under Edna's good-natured instruction she took as keen an interest in icing her father's birthday cake as she had once taken in powdering her nose.

Too, she loved mystifying her friends and when, on rare occasions, she joined them in their frolics, she was thrilled under the admiring attention of the boys and the resultant irritation of the girls. She was creating a vogue and it stimulated her far more than she had ever been stimulated by running with the pack.

Mostly she dramatized herself. Mostly she wore a rapt expression and premeditated every word and gesture. However, as the days passed, life to Deborah became more than a posture; it became a vital experience, with service as its motivation.

She had cared little for reading, but she listened to her father till, in spite of herself, her interest quickened and the wheels of her active mind were set in motion.

She stopped him once with, "I'm too ignorant to get that, dad," and nodded as she grasped his explanation.

And later with, "I believe I'd like to go to college, dad."

"But you've fought the idea, Deb."

"I know, but since you've opened up this new world to me, I've been thinking that I'd like to interior-decorate my head."

"It isn't," she added quickly, "that I give a hoot about being educated, but I'm darned curious."

"That's settled then," her father replied. "Honey," he added after a moment, "I seem to have monopolized you this summer. Don't you miss your crowd?"

"Oh," she added promptly, "I'm having a topping time, dad."

But her crowd missed her.

"What's the matter with the queen of the flappers?" worried Charley Saunders. "This gang has lost its pep since she abdicated."

"Is that so?" retorted Sylvia Gray. "Well, if you want to know, she's vamping her dad."

"Good grief! A girl like that wasting her time on her father!"

"She says," giggled another girl, "that she's grown up."

"Well, I'll tell the world she's improved," stated Charley. "She no longer looks like a near relative of the wild man of Borneo and her face is somewhere near the way the Lord left it. She can pack her clothes in my trunk."

"Oh!" they chorused jeeringly.

That irritated Charley. "It wouldn't hurt you," he said heatedly, "to wash your faces and try vamping your own dads."

One morning Mr. Deane suggested bringing a guest home to dinner that night. It was hot and Deborah was tired and Edna was inclined to be irritable.

"Who?" she asked half-heartedly.

"Miles Carter. The Boston Carters, Deb. His father and I were classmates. He has come for a little practical experience in my office. He has another year at Harvard Law School."

"Bring him along," Deborah said feebly. "A Boston Carter sounds like a heavy frost but I can stand anything once."

Looking him over unobserved that evening, Deborah decided that he was not a frost at all. With a gleeful thought for the envy of her crowd, she suggested the country club dance as a diversion, and once there she divided her dances between her father and young Carter.

The next morning the Daily Dozen descended upon her in solid formation.

"You mean thing!" they charged. "We see now why you broke away from us. You knew this peach was coming and you wanted to keep him for yourself."

"Why don't you take him?" retorted Deborah? "With your fatal beauty, of course you could."

"Nobody," soothed Sylvia, "wants to take him, honey. Now don't get disagreeable, Deb; and don't be stingy with your beau. We admit that this trick is yours; you've snared a sophisticated man. Bring him over to my house tonight and we'll dance."

"I'll send him if I can," Deborah promised, "but I can't go. I've a date with father."

"Well, if you ask me," Sylvia returned warmly, "I should think your father would enjoy shaking a free foot now and then. If you won't come, you won't; but be a sport and keep your fingers off Adonis. I'm going to call him up right away."

To Deborah's secret delight, young Carter preferred to join her and her father that evening and he joined them on all of their subsequent jaunts.

He and Deborah became firm friends. She treated him as she did her father—scolded him at will and disposed of his spare time with the arbitrary assurance of a pretty girl.

The time was fast approaching when Mrs. Deane was expected home and Deborah felt that she would turn her father over to her with vast relief.

She was tired. Her vigil had told on her ever so slightly. She was thinner and paler, but her old restlessness had been replaced by a steadiness of hand and eye.

She was satisfied with her summer's work. For days her father had shown no anxiety to shun her companionship. Their present relationship was one of the sweetest experiences she had ever known.

One afternoon she was summoned to the telephone at the country club where she was playing tennis. Miles Carter was speaking.

"I have been hunting all over for you," he said.

A tenseness in his voice made her heart leap.

"Is anything wrong, Miles?" she asked sharply.

"No. Your father started for New York on the three-nineteen."

Her lips grew white.

"New York," she repeated stupidly. "What for?"

Stella Rosevelt

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

He came forward to greet them with extended hand.

I cannot take it! I cannot take it—and from you, of all persons! he said brokenly.

He linked his arm familiarly with Ralph's, and drew him from the room.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

A terrible storm at sea and from a steamer running between Liverpool and New York is Stella Rosevelt Gladstone, an orphan, on her way to distant relatives in New York. She is befriended by Jacob Rosevelt, who learns her grandmother gave her the name of Star. A fire breaks out and the boats are rapidly filled. Stella refuses to go unless room is made for Mr. Rosevelt, who the next day suffers from an ill turn and is carefully nursed by her. The sixth day they are rescued. Mr. Rosevelt is told of the care Stella gave him during his illness and while thanking her a young man approaches and Mr. Rosevelt introduces Archibald Sherbrooke, whose home is in Derbyshire where Star's father preached. Star's shawl becomes loosened and Mr. Sherbrooke draws an exquisitely carved stone from his necktie and Stella pins the shawl. Stella is met by Mrs. Blunt, Mrs. Richards' housekeeper, who hurries her away. Stella receives a cool reception from her aunt and learns she is to be degraded to the leval of a common servant. Stella appeals to Mr. Richards, giving him the letter written by her father to Mrs. Richards and her reply. Stella has one hundred pounds. Could she not use it and then teach, relieving his wife of all responsibility? Mr. Richards makes arrangements for her to attend a select school, she giving a part of each day to household work. Stella wins, at commencement, a part in the class exercises and promotion to the senior class. Josephine, admiring the cameo worn by Stella, takes it and discovers the initials "A. S." Stella misses the cameo and is suspicious who has it. In the meanwhile Mr. Richards receives a letter from Mrs. Richards' Uncle Jacob. He has lost all, and will accept the home that was offered him when rich. Upon his arrival he is taken to the Lodge to sleep, Mr. Rosevelt meets Star who offers her room to him and does all she can to brighten his life. Mrs. Richards receives him coldly, and Josephine ignores her uncle. Mrs. Richards and Josephine go to Long Branch, where they meet Lord Carrol, of Carrolton, Derbyshire, England. Noticing a ring Josephine wears and examining it he sees the initials "A. S." Josephine claims it is given by a relative. Lord Carrol cannot understand it. The next day he leaves for New York. Stella, hurrying to take a train for home, and in danger, is stopped by Archibald Sherbrooke and the acquaintance renewed. Stella tells him that she and Mr. Rosevelt are in the same home. Mr. Rosevelt goes to New York with Stella to call upon Mr. Sherbrooke in his studio and arranges a pleasure trip for them to Coney Island for the following day. When they return from it Stella is the promised wife of Archibald Sherbrooke. Lord Carrol, of Carrolton, thought to be Josephine's betrothed, is expected. Stella sees in him her promised husband, Archibald Sherbrooke. She passes a sleepless night. Walking to the lodge, she meets Archibald, and he cannot understand why he finds her there. Believing he is acting a part, for he wins her love as Archibald Sherbrooke, he appears as Lord Carrol of Carrolton, the expected husband of her cousin, and refusing his explanation she bids him go back to Josephine and ask her for the cameo he gave her. Archibald seeks Mr. Richards' confidence and explains his position, his meeting Star on the steamer, his interest in her and later her promised husband, his ignorance that she is an inmate of this house, his meeting Stella and her refusal to listen to him. Mrs. Richards, overhearing his story and determined that her plans shall not fail, seeks Stella in the lodge, where she has gone for sympathy from Mr. Rosevelt. She upbraids Stella for conducting herself in a shameless manner, misconstruing Lord Carrol's attentions and accusing him with unfaithfulness. Stella is crushed with shame and humiliation, and the next morning Mr. Rosevelt and Stella go to New York where they make their home. Lord Carrol leaves a note for Josephine requesting her to send the cameo to his address. Stella graduates with honor from the Normal College and Mr. Appleton introduces her as the author of "Chatsworth's Pride." She meets Grace Meredith and her brother Ralph who requests the pleasure, with his sister, of calling upon her. Reaching home, Mr. Rosevelt tells to Stella the story of his life, his love for and engagement to be married to Stella's grandmother, and then his love for her for her kindness to him. The next day is her eighteenth birthday and to celebrate Mr. Rosevelt invites her for a ride and calling at a beautiful house she is met by Mrs. Blunt who has a nice lunch for them, after which they go through the house and Mr. Rosevelt admits she is to be his heiress. Going to Newport, they meet Mrs. Richards and Josephine, who are stunned when they learn of his immense wealth and intention to leave all to Stella, and Mrs. Richards resolves to stay and make Star as uncomfortable as she can. Ralph Meredith and his sister arrive. Going on a picnic, Josephine picks up a pet dog which proves to be mad, and Star saves her from a horrible fate and falls fainting in Ralph Meredith's arms and through Grace's explanation of Star's courage, she becomes the heroine of the place and Mrs. Richards and Josephine suddenly return home. Ralph seeks an interview with Star and asks for her love. She tells the story of her life and betrothal to Archibald Sherbrooke and while he appears a traitor she loves him still. Promising Ralph she will still be his friend, they join Grace and Mr. Rosevelt. Ralph leaves for New York and after a short visit through the White Mountains and at Niagara, Grace, Star and Mr. Rosevelt plan a Western trip.

CHAPTER XXXII.

"I PROMISE."

ON returning to New York, Star learned that Ralph Meredith had sailed for Europe a couple of days before their arrival.

One day they were out making a few necessary purchases, when suddenly, in one of the stores, they came upon Mr. Richards.

He looked aged and careworn, neglected and unhappy. His face lighted with momentary pleasure, however, when he caught sight of Mr. Rosevelt and Star, and he came forward to greet them with extended hand.

"I cannot tell you how glad I am to see you once more," he said, heartily. "I am not going to reproach you either for running away from us, for, unpleasant as it is for me to say it, I could not blame you under the circumstances. But it is only within a week or two that I have learned of the change in your life; and, Uncle Jacob, I am sincerely glad that you did not lose your fortune, as we supposed."

"Thank you. Then you do not feel aggrieved over the ruse I played upon you?" replied Mr. Rosevelt, regarding him searchingly.

"Not at all; it was no more than right that you should wish to know who was worthy to be your heir," but he sighed heavily as he spoke, as he remembered how unworthy his wife had proved herself to be.

"How goes the world with you?" Mr. Rosevelt asked, and noticing the return of the careworn look to Mr. Richards' face.

"Rather discouragingly just now. I have met with some pretty heavy losses lately; don't know whether I shall be able to pull through all right or not. A couple of weeks will tell the story, however."

He spoke in a desperate tone, and there was a look in his eyes that made Star shudder and involuntarily draw closer to Mr. Rosevelt.

"You don't mean that you are in danger of going under?" he said, in surprise, and remembering how his wife and daughter had flourished at Newport.

"Just that," Mr. Richards returned, nervously; "but if it were not for the horror I have of debt, and the thought that others must suffer through me, I would gladly lay down my arms and give up the battle; I am tired to death of this endless struggle to keep up appearances. But," he added, trying to speak more cheerfully, "I won't bore you with my troubles. How well you are both looking; and Star—they tell me you are the author of 'Chatsworth's Pride.' I declare I was never prouder of anything in my life when I heard it. I always knew you'd make your mark in the world.

"Now that I have found you," he said, later, "tell me where you live and I will come to see you. I will not invite you to Brooklyn," he continued, with a frown, "for I know you could not come there with any comfort, though I should be glad enough to see you there."

While he was speaking, Star had drawn a little back, so that Mr. Rosevelt was between her and Mr. Richards, and he could not see her face at all.

"Uncle Jacob," she whispered, close to his ear, "cannot we do something to help him out of his trouble? He looks so wild and desperate that he frightens me. He was always kind to me, and I'll willingly give up California or anything else you please."

Jacob Rosevelt's face flushed hotly at these words, and a strange gleam came into his fine eyes. He appeared to take no notice of her plea, but after giving Mr. Richards their street and number, continued:

"If you have no other engagement, George, come up and dine with us tonight, and see how cozy we are. We have dinner at six, and as we leave for California on Wednesday night, I am afraid we shall not see you again."

George Richards caught his breath with a sudden gasp at this intelligence, and Star noticed again that frenzied gleam in his eyes which had made her heart throb painfully.

"California, do you?" he said, trying to speak steadily. "Well, I will come, of course, then; for life is uncertain, you know, and I may never see you again," he added, with a harsh, grating laugh. "Thank you for the invitation, and as I have no engagement, I will be on hand in season for dinner. But I must be off now, for I have agreed to meet a couple of gentlemen at twelve, and it only wants fifteen minutes of that now."

He lifted his hat and bowed to them, then turned away; but the white-haired gentleman and the beautiful girl who stood looking after him saw the aged, dejected look return almost instantly to his face, and heard the heavy sigh that escaped his lips, telling of some fearful burden of care that was wearing his life away.

"So you want me to help George Richards out of his trouble, do you, Star?" Mr. Rosevelt said, on their way home, and his eyes rested fondly on the graceful figure sitting by his side, driving her pretty gray ponies.

"Perhaps it was presuming in me to ask you to do so, Uncle Jacob," Star answered, gravely, and flushing a vivid crimson; "but I feel very sorry for him. He was kind to me in many ways while I was living with his family, and but for him I should have been made a common servant."

When George Richards was ushered into Jacob Rosevelt's luxurious and cozy dining-room that evening, where the table was laid with exquisite taste for three, his eyes lighted, and the look of care vanished as if by magic from his face.

"He is almost himself again, I think," Star thought, with a happy little smile, as once, after a comic song which she sang to him, Mr. Richards leaned back in his chair and laughed long and heartily.

But this could not go on forever, and finally Mr. Rosevelt led him to talk business, and asked him to tell him just what his trouble was.

This changed everything, and he became at once the anxious, careworn man again.

"I do not like to trouble you, Uncle Jacob," he said, uneasily. "You have had your day of business, with all its cares and perplexities, without bothering your brain with those of other people. I'm in a terrible muddle, it is true; but—I guess there will be some way out of it;" and there came into his eyes that same wild, desperate look which Star had noticed in the morning, and which made her shudder with a terrible fear.

But Mr. Rosevelt insisted, and finally drew from him a true statement of facts.

"I am sorry you are having such a hard time of it, George," he said, thoughtfully, when he had concluded. "How much would it take to relieve you of your embarrassment?"

Mr. Richards cast a startled look at the old gentleman at this question; then, while a deep flush mounted to his brow, he said:

"I can raise enough to meet all my present liabilities with ten thousand dollars. I have tried to borrow it everywhere, but everybody seems to have become suddenly shy of me for some reason, and I might as well be without a dollar in the world as without the whole amount. If I could raise it, it would set me on my legs again, for my credit would be good, and, with care and patience, I believe I could retrieve my position."

Star almost held her breath while she waited for Mr. Rosevelt's reply to this.

To her infinite surprise, he turned to her.

"My dear," he said, gently, "you shall return some of the kindness of which you told me this morning. I think you understand what I want you to do."

He glanced as he concluded toward the private drawer in his desk, where he always kept his checkbook, and she knew that he wanted her to go and fill out a check for the amount that Mr. Richards had named.

She arose, went to the desk, unlocked the drawer with trembling fingers, and drew forth the book.

Opening it, she filled out a check, as she had often done for him during the last few months, then tearing it out, carried it to him, with a pen filled with ink.

He turned it over and wrote his name on the back without a word, and then returned it to her to sign.

She took it mechanically, but stood irresolute for a moment, looking at him, while her cheeks grew crimson.

"Give it to him, dear; it is to be your gift," Mr. Rosevelt said, glancing at Mr. Richards, who sat staring at them both in blank amazement.

A brilliant smile parted Star's red lips; she shot a grateful look at Uncle Jacob, and, advancing to their visitor's side, laid the check down before him.

One glance at the figures, and the overburdened man bowed his head upon the table with a groan.

"I cannot take it! I cannot take it—and from you, of all persons!" he said, brokenly.

"Why not from her?" Mr. Rosevelt asked, huskily. "All that I have belongs to this dear girl, and, as I have told her many times, I live only to make her happy. She asked me to do this today after we met you, because, she said, you had been kind to her in the past, and she longed to help you out of your trouble. So take it as her gift, my boy; make the best use of it that you can, and welcome."

George Richards groaned again, while he reached forth and grasped the old man's hand, wringing it in silent gratitude, yet overwhelmed with shame and remorse as he remembered all that he and the fair-haired, gentle girl standing beside him had suffered while they were members of his family.

When he arose to take his leave, he took both of Star's hands in his and drew her aside, where he could speak to her alone.

"But for you," he said, in unsteady tones, "I should have been a ruined man a week hence. To tell you that I am ashamed to receive this gift from you does not express half what I feel, when I look back and remember your position in my family. But you have bestowed it so kindly and delicately that it would be churlish in me to refuse it; and you have taught me a lesson, which, God helping me, I will never forget—a lesson of forgiveness and charity; and no one in my house shall ever be treated unkindly again, no matter what their position may be," he concluded, with stern resolution.

"Please forget all the past, Mr. Richards," Star returned, sweetly, but with evident embarrassment. "I never entertained any feeling save that of gratitude and good-will toward you, for you proved yourself interested in my welfare in more instances than one while I was with you. But," she added, solemnly, while she clung tightly to his hands, and looked into his eyes with an expression which made them droop guiltily before her, "will you not promise me that, no matter how dark the future may be to you, no matter what trials or disappointments may come to you, you will never again meditate doing yourself an irreparable wrong?"

A streak of dusky red shot across the man's forehead, while his veins filled out hard and full.

"Star," he stammered, "what do you mean?—what do you know?"

"You know what I mean. I read it in your eyes, I heard it in the tones of your voice this morning."

He raised her hands and kissed them reverently, and two hot tears rolled over his cheeks and dropped upon them in the act.

"I promise," he whispered, hoarsely. "My child, I should indeed have been ruined, body and soul, but for you. God bless you!"

Star and Mr. Rosevelt followed him to the door as he went out, both trying to cheer him with kind wishes for the future.

A mighty sob burst from the overcharged heart of George Richards as he reached the street, and the tears—tears of mingled remorse, gratitude and relief—rolled thick and fast over his face.

He had proceeded some distance, when he stopped short and seemed about to retrace his steps.

"How thoughtless of me!" he muttered, impatiently. "I meant to tell her all about Lord Carrol. He deserves to be set right with her, and she deserves—well, nothing can be too good for her; but they knocked everything out of my head by their unexampled generosity. I will not go back tonight," he added, after thinking a moment; "I will write her tomorrow the whole story."

But the morrow brought its busy cares and perplexities, and his resolution was forgotten. After that it was too late, for he did not know where to address her during her absence; and so Star still believed her lover to be false, and still mourned her shattered idol.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"YOU ARE THE TRAITOR."

Mr. Rosevelt, Star and Grace Meredith, with good-natured Mrs. Blunt to attend to matters of comfort, started on the day appointed for their Western trip, and while they are gone, we will follow Ralph Meredith on his voyage across the Atlantic to the Old World.

Arriving in London, he transacted what business he had to do there, and then turned his attention, with what interest he could muster while his heart was still so sore from his recent disappointment, to the attractions which the great city afforded.

He visited the House of Parliament, the Tower, St. Paul's Cathedral, the National Gallery of Art, and many other points of interest, reserving Westminster Abbey until the last, as he wished to give plenty of time to this wonderful and magnificent structure and its countless curiosities.

Upon his second visit thither, and while he was in the Chapel of Henry the Seventh, with his guide, who was pointing out for his admiration the beauties of its architecture, the vaulted roof, with its magnificent carvings, and many precious relics gathered there, a clear, sweet voice suddenly broke the solemn stillness of the place by calling out just behind him.

"Why, Archie Sherbrook, do you know what time it is? Quarter-past eleven, and we promised Lady Dunham that we would be back in season to attend the rehearsal at the Albert Memorial Hall with her."

Ralph had thought that he was the only visitor there that morning, and that silvery voice speaking that name, which he remembered but too well, gave him a shock which sent the blood coursing like fire through his veins.

"It is later than I thought, Vivien; we must go at once, if we keep that appointment," a rich, manly voice said in reply; and, turning quickly to look at the speaker, Ralph saw a tall, handsome young man of perhaps two or three-and-twenty, with the head of an Apollo, the form of an Adonis, and having a keen, intellectual face, with frank, truthful eyes, and a pleasant, winning smile.

The lady who accompanied, and who addressed him, was a year or two younger evidently, and almost as lovely as Star, Ralph thought, although her beauty was of a different style.

Archie Sherbrooke! There surely could not be two young men of the same age, handsome as one of the gods, and bearing the same name.

His heart had bounded into his throat as he heard it spoken, his face had flushed a painful crimson, while his hands instinctively clinched themselves in hot indignation, and he longed to confront the handsome traitor and denounce him for the villainous part he had played.

This, then, must be the man who had broken Star Gladstone's heart and ruined her life; there was not a doubt of it in his own mind.

The young lady had spoken of a rehearsal at the Albert Hall. He knew there was to be a concert there that evening, and possibly it might be an outgrowth of the rehearsal. He would go and see.

Accordingly, at the hour designated upon the bills, he went, armed with a powerful opera glass, and, procuring a conspicuous seat, he swept tier after tier of faces, searching for those which he had seen in the morning.

But disappointment was the result of his efforts; for that fair, girlish face was nowhere to be seen, nor could he find him who had been the young lady's attendant.

Suddenly, however, a strangely sweet, bird-like voice, rising clear and full on the air, drew his attention to the stage, and there, with a thrill which tingled through every nerve, he saw the lovely girl for whom he was looking.

Ralph Meredith sought for her name upon his program which stated that the concert was given, under the auspices of some of the nobility, for some charitable object, and that the talent was all amateur.

"Miss Vivien Sherbrooke," he read, and he again experienced that sudden heartthrob.

He listened intently throughout her song; and then, as the sweet voice died away, and she turned to leave the stage, he leaned breathlessly forward to watch her, while thunders of applause went rolling up into the heights above him.

"I believe Vivien never sang so well before; but I am glad that part of the program is over."

"Yes," replied deeper but more familiar tones; "I was a trifle anxious myself, although I know she never fails in what she undertakes. Vivien is a jewel!"

"You are right, Archie. So is my son; and I am surprised that, at your age, some one has not won you both away from me," returned the lady, in suppressed, but fond and playful tones.

"You are not anxious to get rid of either of us, I hope, mother?"

"No, indeed; and yet it would be expected in the natural course of events; and with so many fair maidens and gallant young gentlemen playing the agreeable to me, I cannot but feel some curiosity as to who will eventually get my treasures."

There was no reply to this speech, but Ralph was sure he heard a sigh.

After a few moments he turned and ran his eye with seeming carelessness over the sea of

HYDRO, OKLA.

TAP! TAP!

Did I hear someone say "Come in"?

I've come all this way to pay you a visit and I haven't anything particular to talk about either, as husband and I do not quarrel and I don't know anything about children, only that they are the dearest, sweetest things in the whole world. I have two dear little baby girls that are the joy and sunshine of our home.

So many sisters have asked Mrs. Wilkinson about herself so I'll do likewise. What do you look like and where do you live and what do you dream about? We've teased you to tell us but it seems that you won't but I'll find out, see if I don't.

I married when very young and am a happy wife and mother. Husband and I always kneel, with our arms around each other, for prayer, and our little baby girls always say their prayers and kiss mamma, papa and sister good night every night before going to bed. We are indeed a happy family. My husband is one of the best in the world and I always ask his advice when I'm puzzled over anything. We try to please each other and in doing so have always been happy.

Love to all. SUNSHINE.

Sunshine.—I just naturally dislike to talk about myself, particularly when it means using good space that might be devoted to a letter from a more interesting person than myself. I'm just one of you and my life is and has been more or less like the life of the average woman, only that I am more fortunate than some inasmuch that I am in a position to play hostess to the sisters. Nelle Fischer, in her letter, has told you more about me than I could be persuaded to tell in months and months.—Ed.

PRINCETON, N. J.

DEAR SISTERS:

Did you think I had "dropped out"? Not so. Farmer's Wife had me scared when she entered her complaint a while ago that too many people who wrote much and said nothing were given preference in our corner to the farmers' wives who had something worth while to say. I thought she meant me so, to use a slang expression, I said to myself, "Here is where I take a back seat and keep quiet."

First of all I want to tell the Mormon sister from Salt Lake City that I'm sorry if I misrepresented the Mormon Temple in my last travel letter. I was simply repeating what a man who posed as a Mormon told us when we inquired for directions to the Tabernacle and Temple. No doubt he had us sized up as gullible tourists and was "stuffing" us when he said no women were allowed to enter the Temple and therefore was called the House of Mystery. It seemed very interesting to us at that time as we all are over things that sound mysterious.

Now I'm going to tell you a real bit of news. Since writing last I've had the pleasure of making our Mrs. Wilkinson a visit and wish you all might have had the same privilege. To see her intimately in her own home, surrounded by her charming family, would make you love and admire her more than ever. You would no longer wonder why she is capable of giving us such sound advice on all topics.

I just fell in love with her home nest as it was, or rather, is, so cozy, comfortable and yet artistic. In the living-room there was one big, overstuffed, comfy rocker that just fitted the curves (or angles) of a tired body so after a day of sightseeing I just naturally gravitated to that particular chair. Many a time have I wished for it since we have none like it here (oh yes, I'm keeping house now, although that's another story). I know you are all anxious to know more about Mrs. Wilkinson's home so with her permission I'm going to describe her living-room as I liked that the best. The general color scheme was grey, blue and old rose. The wall-paper was a soft, warm grey which made a good background for the pictures which were good copies of some of the old masterpieces and one or two of Maxfield Parrish's delightful pictures. The dominant color of the rug was blue with old rose, tan and gray. The over drapes on the window were blue to match the color in the rug. The curtains were a cream colored net, edged with lace. On the sofa, a big comfortable Chesterfield, were several good looking sofa pillows, carrying out the general color scheme. The furniture consisted of two big upholstered rockers, the sofa just mentioned, library table, bookcase on which were two carved candlesticks, antique finish, desk, tabaret with palm. All seemed substantial and comfortable looking although built along good lines. I fear my description doesn't do justice to the room for the moment I saw it I felt that the person who selected the colors and arranged the furniture was an artist at heart if not in real practice.

Mrs. W. makes a delightful hostess and I'm sure you'd all like to have a week of solid joy with her as I had, but please don't all swoop down on her at once for to feed and house a million, more or less, would be some task, no matter how willing she might be to greet you. Some other time I may tell you how she accompanied me on a trip to all the historical places around Boston, Lexington and Concord, the scene of Paul Revere's ride, and Salem, where we visited the House of the Seven Gables.

I wonder how many of the sisters who have charge of social entertainments in churches and schools have ever tried giving a White Elephant party. The Home and School Club gave one here a short time ago. The invitations sent out were worded something like this: "The Home and School Club invites you to a White Elephant Party to be held in the high school gymnasium on (giving date). Please bring with you, carefully wrapped up, a white elephant (something you have around the house that you can't use but what someone else might like). When the people have arrived the committee in charge get everyone to walk around and exchange "white elephants." You step up to a person, stranger or otherwise, and say, "Will you exchange elephants?" or, "What will you give me for my elephant?" When the exchange has been made you are allowed to unwrap your prize and peek inside. If you find something you want, just stop exchanging. If you find another "white elephant" wrap it up again and again until you draw something that you like and then it is no longer a white elephant. These exchanges cause a lot of merriment, get people acquainted and start the party off in an informal way.

Before I stop I want to ask what has become of some of our old friends. Pearl Vesey is still with us but we hear no more from Knot Head, George Garrison, B of Goshen and Bachelor Bill. The last time Bill wrote he was worrying for fear "B" was after his scalp. I'm wondering if she succeeded. How about it, Bill?

Yours as ever, NELLE FISCHER.

BONDURANT, WYO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a silent reader of COMFORT for several years and think it is a grand paper. When I read the sisters' letters it seems just like talking to my neighbors.

I was reading Mrs. J. D. Clark's letter telling about being blown away in a cyclone. It sounded thrilling. I will tell you what happened to my husband and me when we were crossing a deep river. We live in the mountains where there is lots of snow and in the spring when this snow melts and runs down into the rivers and creeks we have very high water. We were going to mother's to spend the day and had to cross Hobach River. We thought we were hitting a good ford. We were in a big buggy. We had got out to about the middle of the river when one horse dropped into deep, swift water and began to swim. My husband turned the team downstream to keep from tipping the buggy over and away we went, down the stream with water up around our waists and only the noses and ears of the horses visible. I held my little girl high above my head. The horses swam about twenty-five yards and then came to a sand bar and we got out safe and sound, but very wet and scared. The buggy just dipped over the waves like a boat. It was the most exciting thing that ever happened to me.

The COMFORT League of Cousins is interesting. My brother and I wrote to it once and got piles of letters and how we did enjoy them. Some of them are still writing to us and it has been nine years since our letter was printed. My husband is one of the COMFORT Cousins. We started corresponding and he came out to visit my brother and we were married six months later.

I would like to hear from anyone who cares to write. Can answer some of the letters.

With love to all, MRS. FRANK HANSEN.

FLOYD KNOBS, IND.

DEAR COMFORT FOLKS:

After reading Mrs. Clark's letter, in March COMFORT, I made up my mind to write of my most awful experience, and it was also a cyclone, at New Albany, Indiana, in March, 1917. We had three children, Verald, four years, Floyd, two years, and Robert, four months. My husband was away from home and Verald was very sick. It had rained during the day and about three o'clock a bad storm came up. I was never afraid during a storm and didn't mind this even when it became so loud it frightened Verald. I had the two babies in the room with me when I went to quiet him; then the cyclone "hit." There were several vacant lots between our house and the next. Our house went up and came down in the vacant lots and just smashed everything. None of us were killed but we were all hurt. Baby Robert was hanging with his head between two timbers when it grew light enough for me to see at all. I tried to go to him but something pinned me down. I pulled myself free and got to him. His little head was hurt and his eyes full of plaster and his leg broken in two places between the knee and hip. Floyd was unconscious and Verald was out in all the hail and rain when he was already threatened with pneumonia. It was dark before we could be taken away, as the streets had to be cleared. That was the most horrible night I have ever lived through. I was in quite bad shape myself but I would not have suffered as much as I did if I could have borne all the pain but it made me feel worse to see the children suffer. I imagined Robert a cripple and Verald and Floyd dead. Next morning when the sun came out bright I was really shocked for I suppose I didn't expect the sun to shine again, but thank God, the sun always shines again.

Verald and Floyd are seven and nine years old now and going to school. Little Robert is in Heaven. He died a year after the cyclone but he was not crippled. I often wonder why he lived through that only to die a few days after he learned to walk, but God's will be done.

I have two little boys in Heaven and three here for besides my two big boys I have a baby, two years old. When my first baby died I wrote my first letter to this corner. Maybe some will remember a little 18-year-old mother asking for letters from mothers who had lost little ones. I received over seven hundred letters and cards. I couldn't answer all of them but they did me a lot of good and I have loved COMFORT more since than I did before. I am twenty-nine years old, have been married twelve years. Weigh 100 pounds and am five feet, two inches tall.

Love to you all. MRS. RUTH FARNSLEY.

FRENCH CORRAL, CALIFORNIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS ALL:

Time flies, and I had no idea of being so long sending those promised subscriptions; however, here I am. I have received over three hundred letters from all but six states and made friends that money couldn't buy. I have answered all those who enclosed stamp and many others and I hope those who haven't received an answer will read this and know how I read and appreciated every letter, though I couldn't answer all.

There was a letter in the April COMFORT (all you mothers know the one) that for once I, as well as others who have written me, would like to question Mrs. W's usual good judgment in selecting. I'd rather by far see a sweet baby's face than that kind of a letter.

So many of you had never thought of using flour sacks for aprons that I'd like to tell you of the tablecloth I made of sugar sacks. I've just finished it. I used three sacks in all, one whole sack for the center, the two others cut diagonally for the sides, all edges hemmed, then joined the bias sides to the whole sack with fagoting. I ran the hems on coarse old rose cotton and did the fagoting in the same. Then I cut an oval piece of old rose crepe, turned edges in and buttonholed on one corner in black and worked an initial D in outline. All edges must be true and even and crochet or rickrack braid may be used in joining. Four sacks would be even better.

We live in a small town of about fifty people, in Nevada County, and are eight miles northeast of Sacramento. Much gold mining is done in this county and most any kind of fruit can be raised. Much of the fruit is shipped East, mostly Bartlett pears. Some thirty-five years ago the hydraulic gold mines were running full blast and millions of dollars were taken out in the mines along the ridge.

I enjoy the letters about children. Rex was four in February and Audria was one in April. My own name is Eda, though Mrs. Wilkinson had it Edna in my other letter. Rex calls his daddy "Kid" and wants to go everywhere with him. Both children have light hair and blue eyes like their daddy.

Do any of you have trouble with the youngsters running away? We tried various ways to break Rex until one day I thought to take his shoes away, put them where he couldn't get them and kept him in the house the rest of the afternoon, and as he wants to be outdoors all day that was a good way to punish him. And I even told him I'd take his overalls off if he ran away the second time in one day but I had to do that only once. Perhaps this idea will help some other mother.

I suppose each of you have a favorite pie, cake or pudding recipe. We like pudding with rice or tapioca and to make it creamy and nice and save making a sauce, I bake all the ingredients except eggs and flavoring; stir occasionally and when done add beaten eggs, set to cool, when cold add flavoring.

If the children object to eating oatmeal, or any cereal, try pouring milk over it, then sprinkling it with brown sugar. Rex eats his this way when often he refuses the white sugar.

When I read P. V's letter about the okra I thought of the time I sent for seeds from catalogue, the names being new to me. I planted and tended them with care and when they bloomed, found that daturas and lupines were just like what grew wild here, only my tame ones were dwarfs compared to our wild ones.

I am glad we are to have a pin but didn't we ask first for Mrs. W's picture? Wouldn't it be a grand surprise for us to open our COMFORT some day and find Mrs. W's smiling face in our corner? I like surprises, don't you?

Sincerely yours, EDA J. DAHLBERG.

Mrs. Eda.—You mean that you like pleasant surprises, do you not? My photograph might not be a pleasant surprise. I think it much nicer to live in the minds of the sisters as they picture me to themselves for we are apt to picture to ourselves a somebody that we like and I want you all to like me.—Ed.

CORANTH, WISC.

DEAR COMFORT FRIENDS:

This is the first time I ever dared write but I have read your letters from beginning to end and am interested in every one of them.

To begin with, I am married, twenty-two years old, have light hair, light eyes and the mother of a three-year-old boy, as well as stepmother of two boys, eight and ten years of age. My husband is a trapper, hunter and allround woodsman. Last fall he hunted wolves and one day he teased me to go with him. Just for a joke, I went, not expecting to see even a hare, but he found tracks so he took the dog and went about half a mile away, leaving me standing on a pine stump. I stood there about half an hour, sweeping the landscape, or rather the brush and trees, when all at once I felt that I wasn't alone. I looked to my left and there came a large timber wolf right toward me. Something came up in my throat and refused to go down. I took good aim with my old-fashioned, double-barreled shot gun, right at his nose and fired and the wolf was as dead as a nit. My husband was surprised, and I was, too, to think that the gun didn't knock me backward off the stump for I pulled both triggers and both barrels went off at once. The wolf brought me $24.50. A bounty from the state of $10.00 and the same from the county and $4.50 for the pelt.

I enjoy reading COMFORT.

Best wishes to you all. MRS. ADOLPH HAASE.

SALEM, WEST VIRGINIA.

DEAR SISTERS:

Your letters are certainly a great source of pleasure and brimming with helpful hints.

Did you ever get everything ready for dinner and find your fried potatoes were still raw? When frying potatoes, turn a crock over the skillet but be careful when you raise the crock to stir them with a cake turner or a long handled fork. I burned myself terribly when I stirred them with an ordinary fork, but thanks to linseed oil and lime-water, which I keep mixed in a bottle, it did not amount to much. I tied a rag over my burned hand and saturated it with the mixture. A bad burn will not blister if immediately treated in that way.

To those who have tired, aching feet, let me say I cured a regular case of tenderfoot by using twenty-five cents' worth of thymol iodide. It is a yellow powder, so dry it sticks till it can't be rubbed off easily. Put it on your feet at night. Of course best results are obtained by keeping the feet and stockings clean and dusting a little of the powder in your shoes. It has a medicated odor but by mixing a little violet talcum powder with it, it isn't bad. Unless you have weak ankles, always wear pumps for everyday use. Then when you sit down to rest, read or crochet, kick them off and cool your feet.

If your little or big girls' princess slip gets two or three inches too short and is still good but hasn't a hem, don't throw or give it away. Just purchase insertion, the necessary inch or two in width and insert it in the skirt.

To those who have a highly polished dining-room table that is occasionally used for games, buy brown

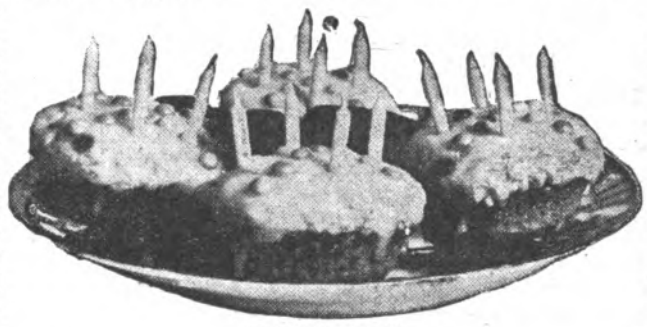
Comfort Sisters' Recipes

BIRTHDAYS are a sort of personal holiday, like owning Christmas or the Fourth of July, and though the time between each birthday seems shorter as we grow older, there was a time when a birthday was the occasion for rejoicing, instead of looking for grey hairs and saying to ourselves, "Another year older and no further ahead than I was a year ago." Presents do not mean as much now as a cake did when we were seven years old and since the making and decorating of a birthday cake requires so little outlay and work, mothers should strive to remember each birthday with a cake or perhaps several little cakes, like those shown in center illustration,—one for each member of the birthday party, for each member of the family if a party is out of the question. It makes a child feel very liberal to be able to give away something of his own, besides helping him to be generous.—Ed.



MACARONI WITH DRIED BEEF.—In a saucepan put two tablespoons of butter, and when it bubbles slowly work in two slightly rounding tablespoons of dry flour. Stir over a slow heat until thoroughly blended, then gradually add two cups of hot milk, continuously stirring.

MACARONI WITH DRIED BEEF.

Cook five minutes, seasoning with salt and pepper to taste. To the sauce add one cup of boiled macaroni, and one-fourth pound of dried beef cut into small pieces. Bring to a cooking heat, cover closely and let stand on the back of stove ten minutes. Pour onto a platter, and top with slices of brown-bread toast well buttered.

BIRTHDAY CAKES.—Cream together one-third cup of butter and two cups of sugar and then beat in two well-beaten eggs. Add one teaspoon of soda and two teaspoons of cream of tartar to three cups of sifted flour and sift again. Add flour alternately to egg mixture with one cup of sweet milk. Bake in moderate oven until the cakes shrink slightly from tins.

BIRTHDAY CAKES.

FROSTING.—Boil one cup of sugar with one quarter of a cup of water until it "threads" when a little is dropped from spoons. Do not stir while cooking. Have one-fourth of a pound of marshmallows melting in a bowl over the teakettle or in a double boiler. Beat the white of one egg until stiff and dry, and over this while continuously beating pour the syrup in a fine stream. Add one teaspoon of vanilla and the melted marshmallows and beat until thick enough to prevent spreading. Spread over the cakes, press small round candies into the frosting, and just before serving press the candles into place. If candles are kept on ice or in a very cool place a day before using, they will burn slowly and evenly.

BEEF CROQUETTES.—Chop enough cold cooked beef to make one pint and season with one teaspoon of salt, a little pepper and one-quarter teaspoon onion juice. Melt one tablespoon of butter, rub in two tablespoons of flour, add gradually one cup of liquid in which beef was cooked and stir until smooth; add the beef and let cool. When cold form into croquettes, dip in beaten egg, roll in crumbs and let stand a couple of hours before frying in hot fat.

CORNED BEEF HASH.—Remove gristle from cooked corned beef and chop the meat. To this add an equal quantity of cold boiled potatoes, chopped. Season with salt and pepper, put into hot, buttered frying-pan, moisten with milk and stir until well mixed. Let it brown slowly.

MARBLED VEAL.—Boil veal till very tender, then season highly with salt and pepper, and beat in a mortar till quite fine. Boil a tongue and remove the skin, cut up and beat quite fine, add a piece of butter size of an egg. Put a layer of veal into a brick-shaped tin, then strew in the pounded tongue and so on until the tin is full, then turn on a cupful of the veal liquor and press. When cold, slice.

MOCK DUCK.—Take four pounds of round steak, have it cut into two slices about an inch thick, sprinkle with salt and spread on a dressing made like turkey dressing. Roll and sew firmly in a cloth and steam four hours.

BAKED BEAN SOUP.—Put three cups of cold baked beans into a saucepan with three pints of water, one small onion, sliced, and one-quarter cup of celery. Let boil twenty minutes, or until onion and celery are cooked. Rub through a sieve, add one and one-half cup of stewed and strained tomatoes, season to taste with salt and pepper and thicken with two tablespoons of butter and two tablespoons of flour mixed together. —MRS. M. W., Augusta, Maine.

GREEN PEA SOUP.—Boil a pint of shelled peas until soft, in a coffee cupful of water. When done mash them then press through a soup strainer, adding three coffee cupfuls of hot milk to send all but the skins through the strainer. Return to the stove and add salt and white pepper to taste. Mix one-half tablespoonful of flour with a little cold milk and add to the soup when it has boiled two minutes, stirring all the time. Before serving add a tablespoon of melted butter.

BAKED MEAT.—Four pounds round steak chopped fine, eight crackers powdered fine, one cup milk, four eggs well beaten, three teaspoons salt, one and one-half teaspoons black pepper. Mix well together, put it in tin same as loaf bread and bake three hours.

BAKED MEAT WITH POTATO.—Cut remnants of meat in small pieces, season with butter, pepper and salt, add a little water. Put in earthen dish and cover with mashed potatoes, moistened with milk and seasoned with butter and salt. Bake about one-half hour.

VINEGAR CAKE.—Separate the whites and yolks of four eggs. Beat whites to a stiff froth, add one cup of sugar and one teaspoon of lemon flavoring. To the four beaten yolks add one tablespoon of vinegar. Add to whites of egg, beat well and last of all add one cup of flour containing one even teaspoon baking powder. Bake forty minutes in a slow oven.

HOT MILK SPONGE CAKE.—Beat three eggs six minutes, whip in one cup of sugar with cake spoon, one cup of unsifted flour; sift, adding one heaping teaspoon baking powder. Flavor, and last of all beat in one-half cup of hot milk. Bake forty minutes in a very slow oven.—MRS. J. M. J., Kingsburg, Cal.

SPONGE COOKIES.—Three eggs, one cup sugar, one heaping cup of flour, one heaping teaspoon of cream tartar, one-half teaspoon of soda. Beat the eggs to a stiff froth, add the sugar, sift the cream tartar into the flour and add, lastly dissolve the soda in a tablespoon of milk and beat in thoroughly. Drop teaspoons of the mixture on a buttered tin about three inches apart and bake in a quick oven.

COOKIES.—Heat together one cup molasses and one-half cup butter, add one teaspoon soda in three tablespoons cold water, one-half cup sugar scant, ginger, flour to roll. Bake in a quick oven.

VANILLA WAFERS.—One cup sugar, one egg, two-thirds cup butter, four tablespoons milk, one tablespoon vanilla, one and one-half teaspoons cream tartar and two-thirds teaspoon soda, flour enough to mix stiff. Roll thin and cut in squares.

MOONSHINE PIE.—One and one-quarter cup granulated sugar, four tablespoons flour, one cup sweet milk, butter size of an egg and vanilla. Mix flour and sugar together, then add milk, butter and flavoring and cook until thick. Beat the whites of three eggs to a stiff froth and mix through filling before putting into crusts that have been baked. Sprinkle with cocoanut.—MRS. RALPH HAMM, Vermont, R. R. 1, Ill.

LEFT-OVER BISCUIT.—This is a good way to utilize left-over biscuits. Soak them ten minutes and then drain off all the water that is not absorbed. Mash and add two cups of sugar to a quart of mashed biscuit. Grate and dissolve two squares of bitter chocolate; beat the yolks of four eggs, add a pinch of salt and mix all together. Butter your baking-pan or casserole and pour in the batter and bake. Beat the whites of the eggs to a froth, add one cup of sugar and put on top of pudding. Let brown.—MRS. J. E. M., Searcy, Ark.

VINEGAR PIE.—One-half cup good cider vinegar, one-half cup water, one-third cup sugar, and one-half teaspoon butter. Let come to boil, add thickening made of two tablespoons flour, yolk of one egg and enough water to make paste just thick enough to pour from cup. Have crust baked, fill, using whites of eggs for frosting. Set in oven and bake a golden brown.—MRS. F. M. ZENTZ, Marysville, Kans.

FRIED BANANAS WITH APPLE RINGS.—Peel, scrape and split lengthwise well-ripened bananas. Core and without peeling, cut tart apples into half-inch thick slices. Fry both bananas and apples in fat about one-fourth of an inch deep, sprinkling with a little brown sugar as they cook. Ham fat gives a delicious flavor. Have ready long strips of fairly thick brown or white bread toast, and on each piece lay half a banana and an apple ring.

BANANA WITH APPLE RINGS.

BAKED LAMB WITH DRESSING.—Take a hind quarter of lamb, make a dressing the same as for fowl, cut places in the lamb and fill with the dressing. Bake.

MELON PIE.—Chop fine one and one-half gallons of pie melon and cook until soft. Turn into large agate dish, add one quart of cooked cranberries, two tablespoons of vinegar, two level tablespoons of salt, and cinnamon and cloves to suit taste, with sugar enough to make good and sweet. Cook slowly until thick and use for pie filling.—MRS. BERTHA BROWNLEE, Logan, N. Mexico.

The Winning Gamble

by Alice L. Whitson

Presently he toppled over unconcious in his chair

Lawrence pushed her away from him and smiled maliciously as he staggered to his feet.

"I'm tempted to do it" Bonnie answered thoughtfully, "but somehow, I feel that I'd have to pay heavily for such a favor."

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

As old as the Old South was the name of Lathrop, and as proud as Lucifer were its descendants, but proudest and most lovable of all was Bonnie, the petted daughter of old Col. Lathrop, whose daring feats in the war of '61 had cost him a good right arm of which he had never ceased to boast.

With the kindness and generosity which marks a woman of the South as a true Southerner, Bonnie ruled Elmwood, the ancestral home of the Lathrops, and never before in the history of her young life had she been busier than at the present moment. It was her father's birthday, and she with the assistance of the servants was arranging the house for a party.

Social affairs at Elmwood were always done on a big scale, and in this instance Bonnie had spared neither pains nor money to make of it a great event. She had just put the finishing decorative touches to the dining-room when her father made his appearance in the doorway.

"There, you've gone and spoiled everything, Daddy," laughed the girl when she saw him, "just when I was planning to surprise you."

The old man patted Bonnie's cheek affectionately as his gaze wandered to the extended table and the massive birthday cake bearing its burden of many candles.

"This is a surprise, indeed, Bonnie," he said presently, "that you've arranged for your old Daddy."

"All for you," Bonnie declared as she gave him a hasty kiss and departed.

"All for me——" the old man repeated as he walked about the flower-decked room, "all for me—and how will I ever pay for it?"

Leaving the dining-room, he made his way into the old-fashioned library, and dropping wearily into a seat before the massive desk which had been his father's father's, he unlocked the top drawer and began pulling out one by one stacks of unpaid bills; these he tossed carelessly aside—they were a matter of small consideration to him compared to the last document in the drawer—this he drew out with nervous hands and studied it carefully; only one sheet it was, but quite enough to upset his nerves. In part it read:

"Therefore do not ask for further assistance from us; the mortgage is long overdue and a settlement must be made.

"Respectfully yours,
"KERRIN REALTY CO."

"Come, Daddy," called Bonnie from the doorway, "your guests are arriving."

Hastily putting away the papers, the old man arose and followed his daughter to the big veranda where to his surprise he beheld a number of his war-time comrades in uniform coming up the broad walk, accompanied by either a son or daughter.

After a general greeting between both the old and the young folks, Bonnie seated her father and his guests under a tree on one side of the big lawn, then kissing her father good by she joined the young people who stood chatting together on the spacious veranda.

"For our pleasure," Bonnie said with a sidewise glance towards the tree where her father was entertaining his old friends, "I have arranged a morning ride."

Leading the way to the stables, she bade her friends choose for themselves from among the Elmwood horses the horse they would like best to ride, and presently they were off.

Bonnie on the back of a black thoroughbred, followed by a pack of hounds and a gay crowd, led the way, taking the meadow fences as she came to them.

Among the riders was Lawrence Trabue, famed far more for his financial position in the world than for his social qualities. The Trabue plantation joined the Lathrops, and for years and years young Trabue had been linking together in his mind the two by the simple trick of matrimony. Consequently, while Bonnie went galloping joyously over the meadow, Lawrence rode leisurely along, mentally visioning how the great meadow would look with the dividing fence gone. Clearly he saw himself as master of the great estates which, when joined together, would be the show place of the South.

For a moment he turned his gaze toward a lavishly decorated house on the east hill; everything about it bespoke money—it was a thing the Trabues were immensely proud of and made no pretense of denying it—a showy thing was the home of Lawrence Trabue, and quite as new as the money which built it.

Turning slowly, he let his eyes rest on the Colonial home of the Lathrops that decorated the opposite hill; every line and curve about it acclaimed in silence its stateliness, ancestral wealth and grandeur. This, however, made no impression on Lawrence—to him it was an old rattletrap compared to the new mansion—it was the Lathrop land he wanted.

Glancing about for the riders, Lawrence discovered that he was far behind, but in the moment of hesitancy he had decided on one thing—he would ask Bonnie to marry him without further delay.

To think with Lawrence was to act, and presently he was making a frantic effort to overtake the leader. One by one, he passed the riders, but it was not until Bonnie of her own free will halted under a massive tree that he overtook her.

"Bonnie," he said when at last he reached her side, "when are you going to marry me?"

"You don't care for me, it's my plantation you want," laughed Bonnie.

"Your plantation is a secondary matter, Bonnie," the man responded earnestly. "Please say you will marry me now."

"Let's not spoil father's birthday with an engagement," laughed the girl, and before Lawrence could press his suit further Bonnie was calling her guests to return home.

At Elmwood the merrymakers found the old folks as joyous as when they went away, and dismounting their horses, they joined them.

"Have we been away long, father?" asked Bonnie as she dropped down on the arm of her father's chair to give him a gentle caress.

"Long?" said the old man, glancing around the circle of companions, "not so long, really, Bonnie, but since you youngsters have been out riding, we old cronies have been through five years of war."

"Then, no doubt, you are getting hungry," answered the girl. "I'll run in and see about the dinner right away."

The birthday dinner was a great success; everybody was happy, but none seemingly so joyous as the host—but when he began an episode of the Civil War times, Bonnie called his hand.

"You forget, father," she said sweetly, "we have World War heroes with us today—let's omit war themes."

Colonel Lathrop's eyes rested for an instant on the medals of honor worn by two of his guests, then with a wave of his hand dismissed the subject altogether.

It was late afternoon when the party after many handshakes and joyous expressions departed, leaving Bonnie, young Trabue, and the old Colonel alone on the veranda.

Bonnie arranged a chair for her father, then noticed with anxiety how he dropped into it.

With loving hands she arranged the pillows beneath his head, and taking her accustomed place on the arm of his chair, she fanned him to sleep.

Slipping gently away, she joined Trabue and the two went down the broad steps together.

"Are you ready to say 'yes' to me now, Bonnie?" the man asked as they wandered through the old-fashioned garden.

Bonnie shook her head, but Trabue wasn't so easily put off—he pleaded his cause earnestly, though through the thin veneer of his lover's appeal Bonnie read his heart aright—it was not herself he really wanted, but the Lathrop plantation. While he talked his eyes had wandered from the face of the girl to the broad rolling meadow land beyond, and Bonnie had been quick to sense it.

Suddenly she stepped away from him and smiled cynically.

"I will not consider a matrimonial proposal prompted by greed," she answered, and before he could say any more she was making her way toward the house.

Lawrence realized he had made a mistake, and tried to overtake Bonnie, but she beat him to the steps; there, however, she bade him good by and watched him depart with an expression of relief on her pretty face.

Bonnie's light step on the veranda roused the old man from his nap, and smiling fondly upon her, he beckoned her to his side.

"You're better, father?" Bonnie asked eagerly.

"Oh, yes," answered the man, "but, Bonnie, that big dinner was most too much for one of my tender years, though I'm all right now."

To prove his statement he eased out of his chair and made a few rounds of the veranda. Suddenly a serious expression covered his face, and moving towards the door he laughingly announced that he had some business matters to attend to in the library.

Scarcely had the Colonel entered the house when Bonnie saw a big car coming up the driveway, and presently a stranger got out.

Approaching the steps, he bowed politely to the girl then in a straightforward way proceeded to state his business.

"I have come to see Colonel Lathrop," he said gruffly. "Is he at home?"

Bonnie nodded her head, then extended her hand.

"I am his daughter," she said pleasantly. "Won't you be seated while I go for my father."

"Tell him," the man answered in the same gruff voice, "that Paul Kerrin of Kerrin Realty Company is calling and is pushed for time."

"I will tell him," answered the girl, but just as she entered the door she came face to face with her father coming out.

"Mr. Kerrin," said the Colonel, courteously extending his hand as he came out, "this is, indeed, an unexpected pleasure."

"You received my letter?" answered Kerrin unceremoniously.

"Yes," answered the Colonel, "but I have been too busy to answer."

"So we surmised," answered Kerrin, "but the house is in need of money and cannot carry its creditors longer."

Colonel Lathrop turned to Bonnie.

"You will go, daughter," he said falteringly, "this gentleman has business with me."

"But, father," protested the girl, "he spoke as if you owed him money—as if we were his debtors."

"It does seem a bit strange," interrupted Kerrin as he critically eyed the magnificent grounds of the Lathrop home, "but, nevertheless, such is the case, and we have carried your father as long as we can carry him without a settlement. We must either have some money or foreclose the mortgage."

"Mortgage—mortgage!" exclaimed the girl, glaring at the speaker angrily. "You mean to say our home is mortgaged? Tell me it isn't true, father," she cried anxiously, turning to the old man.

Colonel Lathrop's arms went about the girl's slender figure lovingly and for a moment he stood looking at her in silence, then bowing his gray head on her young shoulder, he said:

"It is true, Bonnie, my child—the old place is mortgaged for all it will stand—and unless we can raise the money to lift that mortgage we are going to lose it forever."

Suddenly Bonnie turned to the visitor. "Just how much do we owe?" she asked.

"Twenty thousand dollars," answered Kerrin.

"And unless we raise that amount?" asked Bonnie.

"We foreclose," responded the man.

"Give me thirty days," begged Bonnie eagerly, "then come again and we will settle the matter."

Kerrin debated the question in his mind for a moment as he eyed the two, then he smiled.

"Thirty days won't make much difference," he said thoughtfully, "I grant your request—but, remember," he cautioned as he moved away, "I will come back on the thirtieth day and unless there is a monetary settlement then I shall foreclose the mortgage."

In silence Colonel Lathrop and his daughter watched the visitor depart, then Bonnie turned eager, questioning eyes upon her father.

"You must take me into your confidence, father," she said earnestly, "whatever our indebtedness is I must know it."

"Come," said the old man, realizing the truth of her statement, "we will begin at once."

* * * * * * *

Slowly Bonnie followed him into the library and immediately they started over the old accounts.

Bonnie noticed that her father's hands trembled with nervousness as he laid before her the various papers, and presently he toppled over unconscious in his chair.

Calling a servant, Bonnie ordered him carried to his room then ran to the telephone and called Dr. West, the family physician.

Lawrence Trabue having nothing better to do, made his way into the city and round to a little theater where he was joined by a bunch of chorus girls who made much of him and his money.

When Dr. West arrived at Elmwood Bonnie met him at the door and hurried him up the stairs to her father's room where the most important being in the world so far as she was concerned, lay writhing in agony.

Dr. West examined his patient carefully, then with a very grave face announced to Bonnie that her father was suffering with a stroke of paralysis.

Bonnie's grief touched the doctor's heart, and he comforted her as best he could.

"You are sure he will not walk again soon?" Bonnie questioned eagerly as she followed Dr. West down stairs.

"Not for months," said the doctor, "perhaps a year—then, again, he might regain the use of his legs within a few days. Paralysis is a peculiar thing, my dear," continued the man thoughtfully, "you never can tell about it; I have known cases that looked hopeless to recover, and then I have known cases that looked slight which proved life-lasting. Just now," he went on, thinking to divert Bonnie's mind from her own troubles, "I have a very singular case; shall I tell you about it?"

"Yes, yes," answered Bonnie absent-mindedly, "tell me about it."

"Well," answered the doctor as he took his seat on the sofa, "you remember the gentleman I pointed out to you last year at the race?"

"The one you called a gentleman gambler?" responded Bonnie as she called to mind the Derby race of the previous year which she had attended with her father and the doctor.

Clearly she visioned again the handsome young fellow in a gay checked suit, betting heavily on the spirited horses, and never once failing to pick the winner; she remembered also with a hurt feeling in her heart that her father had been a heavy loser while the happy-go-lucky chap in the gray suit had raked in the coin.

"Just as he won in the races," continued the doctor, "it seems he has won in everything else, but in a card game recently somebody seemed to resent his luck and shot to kill him; the bullet, however, passed through his body and only left him with paralyzed legs. He may regain the use of them some day, but, personally, I don't think he will, because he has nothing in life worth fighting for; he has no people, it seems, to care for him. To a man like that life means so little he will not make the fighting effort necessary for his recovery. He may live one month, he may live six months—but without something to stimulate him, no longer than that, and he's rolling in money—oodles of it—nobody to leave it to when he dies."

"Too bad," answered Bonnie listlessly, "that a man should waste his life like that—but it's father's paralysis, Dr. West, that's bothering me; what shall I do about him?"

Dr. West looked at his watch and arose.

"I shall return at ten this evening; he will have awakened by that time from the effect of the drugs I gave him; meantime you must make your plans to get him away from here. New scenes and different climate will help a lot toward his recovery."

When the door closed upon the doctor, Bonnie began to pace the room restlessly; turn where she would, she could see no ray of hope in the darkness.

Carefully she went over the accounts in her father's desk; the enormous sum of their indebtedness staggered her—bills, bills, bills—and besides that the mortgage of twenty thousand dollars against their old home. Take her father away—how could she? Suddenly she raised her head and smiled, then ran to the 'phone and called for Lawrence Trabue.

Trabue, in a drunken condition, answered it. His voice frightened Bonnie; nevertheless, she bade him come to her immediately, then cautiously mounting the stairs, she entered her father's room.

All was peaceful and quiet, he was sleeping soundly, but for fear he might awaken before the doctor arrived, she called an old negro servant to sit near the bedside until she returned.

Going to her own spacious bedroom, she slipped into a soft silken gown and viewed herself in the long mirror. There was a way she could help her father and she would do it. Vividly she recalled the episode of the morning, when Lawrence Traube had declared his love for herself—she had refused him then—but now, whether he loved her or not, she would marry him immediately. The Trabues had plenty of money; Lawrence, she reasoned, would willingly assume their indebtedness, and they would go off on their honeymoon, taking her father with them.

She had it all planned out by the time Lawrence Trabue arrived. Disregarding his undesirable state, she related what had taken place since he went away, and then proceeded to unfold her plans.

"You say the plantation is mortgaged for twenty thousand?" Trabue stammered when the girl had ceased speaking. "N-nice little sum to wish off on a bridegroom."

"It's awful, Lawrence," answered Bonnie wistfully," but you'll have to shoulder my debts if you take me." Picking up the stack of unpaid bills on the desk she laid them in his lap. "These will also go to the bridegroom," she said slowly.

Lawrence fingered them indifferently, then looked at the girl.

"Nice little gift for a bridegroom," he repeated cynically, "nice little—gift——"

"I know I am not worth that, Lawrence," said Bonnie as she laid her white hand on his arm, "but the plantation is, and really if you'll assume my obligations I'll be the best little wife in the world to make up for it."

Lawrence pushed her away from him and smiled maliciously as he staggered to his feet, then in a tone that withered the spirits of Bonnie, he spoke.

"Bonnie Lathrop, the mistress of Elmwood, and Bonnie Lathrop the beggar," he said, inconsiderately, "are two different people in my eyes, and I can't say—I'm particularly—interested in the beggar."

Bonnie looked at the speaker in astonishment as the truth dawned upon her, and a feeling of repugnance for the man before her stole through her soul—but this was the one way she saw to help her father—she was desperate, he must marry her.

Throwing her arms about him, she reminded him of the statement he had made that morning concerning her and her plantation.

"I might accept you and the plantation," answered Lawrence as he unclasped her arms, "but the old man and the debts are not for me."

"Then you won't marry me?" Bonnie asked earnestly.

"I didn't say that," protested the man. "I said I wouldn't take the debts and the old man."

Suddenly the beauty of the girl before him seemed to intoxicate him more than he was already.

"I'll take you, debts and all," he exclaimed excitedly, and clasping his arms about her, he covered her face with kisses.

"You brute!" exclaimed Bonnie frantically when she finally managed to get out of his clutch, "get out of my house and never let me see your face again."

Trabue was slow to understand the meaning of Bonnie's sudden change of mind; not even when the door had closed upon him did he realize definitely what had happened. With faltering step he crossed the lawn to his little gray car.

Left alone in her misery, Bonnie walked restlessly up and down the polished floor wringing her hands.

Twice old Dorothy, the cook, had made her appearance in the door with a tray of tempting food, but each time Bonnie had begged her to go away and leave her alone. Finally old Dorothy sensed something was wrong and flatly refused to go.

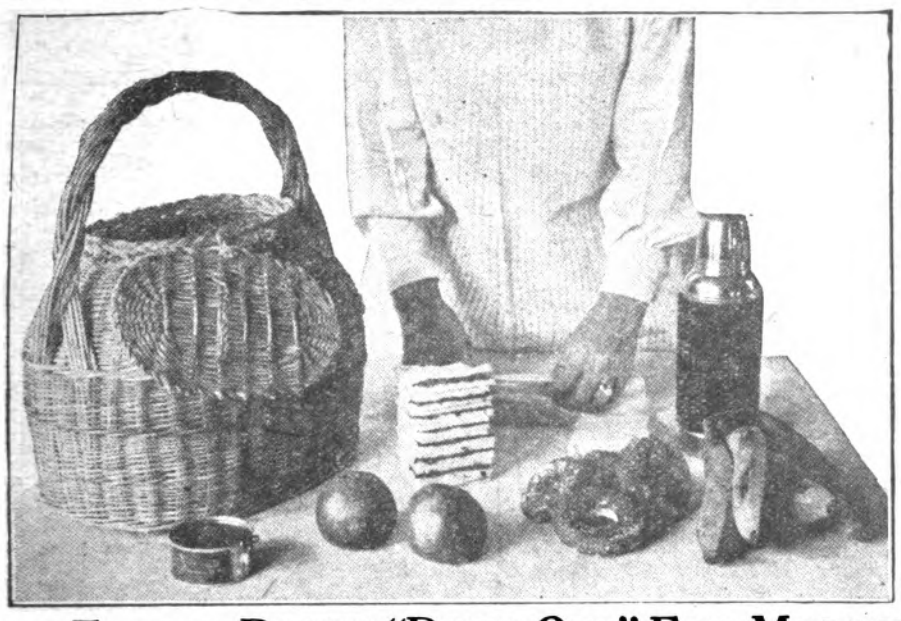
"I'ze been in dis house most twict as long as yo' is, and 'spects to stay here 'till I dies," said the old negress, "so come 'long and rest a spell for yo'h ole Mammy."

Without further opposition Bonnie allowed the devoted servant to tuck her up on the sofa like a little child; she feigned sleep, and old Dorothy covered her up and left the room.

But scarcely had the door closed upon the old Mammy before Bonnie was up again. Watching eagerly the hands of the old-fashioned clock move slowly 'round the dial, she continued to walk. At the table she paused and again nervously fingered the unpaid bills that had so disturbed her, when suddenly a strange expression came over her face—a new thought had entered her brain—a new way had suggested itself by which she might help her old father.

At ten o'clock Dr. West, accompanied by a nurse, made his appearance, and the three went up-stairs together.

Just as he had predicted, Dr. West found Colonel Lathrop coming out from under the influence of the strong powders he had given him. His face revealing clearly the agony he was undergoing, helpless, hopeless, he begged his old friend to tell him the truth regarding his condition.



After serious consideration Dr. West decided it might be best, so in a gentle way he told the sufferer that it would probably be months before he would be able to walk again, and never would his heart bear great excitement.

"This young lady, however," said the doctor as he introduced the nurse, "will bring you through if you will but be patient."

Then giving the nurse instructions what to do, he left the room.

Bonnie followed him to the veranda, questioning him earnestly regarding her father. Then suddenly she caught his arm and turned him

THE FAMILY PLANS "DAYS OFF" FOR MOTHER

By Violet Marsh

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THERE should be a deliberate effort during the out-of-doors months to seize every opportunity for providing the mother of the family with days to be spent in some form of relaxation. If only one day at a time is possible, even that much away from cooking, dishwashing, sewing, or any of the heavier home tasks, goes a long way toward resting a weary brain and tired muscles.

Of course "Mother" is apt to think that the beforehand preparations for a day off are a great deal of bother and not worth the effort, but this isn't the point; "Mother" simply must get away from the scenes of her daily routine and it becomes the duty of her family to make this possible.

Most parents love the streams, the cozy roadside nooks and woods almost as well as the children, and whether the selected spot is one or many miles from home, it matters little if only it be in the great outdoor. However, the distance will undoubtedly be gauged by your mode of travel; in the family automobile, or behind old dobbin, but in either case the real fun will depend on the spirit of the day. If everybody bears in mind that outings like this constitute "Mother's" vacation, there will be an affectionate competition as to who shall attend to the few details of preparation and clearing up connected with the trip.

Planning a Day's Outing

Don't undertake elaborate preparations, because they spoil a picnic. You need only to count on ravenous appetites which demand plain, hearty food and plenty of it. Providing everything is prepared at home, you cannot do better than to fill your lunch basket and boxes with hearty sandwiches, simple cakes, jars of milk and doughnuts. Freshly-picked cucumbers, tomatoes or lettuce will be wholesome and delicious with the sandwiches. One of the best picnic sandwiches I know of is made of thin corn cake and bacon. Split and butter the corn cake while warm, and add the bacon hot from the frying-pan. Wrap them at once in paraffin paper. Another good sandwich is made of either white or coarse bread, filled with scrambled egg. Avoid thick slices of bread, and butter generously. Allow one egg to two whole slices of bread. To each egg add one dessertspoon of milk, a pinch of salt and a dash of cayenne pepper. Beat the egg sufficiently to thoroughly break the egg whites, add the milk and pour into a frying-pan which contains about half a teaspoon of butter to each egg. Cook over a hot fire while constantly beating until firm, but not hard. A variation is made by omitting the milk and using one cup of fresh ripe tomato cut into small pieces to six eggs. This makes an excellent sandwich.

Fruit is the best finish to your lunch.

Eating out of doors as often as possible is a "specialty" in one home I know. A one-compartment fireless cooker was bought for the purpose of having a hot dinner outdoors with the least effort. If the family started out just before mealtime, the fireless was put "aboard" with its contents all ready to serve; if earlier in the day, and the food was in process of cooking, the fireless was well covered with blankets.

If you have a place at the water's edge where it is safe to build a fire, cooking outdoors offers much in the way of entertainment. A fish chowder made indoors never tastes quite as good. Where one particular place is frequently resorted to, it will make good fun some day to build a stove from stones and a square of sheet-iron, all ready for use on the next occasion. To do this, you use stones that will rest securely on the other, and build a square hollow pier. The chief thing is to get top rocks for the corners that will make a level support for the sheet-iron top. The side rocks can be placed so as to control the draft. One side is left open through which to arrange the fuel, which is usually dry dead wood, bark or pinecones.

The portable outfits that burn solid alcohol are very popular for outdoor heat. They must be used in a sheltered place, else the heat will not rise directly under the frying-pan. On this page is pictured the necessary equipment for a highly satisfying roadside lunch, and even the lone hiker would have no difficulty in carrying it. Over a small tin of solid alcohol the coffee is made, and if you can set it aside in a sheltered place and wrap your coat or sweater around it to keep in the heat, so much the better. You next fry your thinly sliced bacon and push it to one side of the pan if you have not brought along a small tin plate. You then fry thin slices of brown-bread in the bacon fat, and your meal is ready.

The vacuum bottle is a great comfort if one cares for something very hot or cold with the lunch.

PEACH FLUFF.

OUTFIT FOR ROADSIDE COOKING.

GREEN CORN FRITTERS.

August Recipes

CANNED FISH.—Tough-skinned fish such as perch and cunners should have the skins removed. This is easily done by cutting down the entire length of fish each side of the fins with a sharp-pointed knife, then around the head just through the skin. Now hold the fish by the head with the left hand and peel down the skin with the right. Cut off the fins, head and tail, and clean. Rub lightly with salt, roll in flour and meal mixed, and fry brown in tried-out salt pork.

SALMON PASTE WITH NEW BOILED POTATOES.—Use fresh boiled or canned salmon of a reliable brand. Remove skin and bones. To each cup of salmon allow two hard-boiled eggs sliced, one tablespoon of lemon juice, a little pepper, salt to taste, one tablespoon of olive oil, or two of melted butter. Stir well together and put through the food chopper, using the coarse knife. Scrape new potatoes, cover with boiling salted water and boil hard until a fork will pierce them. Drain at once and shake over a hot cover until dry. Break with a fork, turn into a hot dish, pour over melted butter and sprinkle with parsley.

PICNIC TONGUE.—Wash and scrub a large beef tongue. Cover with boiling water, and add a good handful of celery tops, a sliced carrot, half an onion, and salt and pepper when the tongue is about half done. Cook slowly until tender. Remove from liquor, scrape and roll in melted butter and fine bread-crumbs. Set in a hot oven and when it commences to brown baste with liquor in which it was cooked. When well browned remove from oven. Serve hot or cold. The liquor can serve as a foundation to dried bean or fresh vegetable soup.

STUFFED TOMATO SALAD.—Boil the frame of a cooked chicken, strain, and boil down to one cupful. Soak one tablespoon of granulated gelatine in a little cold water and add to the hot chicken stock. Season with salt, a dash of cayenne pepper and one tablespoon of lemon juice, and set away to stiffen. Select ripe tomatoes, remove a slice from the top and scrape out the soft part of the center. Add to the cold gelatine some chopped cooked chicken, a little tender celery chopped fine, and if it is to be served at once add a little crisp cucumber. Fill the tomatoes and serve on lettuce leaves, topping with a teaspoon of mayonnaise if desired.

CARROT CONSERVE.—This should be made while the carrots are about half grown, and from the table variety. Scrape and slice thin. Cook slowly until tender, keeping the water just over the carrots. Drain, saving the water, and press the carrots through a potato ricer and return to water. Measure, and allow two lemons to each pint, and as much sugar as you have carrot. Put the carrot, sugar and grated lemon rind together and slowly cook until thick, add the lemon juice, cook five minutes longer, and pour into jelly glasses. When cold, cover with paraffin.

NEW ONIONS IN CREAM.—Peel and boil onions until tender, keeping the water just to cover at first, and then allowing it to boil down as the onions cook. In this way a greater amount of the mineral salts is retained. Make thin oven toast, butter and sprinkle with grated cheese. Drain the onions, lay them on the toast, lightly sprinkle with grated cheese, pour over enough scalded cream to wet the toast and set in the oven ten minutes. Serve at once.

BOILED SPINACH.—Wash spinach and remove roots and fibrous stems. Drain and put on to cook without the addition of water. As heating begins, turn the spinach and it will be found there is plenty of its own juices for cooking. After thorough boiling begins, set the kettle on the back of stove to simmer about 15 minutes. Skim out the spinach so as not to get any grit which may have settled in the bottom of kettle. Drain thoroughly, cutting through and turning in the colander so as to make it dry as possible. Dress with melted butter and garnish with slices of hard-boiled egg, or the grated yolk.

SUMMER SQUASH.—Cook whole, keeping the water low in the kettle. If the squash can be steamed, it is the proper way to cook it. When in prime condition, the shell of the squash should be soft and show juice when a slight break is made through it. When tender, mash with a fork without removing the seeds. Season with butter, pepper and salt.

SUGARED BEETS.—In trimming beets allow four inches of the top to remain on to prevent "bleeding." In washing care should be taken not to break the skins and the roots left on. Cover with boiling water and cook tender. Slice thin, arrange in layers in a serving dish, dressing each layer with melted butter, a very light shaking of salt and a sprinkling of sugar. Set into the oven until very hot and the sugar is melted.

GREEN-CORN FRITTERS.—Cut tender corn from the cob by holding the cob on end in a plate with the left hand, and slicing the corn lengthwise from the cob with a sharp knife. Care must be taken not to cut into the hull. The cob is scraped lengthwise after the corn is sliced off, which saves the finest part of the kernel. To one cup of corn, one teaspoon of sugar, one-fourth teaspoon of salt, one cup of fine cracker-crumbs, one teaspoon of baking powder, the yolk of one egg beaten light, and if necessary, after the mixture is thoroughly mixed, add a little milk or thin cream. If the corn is very young, the thin part scraped from the corn will generally supply plenty moisture with the egg. Lastly fold in the beaten white of one egg. Drop by teaspoonfuls in deep fat and fry to a light brown.

SUCCOTASH.—Cook fresh lima beans until soft and the water has been reduced to a little more than to cover. Cut an equal quantity of raw young corn from the cob in the manner described in the preceding recipe for Green Corn Fritters. Add one teaspoon of sugar to each pint and cook ten minutes. Season with salt, a dash of pepper and butter.

CREAM CHEESE DRESSING.—For cold cooked vegetables or raw salads, mix half a teaspoon of mustard, half a teaspoon of salt, one-third teaspoon of paprika and add it to one-half cup of whipped sour cream. In whipping care should be taken that it does not turn to butter. Thicken ten tablespoons of hot milk with corn-starch wet in cold water and cook three minutes. Add this hot mixture to the sour cream mixture and slowly add three tablespoons of lemon juice, stirring constantly. Cool. Beat into this two cream cheeses until the whole is light and foamy.

PEACH FLUFF.—Cut ripe peaches into fourths, then slice these lengthwise. Cover with sugar and let stand until it is nearly dissolved in the peach juice. Beat one egg white very dry, then gradually beat in one cup of cream. Into this beat the juice and sugar from the peaches. To serve, arrange the peach and fluff in layers in individual dishes.

OATMEAL COOKIES.—Cream three-fourths cup of butter with one cup of sugar, add two beaten eggs and four tablespoons of milk in which three-fourths teaspoon of soda has been dissolved. Sift one and one-half cup of flour with one-half teaspoon of cinnamon, then mix with two and one-half cups of rolled oats, and add to egg mixture. Lastly add one-half cup of chopped raisins, or they may be omitted. Drop by spoonfuls on greased pans and bake 15 or 20 minutes in a moderate oven. Excellent for picnics.

FILLED COOKIES.—One-half cup of butter creamed with one cup of sugar. Add one beaten egg, the grated rind of one lemon, pinch of salt, and beat well. Add one-half cup of milk and one pint of flour sifted with two level teaspoons of baking powder and one scant teaspoon of soda. Beat well, then add flour to handle. Roll very thin, cut in rounds, and fill tin. Spread with filling to within one-half inch of the edge, then put the top rounds on. Press edges together and bake in a fairly hot oven with even heat top and bottom. The secret of these cookies is getting them rolled thin.

FILLING.—Use thick strawberry jam, or a filling made from chopped raisins and dates in equal parts, sweetened and cooked with a little corn-starch to thicken. Use cold.

CANNED FIGS.—Where figs grow abundantly, a generous supply should be canned for winter. Use only those that are sound and firm. If put through a soda solution the skins become tender. To do this, use one level cupful of soda to four quarts of boiling water. Pour this over six quarts of figs and allow them to stand five minutes in this bath. Drain at once and rinse through several cold-water baths until free from the solution, then drain again. Make a syrup of equal parts of water and granulated sugar. Put the figs into the syrup and cook one hour slowly. Pack the figs carefully into jars, then fill with syrup. Partly seal and cook 30 minutes in a hot-water bath with water half way up the side of jar. Seal.

ORANGE OR LEMON PECTIN.—Strawberries, raspberries, cherries, blueberries, blackberries and plums do not make satisfactory jelly because they lack pectin. Orange or lemon pectin may be added, using one-half as much as fruit or berry juice. The pectin is made by scraping off the yellow peel, then putting the white portion through the food chopper. For each half pound allow four cups of cold water. Let stand several hours and then boil for ten minutes. Cool and add four cups of cold water, let stand over night and boil next morning and then strain through a jelly bag. This pectin may be prepared whenever orange peels are available, canned and cooked in the jars 30 minutes, and kept for later use.

FRUIT BUTTERS.—This method of preserving fruit is one of the oldest and best. Where there is a large family a bountiful supply can be made with less labor than when the fruit is made into jellies. Fruit butters are excellent for school lunches. Tart apples, or half as much sweet apple as tart make excellent butter. A little cinnamon and lemon rind make a delicious flavoring. Plums and grape pulp, pears with one-third quinces, peaches and green gage plums are other good combinations. Fruit butters are made by cutting up the fruit and cooking tender in as little water as possible, then pressing the fruit through a fine colander. Measure, and add two-thirds as much sugar as you have pulp, then cook together until thick. Stir frequently while cooking. Butters can be paraffined the same as jelly.

QUINCE HONEY.—Pare five quinces and grate the pulp from the cores. Cut parings and cores into small pieces, cover with boiling water, cook one hour and drain. Cover the grated pulp with cold water just to cover and let stand while the parings and cores are cooking. Add the water drained from parings and cook until the pulp is tender. Measure and add an equal amount of sugar, the grated rind and juice of one lemon and one orange, and cook 30 minutes or longer.

muslin or any heavier material and cut a piece four inches larger than the table, hem and run seam binding in for draw strings. Just out over the table, draw tightly and tie. If you want it to be real fancy, embroider or applique some design on it.

To the sisters who are obliged to carry water a distance, let me say I sympathize with you. It means a trip for water when you are the busiest. Of course if there are children large enough to carry it, it isn't so bad but it isn't good for them to carry heavy loads and they always want to carry a "Lazy man's load" so they can get back to their play. Let me tell you how we got a well at the cost of $30.00, a nice three-foot sink cost $10.00 and we have a pump right in the kitchen and have plenty of water all the time. The good John and I make every penny count so instead of paying a drilling machine a large sum of money for drilling a well, he got the necessary tools, rope, drill, etc., and we drilled our own well. Some days we worked only a little while in the morning and evening. I drilled a foot one day. How proud we were when we went one morning and found water standing in our well within sixteen feet of the top. We tried to bail it out but couldn't. A flash-light let down on a rope lets you know how things are. I had a notion to not tell you about the time it caved in, but that was the only discouraging thing and it might have been worse. We might have lost the tools, but anyway we cleaned it out. It wasn't an easy job but it saved money and it is so handy to have all the water we need.

No doubt you sisters remember Bernice Lee whose picture came out in December COMFORT. She is almost three years old now and just as mischievous as she looked to be, but when she gets naughty I have a piece of soft muslin which I fasten to the door knob and tie her by the arm, put her in her little rocking chair, with her playthings and leave her tied fifteen or twenty minutes. Does she cry? No, she just screams but that is good for her lungs and it lets the steam off. Soon she will be begging, "Please mother, let me loose. I will be good and stay out of things." Doesn't it annoy my neighbors? I do not live near enough to anyone so they can hear and anyway I never pay any attention to what people say. For example, when Bernice Lee was a baby she laid in a basket and her ears, in moving her head, would get turned the wrong way, till I was afraid she would have outstanding ears. I just powdered behind her ears and fastened them back with a piece of court plaster. Of course she looked funny and the neighbors were scandalized but now her ears are as good as anybody's. Wasn't that better than having her look like a lop-eared hound? When she was one year old I cut her hair close to her head with clippers so now her hair is thick and soft as silk. What do I look like? I am twenty years old and am going to send my picture sometime in the future so keep your subscriptions renewed and you won't miss seeing me.

MRS. DAISY WHITEMAN.

POTEAU, BOX 147, OKLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

If you will listen long enough I will tell you of my most thrilling experience.

It was about three years ago and one evening, after a very pleasant day, my father, mother and I were sitting on the porch, talking. All at once we heard a low rumbling sound but we paid little attention to it for we thought it was thunder. It kept getting louder and then all at once a ball of fire shot out of the sky. Such screaming and praying I never expect to hear again until the end of Time. My father was in his stocking feet and he said the heat from it almost scorched his feet. We were told that it was a comet or meteor but I have no comments to make only to say that I don't believe I will ever be as frightened again.

I would like to hear from some of the sisters.

Love to all. ESTER SIMPSON.

BELMONT, LA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you please give me a little space. I have read COMFORT for a long time and get lots of helpful hints from the letters in the Sisters' Corner.

I liked the letter of A Marine's Wife. I would like to hear from any of the sisters who had boys or friends in the 4th Div. 3rd Bn. Co. I, 58th Inf. for my husband was in that branch of the service. He was in four heavy battles but returned home without a wound.

I have a sweet baby boy, 20 months old, named J. W., Jr. We have our own home and enjoy farm life.

I will tell you the most exciting happening of my life. One Sunday afternoon my husband and I went to visit my mother. When we were ready to eat supper the telephone rang. I answered it and the call was from one of my neighbors and she told me my house was on fire. I threw the receiver down and ran screaming that our house was afire. My husband and brother jumped into our buggy and started home but there I was, two and one-half miles away, and everything we had burning up. All I could do was cry. The telephone soon rang and father answered it and was told that it was a great mistake; that they saw the sun shining against the windows on the west side and thought that it was on fire. You can imagine how thankful I was.

Love to all of you. MRS. J. W. WEBB.

NEWPORT, KY.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

May I join your pleasant circle? I hear you all chatting so very happily and giving your opinions and your helps along the way. All certainly have splendid "helps" to pass along to one another. I am requesting very peculiar help and if I receive it I'll be very thankful.

The coming fall season I expect to go to the southwest, and I would like to hear from the sisters in or about these localities: El Paso, Texas, Las Cruces, New Mexico, or any other large cities in New Mexico in particular, in regard to employment in the printing trades, that is, bindery work, etc., if there are any possibilities for such work in said places for that is the line of work I want to find.

I wonder how many of the sisters realize all the work there is in getting up our very enjoyable and very important COMFORT. How I would like to see the presses turning out the copies. As I write this I can imagine that I see the whole plant in operation.

I'll give a few tips and hope they will help you. Cut off all addresses that come to you, printed or typewritten on envelopes and magazines. Pinned or pasted on laundry or any other packages, these save time as well as give a legible address.

To finish the ends of a blanket, the ribbon of which is frayed, a quick and serviceable way is to crochet an edge (half or whole buttonhole) with a bone hook. Use either wool or fast color cotton that matches the stripes in blanket.

When making spice cake, to insure the full strength of your spices, put them in a small cup and pour boiling water over them—just enough to dissolve them. This method will result in a uniform flavor throughout the cake and produces an even color.

How many of the sisters use a marble when darning the finger of a glove? It is easier than slipping the glove on your hand to mend it.

Although I am a business girl I have domestic tastes and love everything pertaining to housekeeping. I also love poetry and music.

Wishing health, prosperity and happiness to one and all, SUNNY JANE OF KENTUCKY.

Sunny Jane.—Thanks for the snapshot of yourself. It has been duly pasted into my COMFORT Sisters' Album.

A visit to COMFORT'S plant would be worthwhile to anyone but doubly appreciated by anyone familiar with such work, as the presses and other equipment are thoroughly modern.

It is unfortunate you did not give me permission to sign your real name to your letter (a good letter, too) for you would have gotten replies first hand instead of waiting to have them forwarded.—Ed.

RINGOLD, WASH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I've wanted to write for years but I was afraid that "Billy" of Uncle Lisha's would get my letter.

Why, of course, all these letters are genuine. I have a very high opinion of Mrs. W. but I don't believe even she could think of all the good things in these letters.

We haven't been introduced yet. If I were a blonde I could call myself "fair, fat and forty" but alas I'm a decided brunette. I have been reducing so I weigh only 240 pounds now.

I am a teacher of over twenty years' experience and I spend my vacations with my husband in the mountains of Western Montana where we take our sheep to summer range. Some of my experiences are not pleasant but on the whole I enjoy the life. Our highest point is on the summit of the Bitter Root Mountains on the Idaho-Montana boundary line, at an elevation of 7,521 feet.

We were to tell of some "thrills" we have had. One morning early I decided to take a short stroll. Rounding a mountainside I met a bear. My heart skipped a beat, maybe more, but my brain was on the job and told me that the bear had the right of way. He was as startled as I for he bounded down the mountainside. It was a silver tip which is a type of grizzly bear considered very dangerous. Old bear hunters say no bear is dangerous unless wounded or a mother with cubs.

Have I a twin anywhere in this wide world? I've never found one yet. I was born August 5, 1881.

Mothers, help purify our rising generation. Do not permit indecent exposure in dress, powder and paint, in jazz and uncensored movies. Try to get more wholesome amusement before our young people. They think they are wise and right but we older ones really know. My mother used to tell me, "Young folks think old folks are fools but old folks know young ones are." I didn't believe it then but I do now.

Thank you, dear Mrs. Wilkinson, for giving me this space.

A new sister, ALICE B. AYERS.

PARLIN, COLO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you let me in for the third and last time? I just want to thank all who wrote me for their kind letters. The coming of a new little daughter as a

Cubby Bear "Speaks a Piece"

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CUBBY Bear entered the house one summer day, and sank down despairingly in a corner.

"I never can do it, never!" he cried. "I do not like to go back on my word, but I cannot do it, and I must tell Wise Owl so, and let him find someone else to take my place."

"What is this dreadful thing you cannot do?" asked Grandma Bear, looking at him over her spectacles. "Tell me about it."

"Why, you know," said Cubby, "we are planning to have a Carnival for Midsummer Night, and invite everybody to come, and of course we must have a fine program. The birds are learning new songs, solos and choruses, Wise Owl will make a speech, and there will be games and races. Wise Owl said someone must speak a piece. He put a lot of little sticks in a hole in the ground together, and some of us agreed that whoever drew the longest one should learn a piece and speak it that night. So we drew—Tillie Turtle, and Betty Badger, and Busy Beaver, and Racky Coon, and ever so many more; then we measured the sticks, and mine was the longest!" Cubby Bear buried his face in his paws and rocked to and fro unhappily.

"But why did you agree to such a thing, if you feel so about it?" asked Grandma.

"Why, I thought it would be fun to draw with the others, and I never guessed I would get the longest stick! And now, when I tell Wise Owl I cannot speak, everyone will say, 'Cubby Bear does not keep his promises!'"

"Then I would do it!" said Grandma Bear calmly. "You are as bright as any of them."

"But I shall be afraid to stand up before all our visitors that night, and speak!" wailed Cubby.

"You could do as well as any of them," declared Grandma.

Just then Mamma Bruin came in, her face one broad, bright smile.

"Well, well, Cubby Bear," she began, delightedly, "I hear you have been chosen to speak a piece in the Midsummer Night's Carnival! How proud I shall be of you! Grandma Bear can go to hear you too, I hope, if she is well enough."

"Never you fear. I shall be there," said Grandma Bear.

Poor, foolish little Cubby began to cry.

"I never can do it—never!" he repeated.

"Pooh, pooh—tut, tut!" scoffed Grandma, while Mamma Bruin looked at him in surprise.

"But think what an honor it would be!" said Mamma Bruin. "'Reading, by Cubby Bear,' all written out on the program. And we are to have visitors that night, too—Madam Lynx from Canada, Sir Caribou from far up North, and I cannot tell who beside!"

At this Cubby wailed afresh.

"I am so glad he has his white vest and high collar," said Grandma Bear. "They must be freshly washed and ironed. His handsome birthday necktie will be just what he needs, and I have no doubt Squilly Porcupine will lend him his yellow gold wrist watch."

Cubby was growing a little interested, in spite of himself.

"No, Dr. Squilly will want to wear his watch himself," he said, "for he is to make a speech and tell our visitors how it is we all keep in such good health here in our Pleasant Forest."

"He will let you wear it while you speak, of course," said Grandma.

"But I have nothing to speak, and do not know where I could find a piece," said Cubby.

"True," agreed Mamma Bruin soberly. "I had not thought of that. If one is to speak a piece, there must be a piece to speak. We might ask Tillie Turtle's advice; she is very old, and knows many things the rest of us do not."

They looked for Tillie, but could not find her.

That evening, Shinyblack Crow came to make a call and talk over the Carnival plans, and they told him what was puzzling them.

"Hm——well!" he said thoughtfully. "You might tell a story, Cubby Bear. They would like that, I am sure."

"I know only stories that everybody in this forest has heard," sighed Cubby.

"Shinyblack Crow may know a good one he could tell you," suggested Grandma. "He sees many strange sights, I am sure, when he goes South for the winter."

"Oh, could you?" asked Cubby hopefully.

"Let me think," said Shinyblack Crow. "Y-yes! I remember something that happened one winter when I was living by the seacoast."

He told them the story, to which they listened eagerly. Then he surprised them by suddenly flapping his wings and "cawing" loudly.

"I have thought of a plan for you, Cubby Bear!" he cried. "Mother Goose—I know where she is staying just now, and I will try to coax her to come here and make my story into a rhyme, and teach it to you."

"How splendid!" approved Mamma Bruin. "If she will come, tell her we want her to stay and enjoy the Midsummer Night's Carnival."

The very next morning, Shinyblack Crow was up before the sun, and flying on his way to Mother Goose's summer home. And on the third day, back they came together to Mamma Bruin's house in the Pleasant Forest.

Before she commenced to teach the verses to Cubby, she made him promise not to say it for anyone before Carnival night.

More than once Cubby was discouraged, and thought he could never learn to say it right.

"But I must try hard," he thought, "when Mother Goose is good enough to take so much time to help me!"

NOT ONE WORD OF HIS VERSE COULD HE REMEMBER.

"While I am making up the rhyme,
Quite, quite alone I'll spend the time,"

Mother Goose told them, so Grandma Bear's room was given to her, and for a whole day she stayed in there alone.

When she came out, she ate hungrily of the good things Mamma Bruin had ready for her.

All the preparations went merrily forward, and when Midsummer Night came, Cubby Bear started for the scene of the Carnival with Mamma Bruin, Grandma Bear, and Mother Goose.

He was scrubbed and brushed, and dressed in his best. He felt anxious about his part in the program, and was glad it would be over before the games were played, so he could have a happy time then, with nothing to worry him.

He could hardly listen to the songs of the birds, though their music was beautiful, and to the speeches made by Wise Owl and Squilly Porcupine, he could not have told a word they said. He was saying his verses over and over to himself. Oh, what if he should forget!

When Wise Owl called for Cubby to speak, Cubby suddenly felt as if his feet were made of lead. How could he ever walk up there before so many, and say the verses Mother Goose had taught him?

Mamma Bruin gave his shoulder a little push, and he staggered to his feet. When he stood before them, with all eyes turned upon him, he trembled with fright. Not one word of his verse could he remember!

Then they began to cheer him, and little Chippy Chipmunk, who was in the front row, threw a bouquet of buttercups at Cubby's feet.

Cubby smiled, and picked up the flowers, and all at once, the opening words came to him, and he started in bravely:

"Who picked the Pickaninny from harm one scorching day?
I'll tell you all about it, and how he ran away.
That Pickaninny, black was he, a tiny, toddling tot,
Who lived far, far away from here, where winter days are hot!
He lived with Mammy, Pappy, and with Pickaninnies three,
In a funny little cabin, set close beside the sea.
He had a friend, a Northern Crow, and with him loved to share
The hominy and hoe-cake that his Mammy would prepare.

"One day the tiny Pickanin went toddling to the sea,
Across the hot and burning sand; and all alone went he!
Now Allie Gator lay in wait to catch dat Pickaninn;
He seed him comin' down the beach, and grinned a wicked grin.
And when he scrambled from the waves, and dashed along the shore,
The Pickaninny saw him, and began to shriek and roar.
Oh, who could help that toddler then? Or save him from his foe?
His eyes were bulging out with fright, and bitter was his woe!

"'Caw, caw!' was heard. Quite suddenly Old Allie Gator stepped,
For right in front of him a Crow with flapping pinions hopped.
'Go back into the sea,' he cried, 'and stay where you belong.
To frighten baby Pickanins is very, very wrong!'
But Allie Gator wagged his monstrous head from side to side,
Made answer with a fierce 'Gr-row!' and stretched his great mouth wide.
But do you think that scared the Crow? No, sir! he gave a hop,
And landed on the Gator's nose with quite determined flop.

"'Back—back into the sea!' he cried, 'or else I'll peck your eyes!
I'm where you cannot harm me, despite your strength and size.'
'Oh, spare my eyes!' that Gator cried, and turned and scrambled back
Across the sands, into the sea, away from Shinyblack!
Oh, yes, it was our Shinyblack—our own good Northern Crow,
Who bravely faced the Gator fierce, and ordered him to go.
'Twas he who picked the Pickanin from harm that winter day
When on the cabin and the sand the burning sunshine lay."

Cubby ended amid wild applause. Cheers were given for Shinyblack Crow for his brave deed in the Southland, cheers for Mother Goose, who made the story into rhyme, and cheers for Cubby Bear, who had spoken his piece so nicely.

Stately Sir Caribou, the largest visitor there, shook Cubby's paw and praised him, saying, "I have lived many years, but never have I heard a little bear speak as well as you have this night!"

Cubby blushed with pleasure, and said:

"Oh, but I dreaded to speak, and thought I never could do it—never! I—I even cried about it!"

"It never pays to worry ourselves by dreading things," Sir Caribou told him, with a smile. "Have courage, Cubby Bear, and remember that few things, when we really come to them, are as hard as we think they are going to be."

ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

IN the past few months the newspaper headlines have borne terrifying record of the outbreak of crime which has been sweeping our country's large centers of population and sections of thinner settlement. The nights of patrolman, police chief and commissioner have been made restless with excursions and alarms, and uneasy movements have been experienced by many estimable citizens who own possessions they prefer to consign to moth and rust rather than to thieves who break through and steal. The newspapers that have recorded this wave of crime have been aroused to indignant editorials of various sort—ponderously and pessimistically commenting as to cause, effect and remedies. In my own city and even in my neighborhood, storekeepers and clerks have been shot down and robbed, and the indignant editorials have been justified in that the police have failed, in the bulk of cases, to make arrests—automobiles offering safe getaways to the bandits.

Spending my vacation now in the same little mountain village where Billy and I spent happy weeks last summer, the headlines of my forwarded city papers read the more strangely and alarmingly in contrast with the peaceful life of the quiet village, the serenity of the nearby peaks, and the ordered passage of the summer as Nature moves through her ancient round of months and seasons. Yet looking closely, even in such a country community there can be found too much disrespect for law, too much of a willingness of the individual, upon occasion, to place what he considers his interests, rights, or a false sense of liberty, ahead of the regulations which the community as a whole has found best to establish. In the cities, of course, these tendencies and conditions are multiplied and find exaggeration.

Although this evasion of necessary legalized restriction finds easier expression under our system of government and is probably one of the defects which the advantages of a democracy has to bear, yet I believe there is each year a constant growth in our country of a disregardance of laws both old and new. This disregardance in great centers of population is pushed on by industrial unrest, or other temporary causes, to such outbreaks as the past two years have brought. It is a condition of danger and youthful criminals are increasing as well as capital crimes. In addition to its social effect in being a disregard of our form of government as a source of law, the tendency is a result from a deeper and more serious cause—the lack of any restraint which a religious impulse places upon actions which injure our fellows; a decay of faith shown in an ignoring of an essential Law Giver. The condition, at root, particularly as it involves youth, marks the absence of the word of God from the home and the lives that are moulded there for good or evil.

I go back to my own tracing of the cause of this and other present day troubles when I say that too many of us live without faith in anything beyond ourselves; without belief in any power but that of man's futile functioning; without regard for any punishment but that we may be clever enough to escape. And the situation is made worse because our faith in ourselves has been weakened by an experience of our selfish weaknesses; our belief in the power that years and increasing knowledge have given to man is shaken by the use we see made of such power; our avoidance of punishment is made impossible because we bring on our own cataclysms of pain and unhappiness. Our house of life is indeed made one built upon changing and slippery sands. A growth of turmoil in the world, an increase of crime, accident and suicide, endless unrest and unhappiness—all are as certain as day and night if our foundation for living remains unaltered and our base of relationship with our fellow men is to rest upon what we can take rather than what we must give.

Man cannot live unto himself utterly. His life cannot consist of the things he possesses—or in what he can strive to obtain. It has all been said before upon high authority and I say it again: Man can only win through to the happiness of his true life by first being willing to lose it in obedience to what it is divinely natural for him to recognize as Divine Law, and by standing ready to blend his own false and useless self-interest in a life of sacrifice and service for all.

In our world today, in his effort to escape the chaotic conditions involving him, man puts out a wavering hand here and there and turns a timid step or two toward trembling paths of beliefs and systems that have shaken him before to destruction through as many centuries as we have history. So many things have failed him in a discard of blood and dust. It is a time of uneasy waiting. But never is the voice of any one in a position of power raised to turn us to the only Law Giver, to point us toward the one safe way. For we need to be led and made to know that we will always stumble in darkness until we turn toward the true light; until we recognize that might and power lie only in the Love which is the fulfilling of the law—that Law which is the very God in whom we live, move and have our being, prodigals though we may be now.

Let those trained and cultivated minds who sneer at religion at this time point to any achievement of joy in their own lives as proof of their own trust in even the strength of their doubts. Let those who boastfully speak of our advances in science look for results in those parts of the world where science and so-called "progress" have most been given place and power. Yet it is not the day of the humble. Pride may come before a fall, but how can it be justified after the tumble and the bruised knees that will not kneel? I would rather have the love, the trust and simplicity of the little children I meet daily in the streets of this quiet, mountain-guarded town than all the science that can be packed in the dusty libraries of our loveless, doubting and tortuous-minded men. We need for our Faith, our Love and our Law a divine foundation. Only this can ever be the world's salvaging. It means a return to the absolute living and not the abstract worshiping of the teachings of Christ. Any other remedy for our evils is but a blind leading of the blind—and with each ditch deeper for our falling than the last. A new commandment was given us and we have let it grow old as the world. When we have learned to make it new again we will have made a new earth and heaven.

And now for the letters:

FAIRBANKS, P. O. BOX 825, ALASKA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I am a new cousin and want to know if you have room in your corner for a little girl from Alaska? I am twelve years old and I was born in Fairbanks. I have never been out of Alaska. I get letters from children in the United States who think I am an Eskimo because I live in Alaska, but I want the COMFORT cousins to know that I am not an Eskimo.

I have two pets: one is a pig and the other is a hen. The hen is not very young but the pig is only a week old. Its name is Boots. He is very cute. He likes me to pick him up and coddle him. I named him Boots because he has two little white forefeet. His two hind feet are black. I guess you will laugh when you read this, but he is so clean and shiny I just can't help loving him. He is black with just a white stripe on his shoulders. My hen's name is Cluck. She is so tame I can pick her up. She has raised a great many chicks and is a good mother.

Perhaps you would like to know something about Alaska. We have very short dark days in winter and have to study mostly by electric light. And we have lots of snow. Last winter was a very mild one and the coldest weather was only thirty-five below zero. Some winters it gets as cold as sixty-five below zero. In summer we have long warm days. The sun shines both day and night. We grow all kinds of vegetables and lots of pretty flowers.

I would like to hear from different boys and girls and I will try and answer their letters. I am your new cousin,

With love, STELLA SHAFER.

All right, Stella; let's have it understood at the very start: you are not an Eskimo even if you were born in Fairbanks and can sit comfortably out on your veranda and rock Boots to sleep when the thermometer is 65 degrees below zero. I have often heard of and tasted nice cold ham, Stella; but this pet pig of yours must be just about the coldest possible pork. I hope you have a warm little fur coat, made from a polar cubby bear, to cover Boots' shiny pink skin during the coldest of the dark winter days he has to pass in his electrically-lighted pig parlor.

Even if you are not an Eskimo, Stella, perhaps you can tell us the best way to make Eskimo pie. This chilly and delicious substance is all the rage these summer days in New York and Brooklyn. People who for years have been satisfied with old-fashioned apple, mince or custard pastry now go happily about gnawing on an icy slab of Eskimo pie and making a noise like a seal. Probably in your next letter you can tell us something about this Arctic delicacy. Do they bake it in snow ovens and use whale blubber for shortening?

You have a wonderful country, Stella. Just how wonderful few people know—or seem to care. It will be different some day and great things are in store for your Northern domain, I believe.

But I don't like this idea of having the sun shine both day and night—particularly on a hot Fourth of July. What good would be rockets and pinwheels? And whatever do you do with the stars and the moon, Stella, if you don't use them in the summer? I should think twenty-four hours of hot sun would be enough to turn chilly little Boots into Eskimo lard, so that some warm day when you cuddled him you would have nothing but a grease spot and a grunt left on your white organdie or dotted Swiss.

ABERDEEN, IDAHO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

As I have long been a silent reader of your department, I thought I would try my hand at writing and see if it would escape Billy the Goat. Please chase him into the corral until you read this letter.

This is a wild looking country. We have real cowpunchers out here, also some shure enuf bears. Farming and stock raising are extensively carried on. The climate is very healthful and the soil is very productive—only we ought to have more rain in summer. The soil is a volcanic ash and we have a long strip of lava here about twenty miles long and fifteen wide. There is a sugar factory at Blackfoot, so you see the sugar we use is the product of our own state.

Doubtless you are wondering what I look like; so here goes: I am five feet, ten inches short, weigh 165 pounds and have black hair and brown eyes. My age is between nineteen and twenty-four. I would like to hear from some of the cousins. I remain,

Your nephew and cousin, ARTHUR ORTH.

I don't wonder you say you need more rain in your country, Arthur, if your soil has all turned to ashes. I can't see how you can hope to improve it any by irrigating with lava. All the lava I ever heard about has been pretty hot stuff and not calculated to make sugar beets sprout so high that one beet would make a hundred of granulated. I advise you to keep the lava off the beets and use it only to make a hot-bed for early greens. However, you seem to keep cheerful, even with your volcanoes, ashes, bears and lava—all of which would seem to interfere somewhat with a peaceful farming life. The beets may stand the larva, Art, and you may have them fireproofed in some way, but I don't think you ought to stand these wild cowpunchers going about and punching your Jerseys and Holsteins. A cow is a gentle creature, as mild as milk, and needs to be handled gently. Punching her won't make any bossy give a drop more milk and, in fact, a side swing to the jaw or a right-arm jolt in the bovine solar plexus might dry a cow up entirely, leaving her just as arid as your volcanic ashes. If these chaps are bound to do so much punching, Art, let 'em buy a punching-bag or practice on your bears. These "shure enuf" animals can take a lot of punishment without going to the mat.

MARMON, NORTH DAKOTA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

This is my second attempt to write a letter; Billy must have got my first, but I'm going to keep on sending letters till you get tired.

We live in the driest part of North Dakota, but I assure you we can raise plenty of garden vegetables for all that.

Uncle, what do you advise me to do after I'm through school?—become a nurse, teacher or what? I am through the common school and I intend to finish both high school and college because I believe in a good education. I don't powder, go to dances or wear high-heeled shoes, but you may be sure I'll do all three of these when I get older.

I guess I will have to describe myself so you can see what a homely thing I am: I have golden brown hair which is sometimes wavy and sometimes straight as an Indian's locks. I have blue eyes, medium complexion and a freckled nose. I am five feet, six inches tall and am fourteen years old. Cousins, won't you please write letters to me? I would appreciate it so much. I will have to close now, with love to all.

Your niece, AMANDA ANDERSON.

Amanda, I'm not tired of reading your letters. I would never get tired. I just love to read 'em and you write so nicely. But I'm answering this one because of your important question. You want to know if you should "become a nurse, teacher or what." Amanda, nursing is a necessary and honorable profession which any woman can be proud to follow; teaching is perhaps the service of the most responsibility in the whole world and is being parent to the race; but above all, Amanda, do not think of becoming a "what." There are far too many whats now, and the profession is crowded. I meet them every day and all over. A what, my dear Amanda, is a person to whom life and his or her particular place in it are uncertain and interrogatory things. Whats are never quite sure of themselves or the work they have picked out. They are convinced they could be doing better at some other job, but they are not certain just what that job is and what they should do to find it.

Amanda, you are only fourteen and so you are entitled to be questioning and uncertain as to what place in the world you want to aim for and fill, or to just what star you should hitch your terrestrial wagon of youthful dreams. But you must choose your lifework by and by; educate yourself definitely toward your choice; plan to attain it creditably and give to your selected work the best that is in you. If you do this, Amanda, you may be a good nurse or a trained and intelligent teacher, and the crowded profession of whats will never gain you as an unhappy and useless addition.

INDIAN TOWN, FLORIDA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

For quite a while we took COMFORT and then stopped. Now we're taking it again. Now I don't say this to please you, but I think the League of Cousins is the best department of all. Understand I'm not slighting the others; each one has his or her choice. But the League is like a geography; you learn of other places besides your own domain and also it's almost like meeting other people.

Uncle Lisha, do you think progress and modernizing the world destroys romance? I've heard people argue that it does and I've read where cynics say that romance is no more. I don't know but that's half what I live for; romance, I mean. Not just love, but the adventure and mystery of life—the not knowing what's ahead of you on the morrow. Oh, I don't know quite how to explain it.

I am very fond of reading and cats. I have the dearest Maltese kitten. Have any of the cousins ever read the Boy Chum series? They're wonderful. I'm a girl, but I much prefer boys' books to girls'. They've got some adventure and pep to them, no matter how improbable.

Well, dear unknown friends, I will close this tiring missive—tiring I mean to Uncle Lisha and Billy perhaps. "O-o-o-o-o," I hear owls "hollering" down in the swamp. They give me the shivers, but I like to hear 'em.

Some of the North and Western cousins please write to a sixteen-year-old, brown-eyed, brown-haired, rather dark-complexioned south Florida girl whose name is JULIE WILKINSON.

Julie, you want to know if our juggernaut of modern progress has crushed romance out of the world—and your own letter gives the answer. You dream of the "adventure and mystery of life" and what may happen on some tomorrow. Just so long as there are boys and girls to dream, Julie, romance will live. Dreams are the stuff of which it is made; they are romance's very blood and substance. Not all of us are young and not all dream dreams, but to those of us who hold the wonder and mystery of life fresh like salt upon the lips and who know that all is not budgets, chambers of commerce and trade reports, romance never dies. The most wonderful thing in the world, the greatest happiness yet, may always be waiting just around the corner—when dreams come true.

Of course the cynics can say that romance is no more, Julie. It is dead as a door nail for them, poor things, and has always been. Why they even declare boldly that there are no such creatures as fairies! Cynics are hopeless and they are mostly nasty, bald-headed things, anyway. If they ever dream at all it is from eating too much broiled lobster and mince pie.

But youth will always dream, Julie, and so romance is certain to remain as immortal as the procession of young hearts, as deathless as spring, as eternal as love. Do not worry because you cannot put in words just what you feel and what the new charm and wonder of life means to you. Let the cynics do the explaining; they can explain so much—perhaps even where their hair has gone. But for you, Julie, love your Maltese kitten, listen to your hooting swamp owls and cherish your dreams. For romance is not dead, my dear; she is just around the corner. And the only way you can ever lose her is to meet her face to face.

ETNA MILLS, VIRGINIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Open up the door and give a guy from the Old

Teeth You Envy

Are brushed in this new way

Millions of people daily now combat the film on teeth. This method is fast spreading all the world over, largely by dental advice.

You see the results in every circle. Teeth once dingy now glisten as they should. Teeth once concealed now show in smiles.

This is to offer a ten-day test to prove the benefits to you.

That cloudy film

A dingy film accumulates on teeth. When fresh it is viscous—you can feel it. Film clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. It forms the basis of cloudy coats.

Film is what discolors—not the teeth. Tartar is based on film. Film holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film, and very few escape them.

Must be combated

Film has formed a great tooth problem. No ordinary tooth paste can effectively combat it.

So dental science has for years sought ways to fight this film.

Two ways have now been found. Able authorities have proved them by many careful tests. A new tooth paste has been perfected, to comply with modern requirements. And these two film combatants are embodied in it.

This tooth paste is Pepsodent, now employed by forty races, largely by dental advice.

Other tooth enemies

Starch is another tooth enemy. It gums the teeth, gets between the teeth, and often ferments and forms acid.

Nature puts a starch digestant in the saliva to digest those starch deposits, but with modern diet it is often too weak.

Pepsodent multiplies that starch digestant with every application. It also multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's neutralizer for acids which cause decay.

Thus Pepsodent brings effects which modern authorities desire. They are bringing to millions a new dental era. Now we ask you to watch those effects for a few days and learn what they mean to you.

The facts are most important to you. Cut out the coupon now.

Pepsodent PAT. OFF. REG. U.S.

The New-Day Dentifrice

Endorsed by modern authorities and now advised by leading dentists nearly all the world over. All druggists supply the large tubes.

Who Is Sylvia?

By Margaret Becker Kulp

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

WITH all due respects to the Woman's Institute this is the story of a Modern Cinderella.

Her name is Sylvia,—you know:

"Who is Sylvia, what is she,
That all our swains commend her?"

Well, that's what we wanted to find out, "Who" she was. We—and when I say "we" I mean John Huntley and me—knew "What" she was; she was a "cuckoo."

It began the night of Mrs. Huntley-Leigh's big fete which was something of a cross between a masquerade ball and a charity bazaar. The large idea was all Mrs. Huntley-Leigh's very own, and the object was to raise funds for an emergency operating-room in the new Leighton Hospital, of which she is president of the board of directors. Unique, wasn't it? And the most part of it all was that it was to be a very democratic affair—for the people, by the people, and from the people—mostly from the people—the market quotation on tickets being ten dollars per. Even at that it seemed as if all of Leighton turned out, and that is where Mrs. Huntley-Leigh made a great mistake; and how the largest, boldest robbery ever known in Leighton was committed, and how a cold-blooded murder nearly occurred.

Being society editor of The Leighton Gazette, the Chief hands one of the bits of magic pasteboard to me and says:

"Miss O'Donnell, here is a ticket for that fool stunt Mrs. Huntley-Leigh is pulling off at her home on Friday night; please attend. And listen to me, Delia; as you know, Mrs. Huntley-Leigh controls the largest amount of stock in this paper, and as we have not yet been able to convince the stockholders that we need a new set of large type for our pressroom, I want you to write up this affair of hers so touchingly that she'll be moved to pull off another stunt in the near future to raise funds for a new set of large type for us."

I decided to go in costume and enjoy myself along with the rest of Leighton, and so I got together a stunning outfit and went as Mrs. Bluebeard, and, leave it to Delia, old Solomon in all his glory didn't have a thing on me. I arrived with the advance guard, for by the returns in the box-office that day it looked as though they would have to secure the services of all the traffic cops to handle the angry mob.

Ten o'clock found me sitting very calm and blissfully in the large drawing-room beside Mrs. R. Sylvester Smythe—she is the little dame who invariably calls me up the day after I've reported her attendance at some social function or other and bawls me out for slighting her, or her gown—so I was quite familiar with her dear little nagging voice.

"Isn't this the most gorgeous spectacle?" she purred. "So wonderfully clever of dear Mrs. Huntley-Leigh to plan it all. I do so love to come to her affairs, she entertains so lavishly, and one meets only the best of people. Do you attend many of her social functions?"

She darted a penetrating, sidelong glance at me. The cat!

"Yes," I replied, and it was the truth, too, although I did not feel duty bound to inform her that it was a part of my profession to attend them.

"So do I," she lied—for she is no more a member of the "inner shrine" than I am. "I do hope," she went on—and, say, there are occasions where ignorance is bliss, aren't there?—"I do hope that horrid little red-headed reporter from the Gazette is here tonight, and that, for once in her life she will be able to describe my costume accurately."

I nearly choked; you see, I don't have my red hair for nothing, and sometimes even the best-natured people get peeved. However, I made a dignified exit through a French window near at hand, and went out to join the motley crowd outside.

And here is where Sylvia comes into this tale.

I looked around for a quiet spot in which to sit down and calm my ruffled feelings, and presently I found a comfortable rustic bench beneat a wide-spreading—no, it was not a chestnut tree—it was an old oak. I sank down upon it thankfully and watched the gay promenaders; and then, as it was a part of my profession to write up all I saw, I took my trusty old notebook from my pocket—oh, yes, I had a pocket, I really had to have one, you know, to carry all the keys of old Bluebeard's bearded den—and began to describe the costumes.

There were troubadors from the thirteenth century, cavaliers from the period of Charles the First, toreadors from Spain, gladiators from ancient Rome, mandarins, Turks, Cossacks, Indians, Pied Pipers of Hamlin, and a dozen devils, of course; not to mention Joan of Arc, Snow-White, Mary, Queen of the Scots, and so many others that it would keep me busy from now until they decide to court-martial the Kaiser to name them all—but it was some crowd.

Well, just about this time along came a slender little vision in a shimmering white satin Yama-Yama costume trimmed with ridiculous, big scarlet pompons. She was stepping it off like a child tripping home from school, as though she didn't have a care in the world, and she was humming a little tune to herself, quite happy-like. She didn't see me at all, sitting there in the shadow of that old oak, so she went around to the other side and what do you think she did? Shinned up that tree like a regular tomboy! And there she sat, swinging her satin-bloomered legs and her small slippered feet with those absurd scarlet pompons on them, as if she were having the time of her young life. Naturally I couldn't move, so I prepared to wait patiently until she tired of pretending she was one of our feathered friends.

Presently the plot thickened. Along came another Yama-Yama; this time the male of the species. The lighted end of a good Havana preceded him by an inch or two. The girl above me also scented the approach of a man. She leaned down—yes, I was peeping, but then it is a part of my profession to do so whenever I think an occasion warrants my peeping—and she called, oh, so softly and sweetly:

"Oh, Pierrot!"

The man stopped short and reconnoitered—I held my breath for fear he'd find me and accuse me of trying to flirt—but he didn't, he gave it up. Then the minx in the tree laughed, such a silvery, tinkling laugh, and she called again:

"Oh, Pierrot!"

Then he looked up and saw her.

"Oh you Pierrette," he said, and I knew that voice—it was John Huntley's.

Now there are three things to be said about John Huntley; he is the most eligible, the most courted, and the most elusive young bachelor in Leighton; then, too, he is Mrs. Huntley-Leigh's sole surviving relative, and the apple of her eye; and beside all this he is our most prominent attorney-at-law. I couldn't place the girl, and I have a pretty good memory—it is a part of my profession to have one, you know.

"Who are you, sweetness?" John Huntley asked the girl in the tree.

"'Who is Sylvia?'" she mocked back.

John Huntley laughed, and the shimmering vision in the old oak sang on:

"'Is she kind as she is fair—
For Beauty lives with Kindness—
To her eyes Love doth repair,
To help him of his blindness.'"

John Huntley threw away his cigar.

"Sylvia, you adorable little witch," he cried, "I'm coming up." And up he went!

Then I took myself to task. "Delia O'Donnell," I said very sternly and severely, "you're intruding. How would you like for someone to listen in on yours and Jerry's big scene?"

And anyway, as the conversation was being carried on sotto voce and I couldn't hear a word, I decided to make a quiet getaway—which precaution was entirely unnecessary.

* * * * * *

It must have been eleven o'clock when that awful, never-to-be-forgotten, blood-curdling cry came piercing down the stairs to the big dining-room where the caterers were serving ices and coffee—"MURDER!"

Of course I was sent there to get copy for the society column, and the Chief never sensed anything sensational or he would have given Jerry one of those little white tickets (Jerry is our feature writer, and he's great on murders—that is how he became a war correspondent). But as Jerry wasn't there, I did my best for the old paper, and I grabbed my notebook and followed those who were not too petrified to move upstairs.

"Delia O'Donnell," I said to myself, "here is where you do double time. Perhaps the Chief will recognize talent and quick work, and if you cover this for Jerry he will give you both his blessing, and Jerry that hoped-for raise in salary."

And, leave it to Delia, I covered it.

By this time I was at the door of Mrs. Huntley-Leigh's dressing-room door. Simms, the butler, was trying to hold back the crowd that was elbowing its way into the room. He was terribly pale and was shaking quite visibly, and no wonder! For there on the floor lay the bodies of Gregson, the private detective whom Mrs. Huntley-Leigh had secretly installed in her dressing-room in the event of a possible robbery, and Mrs. Huntley-Leigh herself! Hortense, the little French maid, was standing close by shivering with fright and chattering unintelligibly.

By some strange freak of my imagination—perhaps because I was covering Jerry's field—I imagined I was Jerry, Jerry reporting again in No-Man's Land, and I wrote:

"GREAT BATTLE!—Casualties—Two Dead, One"—I was looking at Hortense then—"Shell-shocked. The enemy's attack was sudden and unexpected. He retreated, however, under heavy fire"—Gregson's revolver lay limply in his right hand—"All was confusion"—all of the bureau drawers were pulled out and their contents spilled over the room.

Well, by the time they had cleared the scene of action of the morbid crowd (I remained, for it was a part of my profession to be there) and had revived Mrs. Huntley-Leigh, who had merely fainted, after all, and telephoned for the police and the ambulance, Hortense managed to come to and make herself intelligible.

"The pearls," she gasped, "Madame's magnificent pearls—Mon Dieu, they are gone!"

Anyway, there had been a robbery. I revised my copy. Then, being of an inquisitive turn of mind—but you must know that it is a part of my profession to be so—I began to look around. Presently I saw—lying near the corner of a dresser—what do you think?—one of those silly scarlet pompons! My heart lost a beat. Sylvia! I looked helplessly at Hortense who was standing beside me! I held it out to her questioningly. Hortense wrinkled up her pretty little forehead and thought seriously. Suddenly she beamed.

"Oui," she said, "Mademoiselle she wish some rouge et poudre."

Just then John Huntley came up to me, he had seen that foolish little pompon, and, my word, he was pale.

"If you don't mind," he said, very calmly and politely, "I should like to have that."

What was I to do but to hand it over?

Before long the police arrived, and the ambulance with the doctor, who was a young interne from the new Leighton Hospital. He advised that Mrs. Huntley-Leigh be removed to the hospital along with Gregson who was still unconscious: he said she was suffering from shock.

I revised my copy again. I crossed out "shell."

* * * * * *

Two weeks passed. Gregson, still in the hospital, remembered that he had heard only a quick noise behind him at an open window, and as he turned to investigate—at the same time drawing his revolver—he suddenly knew no more. Gregson had been hit in the back of his head and knocked senseless by the butt end of a revolver, he had a wicked wound. Mrs. Huntley-Leigh was still in the hospital, too, much to the professional pride of the institution. One afternoon I went over to see her. I found her propped up in an invalid's chair at the window.

"Oh Pierrot!"

"Well, Delia," she said warmly, "come in and keep me company a while; it is rather lonely sitting here by oneself. My nurse is off duty just now, and she left me to the tender mercies of the little pupil nurse who is on duty in the hall.

"Delia," Mrs. Huntley-Leigh leaned closer to me, "don't be afraid to talk about the night of the party, I'm as well as I ever was, and Mr. Gregson is doing splendidly. John and I have talked it all over, but I'd like to have your version of it."

I wondered to myself whether John had told her about Sylvia and the oak tree episode, but I didn't mention it. I had a strong hunch that her nurse did not allow her to think of the affair when she was present, for Mrs. Huntley-Leigh was acting with all the cunning of a child who tries to be naughty behind the teacher's back. I decided not to talk about the tragic side of it so I began to give her an imitation of Mrs. R. Sylvester Smythe's sketch in the dressing-room, never dreaming it would hurt her, and she began to laugh, and she laughed and laughed until the tears rolled over her cheeks; then she started in to cry, and she laughed and cried alternately until I was really frightened and rang frantically for a nurse.

The little pupil nurse and John Huntley—half hidden by a million dollars or two of American Beauty roses—came in together. The nurse took in the situation at a glance and began to talk soothingly to Mrs. Huntley-Leigh. At the sound of her voice I pricked up my ears and listened. As I remarked before, I have a pretty good memory—it is a part of my profession. I gathered that her name was Miss Elliot, and, take it from Delia, Miss Elliot was some looker. She had a wealth of blue-black hair under her pert little white cap, it reminded one of blue flames playing over black coals, and her eyes were big and brown and wistful.

Having done about all the damage I could do for one day I decided to depart. At the door I looked back; little Miss Elliot was relieving John Huntley of his florist shop.

"John," I said very calmly and serenely (John Huntley and I went through grammar school together, we know each other very well), "may I have a word with you in the hall?"

He followed me out.

"John," I said solemnly, "who was Sylvia?"

"Delia O'Donnell," he cried, seizing me by the shoulders, "you were peeping!"

"Well," said I, drawing myself up with all the dignity I could muster, "what if I were? That, you know, is a part of my profession."

I walked down the corridor very cool and sedately. John came after me.

"Delia, tell me if you know, who the devil is Sylvia?"

"That, Mr. Huntley, is for me to know, and for you to find out."

He seemed exasperated.

"See here, Delia, I can't take time to argue with you. If you know who that girl is and refuse to reveal her name, you are shielding a suspected thief, and in the eyes of the law you are an accomplice. For the love of heaven, Delia, speak!"

I spoke.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Huntley," I said coldly.

He actually believed that Sylvia had stolen those pearls! Ah, John, John Huntley, where was your faith?

* * * * * *

The office force have a joke among themselves; they call Jerry,—my Jerry, you know—the defective detective, this because Jerry's keen on tracking down criminals on his own responsibility. "Many a reporter," says Jerry to me, "has solved more mysteries singled-handed than the whole police force and detective agency combined." But poor Jerry was always on the wrong scent.

He fooled them this time, however.

Jerry had a strong suspicion that a regular crook pulled off that job the night of the Bal Masque. He contended that a girl like Sylvia—of course I had told him all about Sylvia—could not have done it, especially could not have given Gregson that terrific blow in the head. And he was right. One day, about a month later, Jerry walked into the district attorney's office and told them where to get the thief. And they got him. Also the pearls.

In the meanwhile I was doing some sleuthing of my own. First I went to Miss Hart, the superintendent of nurses, at the new Leighton Hospital, and asked her what Miss Elliot's given name was. She consulted her register.

"Sylvia," she told me.

"And can you tell me, please, Miss Hart," I asked sweetly, "whether or not Miss Elliot received a ticket to the masquerade given by Mrs. Huntley-Leigh about a month ago?"

Miss Hart looked puzzled. "Why, yes," she said slowly, "the superintendent of the hospital, the internes—all but one who remained on call—the supervisors, all the senior nurses—Miss Elliot is a senior—and I, went on Mrs. Huntley-Leigh's special invitation. I hope there is no trouble, Miss O'Donnell?"

"Oh, dear no, Miss Hart," I said, and my heart was nearly jumping up into my mouth, "everything is all right, everything is just perfectly all right."

Then I went to John Huntley's office. John was looking like the last rose of summer. He raised a haggard face to mine as I went in, and tried to smile. He surely was hard hit!

"John," I said very low and tenderly, "if I were to tell you who Sylvia is will you ask your Aunt Regina for a new set of large type for our pressroom? And will you see that Jerry Carruthers gets a raise in salary—enough to make a salary that two can live on?"

John shook his head reprovingly.

"That," I said, drawing myself up to my five-feet-two-and-a-half, "that is a part of my profession."

"Ah, Delia, you are a gentle grafter."

"I'll tell you, Delia, who Sylvia is," said John dreamily, "she is a beautiful dream, a glimpse of Heaven, a bit of moonlight madness, a breath of exquisite perfume, a strain of enchanting melody, a charming fairy that flitted for a little while—from fairyland, a Cinderella who left her hearth and ashes for a single night and disappeared on the stroke of twelve, leaving behind a part of her tiny slipper."

My word! He was hard hit! From his breast pocket he took that ridiculous scarlet pompon.

"Fiddlesticks!" I said. "For a brilliant lawyer, John, you are the most stupid lover I have ever seen. Go down to the hospital and ask to see Miss Elliot and use your eyes, man, use your eyes! 'Cinderella' nothing," I snorted, "she left at twelve because, by the rules and regulations of the institution, she had to report at the nurses' home at that time."

"Delia," shouted John, seizing my hands in his, "you angel. Jerry gets that raise and the pressroom gets the new type."

He grabbed his hat and made a mad rush for the door.

"This way out," I said, holding it open, "and please don't crowd, take it slowly and avoid accidents."

"Delia O'Donnell," he cried, "leave it to you to track old Romance to his lair."

"That," I said, very low and demurely, "is a part of my profession."

But he was gone.

Don't argue with a fool—someone may overhear the argument and be unable to tell which is the fool.

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

The Welcome Guest

IF you had been with me, Pretty Girls, on a recent week-end in the country, you would guess at once what I am about to say, for everyone who was a member of that little houseparty came away, I am sure, with the same thoughts at the back of their heads.

There was a very pretty girl among the guests, and we all arrived at the same time at the small station, from which we were to walk or drive to the little lake on which our friends lived. The majority of the young people were in favor of a walk of four miles as "a lot of fun." All, with one exception, wore "sneakers" or tennis shoes, simple clothes, and carried little in the way of baggage. The latter did not matter, in any case, for we were to leave our packs in town to be called for. The pretty girl had on high-heeled patent leather pumps, very pretty to look at but totally unsuited for anything but sitting still, and a very pretty white dress which certainly would not look so white at the end of the four-mile walk.

We will all have to admit that she was game, and did not balk at the idea of walking, but the thing we do remember, besides, is that we all had to stop at the little hotel and wait while she changed her shoes and stockings. She knew she was going into the country and that it was to be a "rough-and-ready" week-end, yet she could not resist making herself as pretty as possible, trusting to luck that she would not have to do any walking.

When we arrived at the house, and all of us were helping to unpack and get the simple meal it was Enid who had to slip away to "dress," and who kept us all waiting because her hair was not dressed when six or seven hungry voices called "Dinner!"

It was Enid, next morning, who was late downstairs, and whose every hair was pinned as it should be when she appeared, who had on becoming clothes and pretty stockings, and looked fresh and dainty to behold. But—and here's the point—few of us felt inclined to dwell on her appearance because the coffee had been ready for some time and was not improving with standing. Shortly after breakfast, a walk in the woods was proposed. Enid was as eager as any of us to go, but called to us to wait a minute while she ran upstairs to get a hat. We waited ten minutes, fifteen minutes, twenty minutes, and then Enid came down in a lovely silk sweater and a darling Tam, and her hair had been freshly arranged, so that she looked as cool and sweet as possible. But, again, none of us felt inclined to consider this, for we had all been fuming at the delay. If we wanted to go rowing, we waited for Enid; if we wanted to drive into town, Enid was gayly anxious to go along, and again we waited, because she changed her waist and added a few decorative touches.

So our days went by, the few of them there were. At all times Enid was a lovely picture at which to gaze, but nobody felt like gazing, and when we once more started homeward, you may be sure it was not Enid who was the center of the men's attention. No, indeed, it was a good-natured, not especially pretty girl, who wore, most of the time she was there, the same rough-and-ready sport skirt, with tennis shoes, a simple sport hat, and whose only changes of attire were the addition of clean blouses when needed. Never did we have to wait for her, never did she seem to be thinking of the impression she was making; she had freckles on her nose, sunburn on her arms, her hair wasn't waved nor done up elaborately, but she had been ready for every bit of fun we had, as well as every bit of work, such as washing dishes or frying eggs. She was far and away more popular than Enid, lovely and gracious and sweet as the latter was.

What's the answer? I guess you all know. Enid was constantly thinking of the impression she was making; being beautiful was her serious occupation, and someway we all found that while we liked beautiful things and especially beautiful girls, something was taken from their beauty if they spent much thought upon it themselves. Enid might as well have been as homely as a mud fence for all the interest anybody took in her.

So, girls, while I want you all to make the most of your good looks, I do not want you to spend all your thoughts upon your appearance. When you are dressing in the morning, see that you are properly dressed and look to the best advantage—then forget it. And if you are a guest and want to be a welcome one again, never take time to make a toilet when other people will have to wait for you. Enid should have worn her sport shoes up on the train; she would then have been ready for anything. She should have dressed quickly in the morning so that she could at once respond to any plan on foot, and not require a special toilet; she should have been willing to wear the hat nearest at hand, in fact should have had only one hat with her considering the kind of outing she was on. And never should she have given anybody the impression that she was thinking how she looked.

One toilet in the morning is not sufficient for the entire day, of course, but it doesn't take long to slip off one's blouse, wash quickly, give a hasty rub with powder, and slip on a fresh blouse. Learn to dress quickly, and never to keep anybody waiting while you "beautify." For you will never seem beautiful to anybody if they guess you are trying to seem so.

Answers to Questions

I. L.—Just ask your druggist for Mascara, and he will give you the right thing. For the milk diet, when I say "take one glass of milk," I mean, of course, the ordinary tumbler which holds half a pint. The milk should be sweet. Pasteurized milk is all right, but so is milk fresh from the cow if it is your cow and you know it is healthy and the milking properly done in a sanitary fashion. All freckle remedies act about the same—that is, several applications burn the outer skin away and eradicate the brown spot which is below the skin. As I have said many times, the skin is left sensitive and you will have to be very careful to protect it with cold cream, big hats, parasols, etc., or you will promptly freckle again. Lemon juice applied to some freckles will remove them; grated horseradish will dispose of others. But whatever remedy you use, treat the skin carefully after, applying some zinc ointment or a good cold cream. Remember what you will have done is burn away a piece of your skin.

POPPY.—The mark you refer to is, of course, not a scar, but a skin condition Looking after your general health is about the only thing that will help it, so feed yourself well, drink lots of water, bathe the entire body daily, practice deep breathing, get plenty of outdoor exercise and enough restful sleep with your windows open winter as well as summer. Drink plenty of good sweet milk, if possible; it will be one of the best things possible for you. Eat plenty of vegetables and be sure to avoid fried foods. Keep the bowels in good condition by exercise, drinking plenty of water and by eating proper foods—fruits, vegetables, etc. Eat plenty of cereal and cream or milk for your breakfast, as well as some fruit. You do not weigh enough, so your bust does not have the necessary material with which to develop. If you want a larger bust you must feed yourself the proper food to build flesh and fat, so that there will be enough to go around and you will find that your bust develops as your whole body adds weight. Try to gain ten or twelve pounds. Your hips are small, because you do not weigh enough. With a waist measure of 26, your hips and bust should each be 36, but if your waist increases to 28, then bust and hips should increase in the same proportion, which would make them 38. No, I do not answer letters by mail, and your informant is mistaken. My correspondence is so large and so many people want to know the same thing that one letter answered in these columns will take care of twenty or thirty similar inquiries. It would be impossible, you can see, to write to thirty people for every question that needed an answer.

BROWN EYES.—I should not tamper with the moles. They are dangerous to meddle with, as when scratched or irritated they sometimes develop into malignant growths. I would let them alone—besides they are rather fashionable, making the surrounding skin look whiter than it really is. Keep your skin well cared for.

MARY LOUISE.—For a long face, the hair should be dressed to be full at the side of the head. You might try parting the hair in the middle, and again from the middle of the top of the head to each ear, so that the front hair would be in two sections. Now make a third part just back of the crown of the head, across the head. Pin this third section out of the way while you comb the back section up and coil the ends firmly at the crown of the head. Now comb the "third section," back over this coil, doubling its ends under itself, and pinning over the coil. Take one of the front sections next and arrange it so that it will be puffed a little over the ear but not quite covering it. Put in invisible pins as you arrange it. Then do the same with the other side, and coil the ends of both at the back of the head just below the point where you have pinned the "third section." This sounds complicated and is, more or less. Another pretty way, if your hair is very heavy, is to part it in the middle from forehead to nape of the neck. Braid in two braids, and cross at the nape, bringing up and around the head. You want to leave the front hair loose enough so that when the braids are pinned in position, you can pull loose curves of hair down on your forehead. Lap the locks just a tiny bit, with an invisible pin, at the part, and do the same with the back part, after running a comb through it above the braid so that no part will show.

OHIO GIRL.—To reduce your legs, at the calves, practice the following exercise: Standing with heels together, toes slightly apart, hands on hips, chin up and back straight, rise to your tiptoes slowly, and count five; now let the heels sink slowly back to the floor; rise again, and so on for five or ten minutes. Keep the knees straight during this exercise. The open pores on your face should be closed by the persistent use of cold water after bathing with warm. You need also plenty of outdoor exercise, and of course a daily body bath, with a final brisk rubbing with a Turkish towel. Do not rub the face hard but give it a quick frictioning with a soft towel. Do not use ice on the face.

PRETTY BUT TOO CONSCIOUS OF THE FACT.

BLISS.—Thank you for all the nice words. With pimples on arms, face, chest and back, your blood needs looking after. No outside remedy will help you. What you want to do is to get busy and rid your system of the impurities which can't get out any other way and so force their way out through the pores. Bowels first of all, of course. Don't take cathartics, but drink quantities of water, eat fruit, and exercise, exercise, exercise! Don't eat constipating foods. Potatoes are apt to constipate and so is white bread, especially hot bread and griddle-cakes, etc. Cut out white bread and potatoes, therefore, for the time being. Drink a couple of glasses of water on rising in the morning, but not until you have exercised for five minutes. Drink two glasses of water—not more than three-quarters of a glass at a time—during the morning, the same during the afternoon, and before going to bed drink two more glasses. Soak half-a-dozen prunes in a full glass of water at night, and eat them in the morning, drinking the juice. Do this every day. Or put prunes to soak, or cook them for more than an hour the next morning, over a slow flame. Eat a big dish of prunes every morning. Sprinkle a little prepared bran into your other cereal that you eat for breakfast. It is very good added to oatmeal, which has been well cooked. Bathe yourself daily, every inch of your body. With pimples you must be careful not to rub the skin too hard, pat it gently. A few weeks of this treatment, plus exercise, and I think your pimples will be a thing of the past. As to the hair under the arms, any depilatory will do to use there, but the hair will come back and you will have to use it again. With your color hair and eyes, I should think you could wear French blue, rose, sienna, a delicate green if you have color in your cheeks, dark blue, cinnamon brown, white.

JUNE.—I do not think your case is very ordinary. I should avoid tight brassieres if I were you, for binding the bust tight is not good for it. You are much over weight, and should reduce, no matter whether you feel satisfied with your weight. You ought to lose fifty pounds. In the loss of this flesh, perhaps the bust will adjust itself. I do not know what causes this condition, though a doctor might be able to tell you. I should keep up a gentle massage of the small breast, using a circular motion with cocoa-butter on the fingers or smeared first on the breast. The gentle use of an electric vibrator round and round this breast might help the condition. Of course you understand that the breast must never be handled roughly. I do not know how much truth there is in the admonition in regard to a nursing baby, but if you should have a child, your doctor could advise you. My first advice to you is to reduce fifty pounds. I talked at considerable length about just how to reduce, in a recent issue of COMFORT, so perhaps you are already following those directions.

DIMPLE OF NORTH DAKOTA.—You are a pretty brave girl to take your responsibilities so cheerfully, but you will be glad of it later on when that dad of yours is with you no longer. I know from practical experience how glad we are to be able to look back and know that we did the best we could and did it cheerfully. Now about that skin exposed to all kinds of weather and constantly. You understand that wind and sun combine to dry up the oil in the skin which keeps it soft, so each night you must try to put back what has been taken away from it. Wash it thoroughly at night, dry it, then rub in plenty of cold cream and do not go to bed immediately. The skin will absorb the surplus grease soon. This will keep the skin soft. Before you go out in the field or garden in the morning, rub in some more thoroughly, and dust powder over it after the surplus cream has been wiped off. When you come in at noon, rub a little cold cream on your face and wipe it off with a soft cloth, instead of using water on the face. All the dirt will come off beautifully, and you will not dry the skin by using water on it to take away its oil. Rub a hand lotion into the hands after washing them, each time. Only in this way can you keep a good skin. Don't "peel" the skin, as you suggest; the skin underneath would be more sensitive than ever, and you would soon have a very bad looking face.

OPAL.—What to do to get fleshy? Well, my dear, eat! And you must eat good healthful things, such as a big bowl of cereal with cream in the morning, a dish of stewed prunes or berries or a piece of melon, and for other meals, boiled rice with sugar and cream, potatoes, milk, bacon, green vegetables, fresh fruits, not too much cake, no pie, plenty of ice cream when you can get it. It is a good plan to eat a dish of rice between dinner or supper and going to bed. Use sugar and cream on it; this is a good way to add flesh.

FRECKLES.—There is no way to make your hair red except by dyeing it, and that I do not recommend. Keep it well shampooed and the red lights in it will show up better. See answer to Ohio Girl" about developing the legs.

R. F.—I am afraid, my dear, that your question is one that belongs to a physician. I cannot answer it satisfactorily, but in the meantime see what I have said to "Bliss" and follow those directions.

CURIOUS.—There is no way to remove such birthmarks as you describe. You might try concealing them in the following way. Wet the spots, powder them white, then over this place a layer of flexible collodion, which you can buy of your druggist in a tube, squeezing on enough to cover the spot. Now powder over this with a flesh-colored powder. Try this, and see if it will not improve matters. In any case, if people ask you about the spots, just laugh and say, "Oh, that's a birthmark." If you take it lightly yourself, other people will also.

GREY EYES.—I should be willing to wager that you are pretty fond of sweet things and eat too much of them. Cut out all cake, pie, preserves, sweet desserts and rich gravies, as well as fat meat, for you weigh too much, my dear. Eat lots of vegetables; they won't make you fat and yet are good for you. So are fresh fruits. Your oily skin, your pimples and blackheads all come from improper diet. Bathe all over every day, and get plenty of exercise, and with these precautions you should be able to get rid of some of your excess fat and with it pimples, oily skin and all.

MISSOURI.—I am sorry it is against the rules of the department to answer letters by mail. For excessive perspiration, eat simply during the summer (vegetables and fruits), take body baths daily, and an extra sponge bath before dressing late in the afternoon if that is your custom. Keep the hair under your arms removed either with a safety razor or a depilatory. After thoroughly scrubbing the armpits, pat them with a flannel pad filled with cornstarch. Some women dampen a cake of white toilet soap and gently rub over the armpit, then pat with cornstarch pad. Bathing the armpit with boric acid is another good thing to do. The best thing to avoid perspiration is to avoid getting overheated, and the way to do that is to eat lightly of light foods, avoiding meats, rich pastries, gravies, etc., so that your blood is not heated with these food elements; then dress lightly, move without flurry, powder the entire skin after bathing and do not wear any article of clothing which is tight.

ELLA.—There is no such thing as peroxide of ammonia. Are you sure you did not make the mistake in copying it out? The two ingredients to be used in removing superfluous hair are peroxide of hydrogen and ammonia. It is quite likely the ammonia you are using is all right, being merely colored, though it may have been diluted. The object of the peroxide is to bleach and dry the hair, of the ammonia to kill the roots. How long it takes depends on many things. No one can tell how long any particular case will take, as hair varies. The ordinary spirits of ammonia can be used, if your special ammonia is not producing results. If the skin becomes irritated from the application of the ammonia, stop the treatment for a day and rub on a little cold cream.

Christmas present interfered with my answering some of your letters, but I tried to answer all who sent stamps.

To those who wrote about homesteads in this section please write to the Montrose Gov. Land Office, Montrose, Colo., for information.

Also my advice to those who wrote for information about taking girls from orphanages is this: Be careful. I had my girl only one week when I wrote my last letter and, of course, the first few weeks any girl will try to make good. Later on she caused us so much trouble that we have never regretted her absence and my experience coupled with others I know has been this: Either know well the girl's personal habits or else take a younger child so you can train her from the beginning. It is a beautiful deed, everyone knows, for a woman to take a babe in arms from an orphanage and rear it as her own. Surely one who does that deserves Heaven's richest gifts.

Now a few words about Mother love. Isn't it the most wonderful thing in all the world? I'm afraid most of us never appreciate our mothers until we are mothers ourselves. I never did, but now every day my own little mother means more to me, while I am caring for my own babies. She sits high up on a pedestal in my thoughts—enshrined. How many of you are blessed with young mothers, as I am? I was born just before mother had her sixteenth birthday, so, God willing, I will have her many wonderful years yet. Don't think of your mother just on Mothers' Day, but every day in the year send her a kind thought. I would ask no greater blessing for discouraged people than that they could have a mother like mine. Mrs. Wilkinson, please print this letter soon so if "Mother O' Mine" reads her COMFORT she will know her daughter appreciates her and truly loves her, although I think she knows it. Another thing, we do not confide in Mother enough. It is not necessary to confide the sorrows for these she will want to carry on her own back, which may not be as strong as yours, but do confide every joy. Remember, it is your mother who always stands ready to go to the "jumping off" place with you. We can all be Lincolns in that one thing—love of Mother.

Regards to all, MRS. BEN MCDONOUGH.

Mrs. McDonough.—Thank you for telling me that my little postscripts mean much to the readers. They seem very commonplace to me but it is difficult to say anything very clever in a few words, but I can talk a "blue streak."—Ed.

MARION, ILL.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have taken COMFORT for many years and although I have never attempted a letter to this corner I am now writing for help and advice.

I am a young widow, with four children, the oldest seven years and the youngest sixteen months. I find it necessary to start some means of support for myself and children. I have a sister younger than myself who is willing to help me. We have discussed several plans and finally decided we would like a small business of some sort, at home.

We are situated on a main road about a mile and a half from a thriving city. We think if we could have a small stand of some sort it would go very well in this community. We could start with only a few things and as our trade increased we could add to our stock of supplies.

Won't some of the sisters please write of their experience in this line, or some other? It would be much appreciated by us.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

Old Subscriber.—I've often wondered if the stands seen by the roadside, catering to automobile trade, were profitable, and here is a chance to find out from someone. They must be, there are so many of them, in this section at any rate. It would have made matters much easier for yourself, and for me, if you had not asked me to withhold your name, but doubtless you had your reasons for so doing.—Ed.

WILSONVILLE, ALA.

DEAR COMFORT READERS:

My friend, Miss Roma Coleman, of Cuthbert, Ga., and I desire to thank through the pages of COMFORT each and every one who kindly contributed to our letter shower. Truly, it was a success beyond our wildest expectations. Words are inadequate to express our appreciation and we regret that we are unable to reply to all. We shall ever keep our big bunch of letters, cards and reading matter as a souvenir of our COMFORT letter shower. You have made the world brighter for us.

MISS PERDIE G. HOLLAND.

DENVER, COLO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Mother has always taken COMFORT and I have read it for many years and seen how many have been helped by advice from the sisters and I wondered if you would help me.

I am a young woman of seventeen. That may sound young to you but really I am lots older. I feel at least forty. Although I have never once admitted it to a person, I believe that I love a married man. I can't forget him although I have tried and tried. Maybe I don't know what love is. I like him and admire him. His wife has been a friend of mine and mother's for five years. However, she doesn't sympathize or help her husband. He likes to go and have a good time. Does she do his way half of the time? No, she will not go but stays at home and nags. Isn't it natural that he should look elsewhere for happiness and I believe he has found it, but—the matter is further complicated by the fact that there are three children, eight, five and three years of age. He is young, only twenty-eight and she is twenty-seven but one would think she was his mother to look at her.

I have read much on this subject but cannot find my way clear.

Should we forget or try to forget each other or has he a right to his happiness and I to mine?

My parents have lived an unhappy, loveless life and I know what it will mean to them to continue their life together. The children must be cared for, I realize, but I love children and his are especially dear. They call me Aunt and everyone says they mind and like me better than they do their mother.

Have I the right to grasp my chance to happiness for I know my life will be bare without him or shall I give up and let the children and mother continue in this loveless state?

I cannot confide in my parents for they would have no sympathy for me but surely there is someone who will tell me what to do and help me to do what is right and best for us.

Yours sincerely, COLORADO GIRL.

Colorado Girl.—If you weren't so young I'd be tempted to scold you but even at your age you should be able to judge right from wrong. What about the wife's chance to happiness? No wonder she looks old. Bearing and caring for three children, while Friend Husband goes out for a good time, isn't conducive to beauty in any woman. Chances are when he married her she was as young and good looking as you are and liked a good time as well. Who is to blame? Simply because she doesn't want to go out for a good time doesn't mean that she wouldn't like to but she is too true a woman and mother to neglect her children. Someone has to shoulder the responsibilities, and her husband doesn't seem to be much of a man. If I were you I'd be ashamed of myself for even thinking that I cared for him. —Ed.

LOST LAKE, ALTA., CANADA. VIA PEACE RIVER.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I want to thank you, through this department, for the papers and magazines sent me. They will help me pass away many a long hour. And I'd like to say a little about our country. Our homestead is forty miles west of Peace River Crossing. The railroad goes to Berwyn, 22 miles from here. They are building it further west this year and that will "make" the country. There is land to be homesteaded here, also to be bought. There are many small lakes and creeks. There is plenty of hay. The land has to be cleared to be plowed. Oats are a good green-feed crop but do not ripen well on account of the early frosts. Oats average about 65 bushels to the acre, wheat from 40 to 58 bushels per acre. Potatoes and root gardens are a sure crop and yield heavily. There are all kinds of wild

The King's Jester

By Elizabeth Emmett

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE golden glow of romance had been denied to Marietta. Though she sensed the bitterness of this fact, she faced it philosophically.

"It's no fault of mine," she confided to the mirror as she dusted it, "but due to the accidents of birth and circumstances."

Marietta never consulted the mirror for pleasure. She knew she had two eyes, a nose, a mouth, et cetera, and though she could not determine which feature was at fault, the ensemble was not pleasing.

"Must be that they're put together wrong, but I'm no hand for solving picture puzzles. There's my face as the Lord made it, and it must be that He made it that way for a purpose. And, praises be, faces don't interfere with work—not my kind of a face, at least."

With the duster over her shoulder she descended to the kitchen where lamp chimneys awaited washing.

"Goodness, Marietta, it seems to me you grow homelier every day of your life."

It may have been the smut of lampblack across Marietta's nose that called forth this remark from her aunt. Marietta was not conscious of the smut, but the chimney clicked against the faucet at reference to her looks. She paused to see if the glass was chipped, then turned to her aunt, uneven teeth showing through a grin.

"Didn't know I could grow any homelier, but handsome is as handsome does, you've often said."

The click in Mrs. Green's throat bespoke irritation.

"Well, I can't see as you're going to do anything handsome. Here you are nearly nineteen and never had a fellow so much as walk home from the post office with you. When I was your age I was married and had twins."

"I never did hanker after twins."

As she swished the soapy water around in the lamp chimney her eyes strayed to where groups of twins, and offsprings that were not twins, littered the room either personally or with their possessions. There had been just the original twins when she, a seven-year-old orphan, came to live with her aunt. Since then there seemed as if there always had been a new baby for her to care for; her aunt apparently thinking she had done her duty by bringing it into the world.

From the disordered room Marietta's gaze strayed to her aunt's fat-cluttered figure. Involuntarily she compared it with her own wiry person.

"My figure is better than hers," she reflected. "At least, I can bend down to tie my shoestring instead of letting it trail along the floor."

A further comparison of merits was checked by the arrival of a servant from The Big House on the Hill. Little Master David was taking on something dreadful. Would Marietta come and pacify him?

"I don't know as I can spare her in the middle of a Saturday morning," demurred Mrs. Green, but Marietta already was drying her hands. Her aunt always pretended to oppose her going to the Big House, though secretly glad of the chance for Marietta to earn money.

"I'll come right along as soon as I change my dress." Marietta smiled at the servant. "What's particularly the matter with little David this morning?"

"The circus parade upset him. Even up on the hill he could hear the shouts of the youngsters as it passed through the valley. And the pain's desperate bad, too; so bad he can't sit up. His father's nigh beside himself trying to amuse him, and all the time he keeps calling for you."

"Tell him I'll be right there," said Marietta, and hurried upstairs to change her dress.

The home of little David Huntly was as a shrine to Marietta. From her aunt's untidy house (the poorest type in Tatoona, a village nestling in the valley in the foothills of the Catskills) she raised her eyes a hundred times a day to the massive pillars of the house that gleamed from the highest hill.

Its owner, David Huntly, Senior, was the only man of wealth in the village. That he held himself aloof from the village people caused no resentment among them, but colored more highly the yarns they wove about him.

He was a broken-hearted man, some said, and the death of his wife had made the sight of other women hateful to him. Others said that his life was consecrated to the welfare of his crippled son, whose birth had snuffed out the life of the mother. But the malicious gossips enjoyed telling that Huntly had broken his wife's heart; that he was responsible for the automobile accident that had resulted in disfigurement for her, and then, being a worshiper of beauty, he had turned from her with loathing.

Marietta knew the true version. The housekeeper had told her.

"I was in the room and saw it all," she said. "It is true he was startled, horrified, when the bandages were first removed. I was, myself. Her face, that had been the bonniest ever, was a sight to hurt eyes. But after that he was tender as a newly-in-love lover, and continued so up to the day she breathed her last and little David breathed his first. And he was one who had loathed ugliness in any form, too."

Marietta had winced at that last statement. She thought of it again as she left the messy yard and hastened toward her shrine. It was a morning gladsome with that winsome waywardness of late May. The valley lay like an emerald dropped in a cleft in the earth and, like steps enticing one to heaven, the hills rose one behind another until gray-crowned peaks and blue-arched dome met.

Marietta sniffed the air pregnant with blossoming promise of fruit. She watched a bird winging its flight with movements that made one clean-cut line of beauty. Her breath caught with pain. With the shedding of her kitchen apron she had dropped the shield of flippancy with which she braved life's ridicule. She lifted her eyes, not to the shrine, but to infinity.

"God, if you are God, why am I the one ugly spot on the day?"

And "that inverted bowl we call the sky" veiled the answer, if answer there was, to her question.

She dropped to less abstruse though still puzzling ponderings.

Mr. Huntly loathed ugliness in any form. Did he loathe the sight of her among his beautiful possessions? To be among them sent ecstatic thrills through her who never had felt the thrill of love's caress. She loved the feel of the polished floor beneath her feet. Surreptitiously she had touched a beautiful tapestry with tingling finger-tips. The housekeeper, with whom, as with all the servants, Marietta was a favorite, frequently showed her about the house, and sometimes left her to absorb at will the pervading beauty.

The master of the house had once caught the girl kneeling before a bit of statuary, intoxicated with its beauty, but too reverent to touch. In his kindly way he had explained the significance of its grouping. And Marietta, imbued with some of the enchantment of the place, freed from the self-consciousness which as a rule laid heavy bonds upon her, had answered intelligently. "Quite as if I were someone else, instead of Marietta Whitely," as she later expressed it quaintly to herself.

Now she relived the scene on that May morning, and passed from that to the other occasions when he had noticed her.

There was the time when he had loaned her a book—and forgotten all about the incident, as she discovered when she returned the book, hoping that he would talk with her about it.

There was another time when, sent into the garden by the housekeeper, she had come upon him with his face pressed upon the heart of a rose heavy with dew. He had not seemed so impersonal then; almost like a boy in his embarrassment as he, evidently to dissipate his confusion, plucked an armful of roses and thrust them upon her.

Mr. Huntly was gloomy, yes. Never had Marietta seen him smile. But the gloom, she thought, accorded with his dark eyes and finely-chiseled features.

Marietta was not gushing even in her highest moods of sentiment, but in her heart she classified the silent master of the house as The Prince in Search of Joy. The crippled heir was The Little King; and she was the King's Jester. Within the sick room the girl forgot the hatefulness of ugliness and used it gleefully to make the child forget his pain. Sweet-faced was David, and usually sweet-wayed. But when the "bad moments" seized him only Marietta could hush his peevish whining; only Marietta could still the temper that wantonly wrecked toys and hurled impertinence at elders. And only Marietta could make him laugh.

How tantalizing to a wee boy, held prisoner by pain, must have been the stray reminders of a circus. She quickened her steps while she rehearsed plans for outdoing previous exhibitions. Since the King could not go the circus, the circus must go to the King.

What was it the master of the house had said in that most delicious interview of all? "The gods have blessed you, Marietta. There's magic in you. Only magic could make my boy laugh through pain."

Tingling words those. Marietta loved the sound of them. Magic stored in her despised self? Then let her draw bountifully upon the supply today.

The door stood open for her. She was needed here, and watched for. Her thoughts were dyed in beauty.

"And I climbed from the valley to an open door, and thence to happiness." Thus sang her heart.

She nodded to the housekeeper and ran up the stairs as fretful words, shrilly, sobbingly intoned, came down from the sick room:

"Why doesn't Marietta come? I want my Marietta. I won't be dood. I don't want to be dood. I want——"

Marietta's step upon the threshold cut the sentence. Propped up in bed, hectic flushes from pain and anger splashing his white skin, little David beheld his wish fulfilled and smiled wanly.

Marietta's high tide of happiness ebbed. Contrary to custom, David, Senior, was in the room, and little David insisted on his remaining to see her perform.

Down on her knees beside the boy she slipped hastily and tried to quiet him with a wonder tale. He pushed her from him.

"Don't want stories. Daddy tells stories. No dood." His thin hand stroked her face with a confiding gesture. "Make me laugh, Marietta, make me laugh!" he pleaded.

Marietta muttered an incoherent prayer and prepared to suffer.

"Crown me King," ordered David.

She placed on his dark brown curls the tinsel crown prepared for such occasions, tucked in his hand the worn scepter, and waited.

"Be a donkey," piped the little King.

There was magic in her, undoubtedly—the magic of mimicry. She did things to her hair. She made her ears stand out with a prominence not expected of human ears. She made them wag. Then she opened her mouth of generous size and brayed.

"Do it adain!" shrieked little David. "Do it adain!"

Marietta brayed again.

"Be a rooster," was the next command.

The chanticleer who thought he caused the sun to rise had no more grandiose pose than did Marietta as she strutted across the room, flapped her arms and crowed three times.

Little David's almost hysterical laugh was echoed by one of deeper timber. Marietta whitened and slipped into the role of clown, and never did clown perform more clownish antics. Every physical defect was exaggerated to the point of ludicrousness. She became a very caricature of herself.

Only once did she look toward the man, and something of her soul's anguish must have flashed from her eyes to his. While David's attention was absorbed he slipped away.

It was high noon when Marietta left the Big House, having declined the housekeeper's invitation to "stay and have a bite."

She felt as if Fate had flogged her, body and soul, unmercifully. "I have been down into the Valley of Humiliation," was the way she expressed it to herself. "And that, atop of the highest hill in Natoona." Quaint conceit, that, if one happened to be in the mood for it.

Never again would she lift her eyes to this hill as to a goal in the climb toward happiness. Never again could she think of the open door save as a trap into which she had walked blindly. And the master? Ah, never would she forget his eyes as she beheld them in that one scorching encounter.

"God, if you are God, why did you make me?" she blazed out into space.

And from beneath "that inverted bowl we call the sky," suddenly came the answer, when she had thought there was no one to hear!

"Marietta, will you talk with me here a while?"

She shrank from the voice of the master of the Big House, but turned toward him in involuntary obedience.

He was beside her on the dusty mountain road. He had waited where she must pass, in order that they might talk in the freedom of the open. She followed when he led the way to a large boulder.

As in the episode of the rose, he was hopelessly embarrassed. She was too numb from intense feeling to help ease the situation, and his first words stung like salt in a cut:

"You made me laugh, Marietta, and then you were angry because I laughed."

His next words held some of the wistfulness of little David:

"It's a gift of the gods, that power of yours to lift people out of their misery. You don't begrudge me the first laugh I've had in four years, do you?"

She mumbled something about being glad to please him, but it was the self-conscious Marietta of the Valley who spoke.

"The first laugh I've had in four years," he repeated, "and the first real cry. For I cried when I left, after you had turned your eyes upon me; cried for the barren years that I might have stored with beauty."

Marietta sought in vain for some adequate expression of her thoughts. She did not know that in the supreme moment of her torture he had caught a likeness of the anguish he once had seen in his wife's eyes. She was aware only of a soul in trouble; a soul which, like hers, had passed through bitter waters. And when he said: "I need you with me always, Marietta, to show me the beauty of the spirit," she slipped her hand in his.

The contact of his smooth skin against her roughened fingers thrust facts upon her again.

"I'm ugly!" The words burst from her.

"Are you, Marietta?" There was genuine surprise in his voice. "I've never noticed. I only know you've seemed a valiant little figure when I've watched you coming up the hill in rough as well as pleasant weather. I've watched for you as eagerly as has my boy. The house always seemed brighter when you were in it. Even if I did not see you, I was always near enough to hear you laugh. But until I found that I, too, could laugh, I did not dare let you know how much I wanted you. It would be so like you to give yourself just to make another happy. Can't we laugh together, Marietta, you and I and little David?"

Marietta nodded. Happiness would not let her speak. She raised her dark, irregular features to the sunlight and to David. And who shall say she was not beautiful at that moment!

Summer Diseases of Babies

THE subject for our talk last month was entero-colitis, or inflammatory diarrhea, and this month we shall discuss cholera infantum as one of the summer diseases of baby. Cholera infantum or, as it is often called, summer complaint, is an acute catarrhal inflammation of the stomach and bowels, the mucous membrane being irritated or inflamed, together with an irritation of the sympathetic nervous system occurring in babies during their first teething.

It is characterized by severe colicky pains, vomiting, diarrhea, and may be accompanied by fever with great prostration, occurring in babies who are teething and who have been previously healthy. The symptoms are a simple diarrhea, followed by great muscular weakness, some nausea, spasms of griping pains in bowels, great depression, seems hard for the baby to breathe, coldness and dampness of the whole or part of the body, cold, pale lips and tongue, great thirst, weak cry and sunken pinched look to the face.

Cholera infantum is often mistaken for some of the other intestinal troubles of babies, and it is important that you know at once what the illness is, for within a few hours you have a seriously ill baby, rapid wasting of its strength and flesh. The most important point to remember is the sudden and severe line of symptoms that you will notice at once, the great weakness, prostration, and paleness that comes on in a few hours. The movements from the bowels soon get watery, soaking the clothing, leaving a green stain, and you may get from ten to twenty of these in a day. The causes of this disease are teething, extreme heat which continues for several days at a time. July and August are the months which give us the most of these cases. The reasons for this are the extreme heat during these months, also the water supply being then at its lowest point, as a rule, contains more decayed vegetable matter at this time. Teething is a powerful predisposing cause of cholera infantum and you rarely see a baby ill with it before teething, or after the teeth get through. Diet that is improper is another common cause, sudden weaning, or change in the food, accidental or careless use of unwholesome milk, or, as we often see, unripe fruit or blueberries or blackberries. Blueberries are a common cause and it is a safe rule not to allow a baby any uncooked blueberries until they have their teeth and can chew them thoroughly. Unhealthy surroundings, dampness, decayed vegetable matter, poor water that has been contaminated by the soakings from cesspools or sewers.

There are a few things that parents should bear in mind as a preventive of cholera infantum. Be sure your water supply is pure and not contaminated by privies, stable or henyard, do not allow vegetables to decay, or sewers or drain-pipe to become obstructed, see that baby sleeps in a well-ventilated room.

In a great many cases it is easy to find the causes of the disease, causes that are due to recklessness or carelessness and can be remedied.

There are parents who would cheerfully give their own lives for the protection of their baby, but who thoughtlessly expose it to the serious dangers of improper food or water, or allow it to breathe the air from an obstructed sewer-pipe or cesspool.

The question most frequently asked is, How can I tell that my baby has cholera infantum, and not some of the many intestinal troubles with disturbed stomach that cause frequent bowel movements. The points of difference are as follows: the season of the year, baby teething, the profuse fluid movements from the bowels, the frequent severe vomiting, the sudden early weakness, the very rapid pulse, with or without fever; cool or cold surface of body, pinched, anxious expression, sighing or irregular breathing, and great thirst and great prostration. In a few words, a child ill with cholera infantum is suddenly, seriously ill with a line of symptoms that are characteristic of this disease alone, and while other bowel troubles may appear somewhat like it, they never are attended with the sudden weakness which is almost a collapse, cold, clammy skin, pinched look of baby, as if the baby had been sick for weeks.

Preventive measures are very important in all diseases, but in none more so than in cholera infantum. Clean up your homes, inside and out, before the hot weather comes on, clean out your cellars, see that the water you use for drinking and cooking purposes is pure and that there is no chance for it to be infected by its surroundings. If you use well water, see that the well is cleaned out often enough to keep it clean; see that there is no chance for the privy, stable or henyard to drain into it.

In some soils a stable or henyard will infect a well at an unbelievable distance if the well is located on lower ground than the stable. This is brought about by soaking into the ground and getting into the little streams that supply the well.

In regard to treatment, send for a physician at once, and until he arrives put the baby at rest at once, and use measures to relieve pain and support its strength. You may use mustard, or spice poultices or turpentine stupes on bowels.

Cut down the food, five to thirty drops of brandy, according to age, in barley water given often is sufficient for a while.

Bismuth subnitrate in one- or two-grain doses, every two hours, is good, and if there is great pain or restlessness, one- or two-drop doses of tincture of opium should be given every four hours.

Do not give the baby water all the time, but let it suck small pieces of ice for the great thirst.

The subject for our talk next month will be Intestinal Influenza of Babies.

Questions and Answers

MATERNITY CORSETS, BROWN SPOTS.—I should like to know if maternity corsets are harmful. Will you kindly tell me how to get rid of moth patches all over my face? MRS. E. J., Patchogue, N. Y.

A.—No, maternity corsets are not harmful, but are helpful as they offer more or less support. For the moth patches, try the following: Recipe—Hydrargri Chloridi Corros, grains, six. Acidi Acetici Dil, drams, two. Boracic acid, scruples, two. Aquæ roses, add to ounces four. Apply on spots night and morning. Caution: This should have a poison label.

DELAYED TEETHING.—My little boy, eighteen months old, has but five teeth and is cross and irritable. Is there anything I can do for him? Would you advise getting a necklace called "Job's tears" for him to wear? Will you please send me a prescription for blotches on face during pregnancy?

MRS. A. E. McD., Mooreston, N. D.

A.—Do not know how this necklace called "Job's tears" would aid unless baby could bite them. In healthy babies the teeth come in due time, but there is a wide range in the time or ages that they arrive. For the blotches you mention, use the recipe prescribed for moth patches in answer to Mrs. E. J.

DROPSY, WEANING BABY.—During my last pregnancy I had dropsy very badly. What was the cause and how can I prevent it? Is Lydia Pinkham's medicine good to take before childbirth? My baby is one year old. Can I wait until fall to wean him? What causes baby's stools to be green and jellylike?

MRS. M. T. J., Norcross, Minn.

A.—The most common cause of dropsy is due to the kidneys not performing their proper function; have urine examined, keep bowels regular. No, Lydia Pinkham's medicine will not help you in your condition, neither do you need any medicine; just live your natural, normal life, being careful that bowels and kidneys are normal. Indigestion will cause baby's stools to be green and jellylike; should wean baby at once.

BED-WETTING, PINWORMS.—My six-months-old son wets the bed every night, and I have tried all sorts of remedies without results. He has pinworms badly, is nervous and talks in his sleep.

MRS. V. F. C., Barnesville Ohio.

A.—Bed-wetting in children is often an obstinate condition to relieve, owing to the fact that there is a cause in each individual case and we must remove the cause. It may be caused by a highly acid urine, it may be of purely nervous origin, or it may be caused by irritation of the rectum, and in your son's case I think the pinworms may be the cause. Would suggest that you occasionally wash out rectum with decoction or solution of quassia chips; take two ounces of quassia chips and put in pint of warm water, allow to stand for several hours, strain this through clean cloth, and use one-half of it or eight ounces to wash out rectum, after cleaning rectum with soap and water. Three or four treatments of this will relieve, and if it fails you have not invaded the bowel high enough to get results, or it has not been retained long enough. The enema should be retained several minutes, by rectal pad.

NERVOUSNESS, CONTRACTED MUSCLES.—I am twenty years old, the mother of three children, and have nervous spells, tremble as if I were going to fall to pieces. What can I do for a scar on baby's arm from a burn that draws up the arm?

MRS. J. W., Harwood, Texas.

A.—For the nervousness should advise taking glycerophosphates in tablespoonful doses, three times a day; also take, every three hours, a tablet containing one grain each of valerianate of iron, quinine and zinc. For the contracted muscles from the burn, should cautiously massage arm after rubbing it thoroughly with cocoa-butter, moving it a little straighter each day. You must do this gently, being careful not to cause any irritation, and with a little patience you will get a normal arm.

COUGH.—What can I do for my seven-year-old daughter, who is strong and looks healthy but has a loud, deep cough every time she has the least bit of cold? Have taken her to several physicians, who relieve the cough, but it soon comes back.

MRS. J. H., St. Louis, Mo.

A.—Your daughter may have enlarged or diseased tonsils, that the slight cold irritates, and causes the cough. An examination would either verify this or eliminate it from consideration. Would suggest examination, and removal if enlarged or diseased. Give her teaspoonful doses, after meals, of syrup of hydriodic acid (Gardner's) after meals for several weeks. Locally, you should have her sponge upper chest with cold dashes of water, followed with a brisk rub with bath-towel, every day.

INDIGESTION.—Will you tell me what makes my two-months-old baby have colic so much? He cries, groans and sometimes vomits up his milk. He is tolerably fat, although he sleeps but little in the daytime. I am bothered a great deal with gas, and am some nervous. MRS. H. D. R., Virginia.

A.—Get your own digestion in a normal condition and your nursing baby will be relieved. Gas or indigestion with nursing mother will give gas and colic to the baby. Would suggest your taking two-teaspoonfuls doses of elix lactated pepsin after meals. Take, every three hours, a tablet containing one grain each of valerianate of iron, quinine and zinc, for your nerves.

DECAYED TEETH, WEANING BABY.—My twelve-months-old baby has six teeth, and they look as if they were decaying, and with my four-year-old child, her teeth are all decayed. What can I do to prevent this, as I am afraid it will affect the permanent teeth? Is it best to nurse baby during summer?

MRS. F. J. W., Crivitz, Wisc.

A.—I should wean baby at once, put him on cow's milk at once, adding tablespoonful of lime-water to every five-ounce feeding. Should wash off teeth, and cleanse gums with a solution of Glycothymoline, teaspoonful to tablespoonful of warm water, two or three times a day. Should use clean cotton swab, not a toothbrush.

CONSTIPATION.—I am writing for advice concerning my five-months-old baby as she is badly constipated and is not gaining in weight as she should. I nurse her, but she cries and fusses as if she were hungry, and I have to give her daily enemas.

MRS. E. J. F., Spokane, Wash.

A.—I should wean baby and put her on modified milk, giving teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia often enough to regulate bowels. Enemas are for an emergency, but are not to be given daily.

SOUTHERN OREGON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

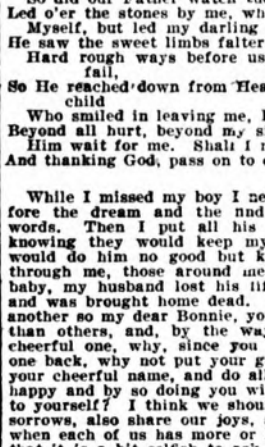
I wonder if I can induce Mrs. Wilkinson to print this letter. I've tried twice before but failed both times.

I've thought of so many things I'd like to write about but seem to forget the most important ones but here is one I hope will do someone some good. If you own an automobile and your family is not large and there is room for "one more" stop and think if there isn't some neighbor or friend who would enjoy a ride into the country, or maybe into town. I have noticed so many times a family of two or three going for a ride with room for one or two more in the car. It looks selfish not to take someone, though they may be thoughtless and not selfish at all. It isn't that they enjoy their ride better for knowing someone else has to stay at home, like the little boy who enjoyed his ice cream because another boy watched him eat it.

Sisters, if you live near a neighbor with a small baby, offer to take care of it for her occasionally to give her time for a little visit or a trip to town. Of course there are some who would impose upon this kindness. I know I'd have been glad if someone had offered to care for my baby for an afternoon. It was sickly and that made it hard for me to take it with me.

Don't think I'm a natural beggar for while there are many ways of cheering a weary soul, these are ones you might overlook. Wouldn't you feel better to know you had helped to cheer someone?

I live in the Rogue River Valley where so much excellent fruit is raised.



I saw a letter in the Sisters' Corner from Athens, Ohio, my home state and we lived near Athens. That is where I saw my first circus and I thought the elephants were made of rubber. I was about six years old. I hope to visit there when I get rich enough.

With best wishes, T. B.

LICKING, R. R. 1, Mo.

DEAR SISTERS, ONE AND ALL:

I have been a silent reader of COMFORT for a long time and always anxious for my paper to come.

LORENA MARETTA MONTGOMERY.

I will tell you a little about myself. I am four feet, eight inches tall, have auburn hair, blue eyes and weigh 117 pounds. I have a dear husband and two babies. My boy is eight years old and goes to school every day. My baby girl was three years old the first of last April. You see she is an April Fool baby. We took her from an Orphans' Home when she was five weeks old. She weighed six pounds then but she gained two pounds within a week and now I am sending her picture so you can see what a beautiful child she is. We have legally adopted her and love her as our own. Her name is Lorena Maretta.

We live on a small farm of sixty-five acres, have lots of good neighbors around us. I like the farm life best and the freedom it will give to my little girl, who can run and romp without danger.

I hope all the sisters are Christians. If not, why not try to be one? It will help you bear the burdens—many of which seem hard, many of which will not seem so hard as the years roll on.

I am twenty-seven years old, and I have been married six years. My husband and I had been married before. MRS. F. M. MONTGOMERY.

VANCOUVER, 910 West 6th St., WASH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

While I am not a subscriber to COMFORT, my mother is and as she is with me I read her paper and thoroughly enjoy it all.

I read Mrs. Bonnie Bovell's letter and am writing this to her but if she does not see it perhaps it will bring comfort to some others whose hearts are almost broken by the loss of little ones.

I, too, lost a tiny, golden-haired boy, just learning to talk. It seemed as though I could never face the coming years. One night I dreamed the little fellow came to me, climbed into my lap and putting his tiny hands on my face, kissed me and said, "Don't cry Mamma, I'm so happy," and the radiant expression on his baby face was wonderful. Then directly I found the following lines in a scrap of paper:

"As tender mothers guiding baby steps,
In places, some at which the tiny feet would trip,
Lift up the little ones in arms of love,
And set them down beyond the harm,
So did our Father watch the precious boy,
Led o'er the stones by me, who stumbled oft
Myself, but led my darling on.
He saw the sweet limbs faltering, and all the Hard rough ways before us, where my arms would fail,
So He reached down from Heaven and lifting the dear child
Who smiled in leaving me, He put him down
Beyond all hurt, beyond my sight, and bade
Him wait for me. Shall I not, then, be glad,
And thanking God, pass on to overtake?"

While I missed my boy I never grieved as I had before the dream and the finding of these comforting words. Then I put all his clothes and toys away, knowing they would keep my sorrow before me and would do him no good but keep me wrought up and through me, those around me. Soon after losing my baby, my husband lost his life in a railroad accident and was brought home dead. One heartbreak followed another so my dear Bonnie, your sorrows are no harder than others, and, by the way, your name is such a cheerful one, why, since you cannot bring your loved one back, why not put your grief aside and live up to your cheerful name, and do all you can to make others happy and by so doing you will surely bring happiness to yourself? I think we should help others bear their sorrows, also share our joys, and don't you know that when each of us has more or less of our own sorrows, that it is a bit selfish to ask them to share too many of ours? There are so many heartaches that it is worth our while to cheer up others and I find by so doing my sorrows are melting away. I truly hope I have not offended you and would like so well to hear from you if you care to write to me. For that matter I would like to hear from anyone who cares to write, particularly those interested in the psychological view of life.

I think COMFORT such a helpful paper and like to read the letters from different ones; they always interest me.

Good wishes to all if this reaches the paper, if not, to the editor anyway.

MRS. M. FRANKLAND.

Mrs. Frankland.—The verse you sent is comforting indeed and should cheer others even as it has cheered you. You are a brave woman and we are glad to have you with us.—Ed.

KAMPSVILLE, ILL.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I am going to you for advice. What shall I do? I have promised many of the sisters flowers and had sent one box and had another ready to send, even had the stamps on the box, when the mail carrier asked me what was in it and when I told him he would not take it. He said we were not allowed to send plants of any kind or slips of flowers through mail or any way unless they had been inspected by the government. He said I would be liable to a fine if I did so. There isn't anyone around here to inspect them.

I hope you will publish this as it takes so much time and stamps to write to each one. I have received forty-five letters and they are still coming. I am going to correspond with some of the women but cannot write often.

Your COMFORT sister, MRS. IDA BECKER.

ATHENS, Care J. J. Montgomery, TEXAS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

This is the fifth time I've tried to get in but I will not complain for I am sure Mrs. Wilkinson knows best.

I am Irish, five feet, six and one-half inches tall, have blue eyes and dark brown hair. Am jolly and good natured, the mother of the sweetest kiddies that ever were and have a husband that is good and true. We have just one pocketbook and we both, although nearly forty years old, are children yet. We run and romp with our own children and it is lots of fun, too. Dear folks, why not look at life in a bright and sunny way. You'll find the roses among the thorns then. We all have troubles, every living one of us. All husbands and wives have faults so don't get the idea in your head that Mr. Smith or Jones are ideal husbands or that Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Jones are ideal wives, just because you cannot see their inner lives. Don't compare your husband or wife with theirs and wish yours were like them. Husbands or wives are what you make them by good or evil thoughts. Believe they are good, loving and true and let no evil thought of them enter your mind and it will in time make them all you desire them to be. If husband comes home hungry, tired and cross, have patience with him. I have been just so myself.

I want help so I come to dear old COMFORT. I want to get a dear old lady, past fifty years of age, preferably a school teacher, but with a high school education, with or without kin, jolly good nature, Irish or German preferred, to adopt as a mother and give her a good home in return for helping me educate my children. I live a long distance from school and I want her to teach the children during the winter months for which I will pay her wages. After school is out she can remain and I will clothe her and give her a good home and be a good daughter to her if she will be a good mother to me. My own mother is dead. I would want this woman to love my children and be kind to them. Write to address given at head of this letter. BETTY B.

TENNESSEE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

As I have received so much benefit from the COMFORT sisters' letters, will now try and write something that may help someone else, so please let me in. I am twenty-one years old, five feet, two inches tall and weigh about 105 pounds. Have brown hair, blue eyes and medium complexion.

I wonder how many of our COMFORT sisters are interested in good health. I am, for one. Really, I never knew what good health was until about a year ago, but I have worked at a health plan for myself which has done wonders for me. I will tell you about it. After reading many books on this subject I have made out a list of health habits and have been doing my best to make them fixed habits. The first thing to keep in mind is to stick to it until we have good health. If you have poor health or a bad complexion, just get out in the open air or take long tramps through the woods and along the country roads. Practice some good body and breathing exercises in your room every morning and evening. Whenever you happen to be out of doors, just take a few good deep breaths. This is a list of my health rules. Get up early in the morning and out in the open air and take breathing exercises, take air in slowly through nostrils, hold until you count twenty, then exhale through nostrils. Try to find some work to do before breakfast. We have a large lawn so I run the lawn mower a while before breakfast. Drink two glasses of hot water before breakfast and about eight glasses of water during the day.

Girls, let's be strong and well, let's put on our heavy shoes and go for a tramp and keep ourselves young, strong and happy; in other words, learn to live.

With much love to all,
WILD ROSE OF TENNESSEE.

ROCK FALLS, ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT ever since a child and find it is a great help. I let my subscription run out last spring while the shops were closed and money scarce but I felt lost all the time and as soon as I could I sent for it again, and borrowed all I could of the numbers I missed. I find my time quite taken up as I have five children ranging in age from four months to twelve years, and am not very strong.

To the sister who has a child afraid of the dark, I would say, just be patient. My oldest girl used to be so afraid she wouldn't go into the next room without a bodyguard but she has outgrown it. I told her there was nothing to hurt her and was careful that no one frightened her. I think what helped her the most was taking her to a Hallowe'en party, dressed in a sheet herself.

I am more interested in my chickens than anything else, except my children and my husband. I can't see anything in gossiping about my neighbors and I don't have time to watch what others are doing.

DAMON MARION AND JESSE ALVIN BURKE.

I am sending a picture of my two babies, Damon Marion, four and one-half years, and Jesse Alvin, one and one-half years old. I hope I will see them in COMFORT.

Sincerely, MRS. M. B. BURKE.

Mrs. Burke.—Is Jesse Alvin always so serious or is he like that only when having his picture taken? Perhaps he was afraid his cat wouldn't behave as nicely as brother's rabbit, and that would have been a dreadful disgrace.—Ed.

GALENA, R. R. 1, KANS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you give me a little space for a chat with you? I have been a reader of COMFORT for years and my mother used to read it to me when I was a little tot. I think it is a wonderful paper.

I am the baby of my father's family and there are

Mrs. Skaggs as Spook

by Shirley Cookman Hayes

"A birth-or a death; perhaps both!"

Constantia giggled hysterically. "Was he scared?"

On he went, yelping as of some strange animal.

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CONSTANTIA'S acquaintance with Mrs. Skaggs came about through her habit of nocturnal ramblings with a dog, Constantia's habit, not Mrs. Skaggs'! That lady's spookishness was domestic and centralized.

For Constantia, being a hard-pressed young architect, worked all day over a drawing-board in her San Francisco flat. For evening exercise she wandered across the grassy vacant lots whose farther slope was topped by a two-storied white flat building. After dinner she and the dog nearly always sought this spot; it gave Constantia a green lapse of country across the hard smothering town pavements.

At right angles to the flats and facing a lower street was an old wooden house deep in cypresses, and a silver moon to be depended upon for illusions of delightful far-away things.

In crossing the lot diagonally one passed near a great tree in the old house's back yard, and one climbed to the upper street along the side of the white flats, which backed with a supercilious hitch to their clothes-lines above the cypress-house. Although the white flats were well built and new, the lower apartment from some unknown cause was nearly always vacant.

That particular night, on their after-dinner promenade, the dog ran ahead and Constantia followed more slowly, for a great summer orb, yellow this time, was just lifting behind the trees. The young girl thought of her childhood in the country, and how effective the moon and trees would be done in black and white on her next bungalow plans.

Suddenly, as she moved on toward the upper street, a strange, sickish-sweet odor assailed her. "Ether!" she thought, as she called the dog and slipped on the leash. The pair hurried up to the sidewalk that fronted the white flats. The curtains and one front window were up; the room blazed with light that concealed nothing from passers-by.

A brass bed stood toward the rear; on it an indistinct mass under rumpled silk comforters. Backs to the window, and looking down at the occupant over the brass rail of the bed-foot, stood a pair of sinister black-coated figures.

"A birth—or a death; perhaps both!" thought the girl with a shudder, her eyes fastened upon the black coats. There was a strange lack of grief in the attitude of the pair of men. A tense expectancy characterized their backs. They were anticipating something they might welcome with relief. But it made Constantia shiver. She and the dog hurried down another street home.

Two days later the curtains were drawn in the lower flat, and a neat little black-lettered sign offered "Furnished Room To Let." The tragedy had come and gone, for through the uncurtained window of the hall bedroom that faced the vacant side-lot, Constantia could see uncovered pillows and the gay flowers of the same silk comforters piled up on the bare-mattressed brass bed.

Two busy weeks passed. Every day Constantia, poring over blue-prints of garage and cottage, pondered the mystery of the white flats, until she ached to speak of it, to tell someone what she had seen. Living alone in bachelor quarters, she had but one sympathetic ear, that of her dog, but Brownie remained discreetly silent when this subject was mentioned, though with wistful head cocked to one side, she looked unutterable, melancholy things. It was impossible to broach it to her conventional friends, who scolded her too much as it was about her "Bohemian" life, and her reprehensible penchant for wandering round at night alone.

Under the pressure of work Constantia had just about forgotten the incident, when, late one afternoon, her bell rang. On the threshold stood a stout, middle-aged woman, who inquired in a composed voice for furnished rooms to let.

"Yes; those white flats up there have a sign out," answered Constantia, courteous but preoccupied. She was rushed with a drawing, and the daylight was about gone.

"Are you acquainted with the people living there?" insisted the woman gently. Her voice was low, with refined intonations.

"Why——" Constantia's pent-up knowledge came out with a rush. The woman's eyes, veiled to formality, were beseeching. "Why—the other night, I passed there just as something terrible was happening. It must have been an operation"—her voice dropped to a whisper—"and somebody died——"

She broke off, struck by the other's expression. She was regarding Constantia earnestly, as though plumbing the very depths of the girl's soul.

"Yes." When at last she spoke, her tone was queerly muffled. Constantia's look clung to her face, whose full lines were distorted.

"Yes," began the woman again with obvious effort, while Constantia's blue eyes showed great black pupils dilated with fear. "True—true. I died."

Constantia turned white and stared at the other as at a ghost blocking the doorway. The woman gave a queer mirthless laugh.

"May I come in——? I'll tell you about it. You've no idea how interesting it is to die, it is quite an experience. Besides, it generally leaves you without a friend in the world. People are too busy to grieve, nowadays——" She moved past the girl, standing awestruck in her own doorway, and entered the dusky apartment. Constantia's hand shook as she hastened to light the lamp. It made a red-shaded glow of cheer, of home-comfort, of reality.

The woman, with her unmistakable air of good breeding, seated herself upon the couch and smiled across at Constantia's ashy face behind the lamp. The white spaniel, after snuffing about the stranger's skirts, jumped up and curled round beside her on the couch. The woman dropped a plump white-gloved hand to the dog's head.

"How much did you see, that night?" she asked.

"J-just the b-backs of the m-men,—and the b-bed——" stammered Constantia. She had a nervous chill and her teeth were chattering. One would never have recognized the courageous bachelor-architect, the despair of her friends.

"One of them was my second husband, the other a doctor friend of his. They "helped" me die. They used enough ether to asphyxiate the neighborhood——"

"I know——" murmured Constantia.

"When it was all over they sent for the last rites, but were unfortunate in their selection. The Reverend Mr. Morrison used to be my pastor, but he'd just starved for years in the ministry, so he finally gave it up for the undertaking business. He had to bury people anyway, and there was more money in it.

"They left him alone with me,—but the ether had been wearing off. I heard the door close, and Mr. Skaggs' footsteps going down the hall. When Mr. Morrison came over to the bed and lifted the sheet I came to and sat up. He'd some smelling-salts with him, and a flask of good whiskey——"

Constantia giggled hysterically.

"Was he scared?"

"Well,——yes," answered the woman in her deliberate, carefully enunciated words,—"but not as much as some men I know—might've been. He's studied the occult, and believes the dead can be raised. He's a clean man, with nothing on his conscience.

"That night he smuggled me out to his home, but I insisted upon holding the funeral just the same,—only it was over a closed casket. Mr. Morrison didn't like the idea of selling my husband a casket to hold a sack of coal, but I prevailed upon him. Two sacks would have been nearer my weight—the woman permitted herself to smile—but Mr. Skaggs wasn't a pall-bearer, and never knew how light I'd become from my long illness.

She rose and stood before Constantia.

"I want you to help me, for my daughter's sake. She's a sweet, unspoiled child, like you, but—not strong, like you! I know why he killed me,—he wants her! Shall she fall into the hands of a murderer,—shall she? shall she?" hissed the woman with an intensity of venom in her whisper that sent chills chasing over Constantia. The dog thumped a reassuring tail against the couch and whined, at which the tension broke. The woman sank back upon the couch, and caught the dog against her side with little hugging pressures.

"Dear thing; she's sorry for me!"

At this testimony of confidence on Brownie's part, Constantia's fear fell away. The woman was not a ghost, neither was she deranged. Brownie's judgment was fairly accurate, and it was on record that dogs showed aversion to chilly specters.

She also rose and faced her strange guest.

"I'm sorry, too. Tell me—— I'll help you."

The woman, whose drawn face showed a heart bitterly sore under her conventional tranquility, answered merely, "Thank you," but there was gratitude in her quiet voice.

Under the red umbrella shade of the great lamp they talked for an hour; at its end Constantia vibrated with excitement.

The next day she boldly rang the bell at the white flat where the tragedy had come and gone.

A shrinking, flower-like blonde girl, pathetic in her black house-dress, opened the door. Constantia, who, in spite of adventurous trend had felt some qualms about mixing in the matter, was reassured when she saw the girl's innocence, for the blue eyes fastened upon her with the same beseeching look as the mother's.

To Constantia's inquiries she answered with a touch of embarrassment. She opened the door of the front room with a delicate white hand that trembled, glided over to the window and drew up the shade, letting in a flood of southern sunlight.

A couch replaced the former brass bed. Redwood mantlepiece, electric fixtures, oak dressing-table—all were the same.

Constantia engaged the room "for a friend," paid the deposit left her by her visitor, and that night took possession and was given a latch-key by the flower-like girl, whose eyes were red with weeping.

At a tap on the front window Constantia dropped her architectural review, slipped out and opened the door to Mrs. Skaggs.

"Have you everything you want?" she inquired before she left.

"Yes, thank you," answered the same unruffled voice. "I've my traveling-bag, and a spirit-lamp."

Constantia laughed. "I'll come by every night, in case you need anything."

Her new friend thanked her, and Constantia went home, her last view of Mrs. Skaggs printed upon her mind. The stout lady was established on the couch unrolling a bolt of white muslin which flowed to the floor in snowy billows and swathed itself about her plump, practical feet encased in smart leather pumps. On the couch was a druggist's box marked "Phosphorus," with a skull and cross-bones.

The following night when she tapped on the window Mrs. Skaggs tiptoed out and joined her and Brownie.

"How is the ghost walking?" demanded Constantia, after the dog's joyous leaps against Mrs. Skaggs had been acknowledged, and the three, with Brownie tugging on the leash, dropped down the slope across the grassy lots.

"Why, I didn't do much last night. I heard Betty sobbing, and it was too much for me. I slipped down the hall and stayed quite a while outside her door; it was locked—thank God! I whispered through the keyhole not to grieve; I said it over and over again—told her I'd always watch over her. She stopped crying; she must've heard me——"

Brownie jerked on the leash and tugged Constantia forward after a black cat that shot down through the cypresses.

"Not frightened?" she called back over her shoulder, waiting for Mrs. Skaggs to catch up.

"She loves me too much for that," answered the mother, simply.

"Worth while dying to find out?"

The woman nodded. "Dead or alive, it's the same thing. She undoubtedly believes my spirit has returned to protect her; it has!" asserted Mrs. Skaggs, with a determined glint to her gray eye.

"And your husband?" ventured Constantia, fearing to tread upon delicte ground.

"He snored all night; he certainly is relieved to get rid of me," answered her companion without apparent emotion. "But tomorrow night,—tomorrow night," she repeated through set teeth, "he'll find out that the dead can rise!"

Her voice was so vindictive that Constantia felt the same shudder of unearthly fear. She laughed, trying to master it.

"Don't kill him with shock!"

"Oh, no! he must suffer first," the monotonous voice assured her, with the finality of an avenging angel. Constantia bade her good by and went home with her dog across the vacant lots.

On returning from an errand the next day she caught sight of a black cutaway-coated back that looked familiar. The man mounted the steps of the white flats and inserted his latch-key in the lower door. At sound of her steps he turned. Constantia fancied there was a scared look to his vain face with its brutal jowl. He had all the marks of a middle-aged man trying to be young; his immaculate clothes had a dandefied cut which accentuated a certain disagreeable personality about his thickish, short-legged body.

Saturday evening Constantia again tapped on the window. A sepulchral whisper bade her come in. The latch was off the front door. Mrs. Skaggs, quivering with suppressed excitement, caught her hand and drew her into her room. Brownie jumped up against her, but she patted her with an absent hand.

"Come back, won't you—about nine-thirty? They're going to leave this house at ten! He's going to take her away—my daughter; she doesn't want to go,— but he's frantic—says he'll leave her behind to starve! She's been packing all day—her things and his, and crying into the trunks!" Mrs. Skaggs dropped her head into her hands. "I've been haunting too energetically, I guess," she admitted,—"but it was such fun to creep along the corridor at midnight and moan unearthly things through the keyhole! First chance I ever had to tell him what I thought of him! But the sheet and phosphorus were all wasted! He's double-locked his door every blessed night since I began to groan and sigh in the hall; his nerves are all gone now. Be here promptly at nine-thirty; the trunks have left already, or, stay now, can't you?"

"I'll take Brownie home first," demurred Constantia, and together she and the dog raced across the grassy lots to her own little flat behind the lawn. The lamp made a red-shaded glow in the window.

At nine-fifteen she set out again. Her short acquaintance with this remarkable woman told her she was about to witness a grand climax. She wondered how Mrs. Skaggs intended to snatch her daughter out of the clutches of this evil man, ready to pursue his passion in spite of superstitious terror.

Mrs. Skaggs, swathed from head to foot in the white muslin, was calmly darning stockings under the flickering light of a candle, so shaded as to render the rest of the room completely dark.

In answer to Constantia's look of inquiry she opened the door and stood listening to faint sounds that came from the back of the flat. "They're having a cup of coffee in the dining-room," she explained, closing the door gently. "Now, will you take this?"

"This" was a thick square of pasteboard with a long, sharp tack pushed through each corner.

Directed by Mrs. Skaggs, Constantia put out the light of the entrance hall, and then fastened the pasteboard over the wall buttons of the electric switch.

Mrs. Skaggs assumed a do-or-die expression, pulled down the hood-like mask attached to her costume and glanced at her wrist watch. It was quarter to ten.

"Go out and sit on the hall bench," she ordered. "Smelling-salts?"

"Yes," answered Constantia.

It was pitchy black in the front hall.

From the dining-room at the rear came confused sounds; a man's raucous tones begging, threatening, pleading, and the voice of the young girl, sometimes answering quietly, and then breaking into a half-hysterical little wail that made Constantia ache with pity. After one of these cries Mrs. Skaggs' door opened quietly, then closed again. She had put out the candle.

The man's voice rose to an ugly, menacing shout. The dining-room door opened, flinging a glow of light across the lower end of the corridor. There was a sound of suppressed sobbing a door opened across the hall. A pause.

"Got your hat on?" demanded the man's voice belligerently from the dining-room. "Suit-case?" The girl's voice gave a little broken assent.

"All right; I'll lock up."

Constantia, sitting tense in the dark front hall, heard the young girl, sniffling quietly, come toward her down the corridor, as though anxious to control herself and get away as far as possible from her stepfather. Quick breathing told Constantia she was standing close to the entrance to the front hall.

The kitchen door slammed to; a key was turned. A click followed; the dining-room light was switched off, which plunged the lower corridor in darkness, and Constantia heard the man's heavy tread coming down the hall. As he approached the spot where the young girl stood she heard her draw in her breath in a quivering sob of terror and repulsion.

A moment, and there came the sound of a struggle in the darkness. There was a muffled scream, and Constantia's heart stood still.

'Well, if you won't, you won't!" half shouted the man's furious voice. The young girl had jerked out of his embrace and came flying across the dark hall to the door of her mother's room on Constantia's right, and banged on it frantically, gasping and panting as she flung the weight of her body against the door, which refused to yield.

"What in h—— are you doing now?" yelled the man.

"I just want to say good by to the room—the lady will let me!" sobbed the girl, and Constantia could almost feel her cringe at his voice as she pounded desperately on the door and got no response from within.

"Oh! all right; hurry, though, and let's get out of this cursed flat! Where in hell is that light-switch!"

Constantia shook, but her chief emotion was fury. If Mrs. Skaggs did not come out soon—— But what could she do alone? She, Constantia, had no weapon, and the heavy man could easily overpower her in the darkness. She sat quiet, holding her breath and praying. What, in heaven's name had happened to Mrs. Skaggs!

The girl continued to knock and listen, choking with fear, while the man swore under his breath and fumbled about the wall for the light-switch.

The girl ceased to knock, for the room's quiet darkness deceived her. She turned about and faced the sound of the man's hoarse cursing. In that moment Constantia knew that some wild idea had bidden her throw herself upon the mercy of a strange woman,—one, moreover, she had never seen.

"Suppose I do go with you?" Her tense, desperate young voice showed fight. "You've not even promised to marry me! What assurance have I got that you'll not desert me?"

The man gave a grating "He! he!"—unpleasant, full of sinful gloating.

"Marry? Oh, after awhile..... It's much too soon after your mother's sad demise——" He shuffled forward, giving up his search for the light. "Come on." He opened the front door, dumped two suit-cases down on the outer porch, and then turned back to Betty.

Constantia, following the man's movements, had not observed the noiseless opening of Mrs. Skaggs' door until she heard a strange uncanny laugh.

"Yes.....much too soon!" answered a voice. There on the threshold appeared a presence in white—a luminous figure, for it shone from head to foot with phosphorescent glow. The figure advanced; seemed to float over the hall.

The man's body jerked at the gruesome whisper; he turned, caught sight of the apparition, and as the phantom bore down upon him gave one unearthly screech and tore down the concrete steps with a clatter of boots and a whirlwind of flying coat-tails.

On he went—the sound of running feet went on down the street, accompanied by a strange yelping, as of some maddened animal.

A smothered cry close at hand; a soft thud told Constantia that Betty had fainted. She laid her out flat upon the floor and applied the smelling-salts. Mrs. Skaggs advanced to the front door and stood in all her phosphorescent glory in full view of the street, while she gazed with casual interest after the flying figure of her ex-husband. He was still emitting shouts, somewhat mellowed by distance.

"That's all right," she remarked with satisfaction in her quiet tones. "The police station's only two blocks down; they'll run him in!"

Constantia tore away the pasteboard from the electric-switch.

As light flooded the hall Betty was just coming to. The mother softly closed the front door and bent over her. In the full glare she was nothing more terrifying than a stout woman wrapped in a sheet.

The girl's eyes opened, and, half-conscious, she smiled, and her arms went up about her mother's neck with a swift childish motion of such utter love and trust that tears stung Constantia's eyes. "She's only half awake—the darling!" crooned the mother. She slid arms about the limp young back and began to pat and rub with capable hands. The girl's blue eyes stared with sudden comprehension, and she began to sob affrightedly.

"You're not dead,—not dead! Tell me again!" and this time she went off into real hysterics.

About midnight Constantia invaded the kitchen and made hot chocolate for the pale girl and her mother. As they three sat about the dining-table Mrs. Skaggs' homely face was radiant. Betty's wet blue eyes never left it; but they still kept their scared expression; she couldn't quite believe.

The moon was setting when Constantia hurried down across lots home. What a delightful lack of monotony there was in bachelor-life! She wondered whether Mr. Skaggs was comfortably settled in jail. Brownie jumped all over her ecstatically when she opened the front door. Two hours she had whined and worried about a mistress who was cultivating spooks.

FEAR

by Richard G. Swaringen

She rose, sucking in great gulps of air.

"For I've just learned that I love-you."

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"MARION, I love you!"

"Don't!" Marion Reid shook the hand of her millionaire husband from her shoulder with a movement of irritation, looking up at him with the briefest of glances, which yet seemed to multiply by at least two every one of the twelve years between them.

"I can't help it, dear!" The wistfulness in Henry Reid's gentle voice was reflected for an instant in his mild blue eyes. "You are so beautiful."

Marion rose abruptly, a glorious creature, half an inch taller than her husband. Her eyes and hair were of the same shade of brown.

"Please, Henry!" She was obviously making an effort to be kind; to hide her distaste. "You know why I married you—out of gratitude because you saved my father from ruin and disgrace. I promised at the altar to be a true and faithful wife, and I will. But love you I cannot. So please don't force me to endure caresses that I find hateful!"

Turning, she walked across the luxurious room and stood gazing through a window at the hills across the little lake, the lovely curves of her body outlined against the light. She had not wanted to come to this place, of all places, for her honeymoon. It was here, only two years before, that she had been saved from drowning by Albert Lewis. She feared that another view of him, his god-like form displayed in the scanty uniform of a life-guard, might force her thoughts to stray from the man she had sworn to honor and obey.

But Henry Reid owned most of the electric power company which generated its current from the impounded water of the artificial lake, as well as a controlling interest in the two summer resort hotels. He was, therefore, combining business with pleasure by coming here. Marion had offered no verbal objection to the plan, not so much from fear of arousing his suspicion as from dread of awakening something in her own nature that were better left asleep.

"I'm going in swimming," she announced, turning suddenly. "Will you come with me?"

"I?" Henry's eyes shifted, while his face colored slightly. "No, indeed!" Then, meeting her inquiring gaze, he went on quietly: "Probably you'll think me cowardly, but all my life I've had a horror of deep water. So far as I know, I don't seriously fear anything else; but that dread I've never been able to overcome."

He paused, searching her face with eyes that plainly bespoke his dread of the contempt he expected to find there. But Marion, with feminine skill, held her features impassive; though she made the effort chiefly to hide her surprise at her own feelings. Instead of scorn, she felt a kind of tolerant pity, combined with a heightened respect for his truthfulness, and—could it be—the merest flash of tenderness. Henry, in obvious relief, proceeded:

"I tell you this because I don't want to hide from you any of my faults. For I might have said, with equal truth, that I have a business engagement. Mr. Williams, the superintendent of the plant, has asked me to go with him in a boat to inspect the dam, and the recording station up above. Of course we'll use the biggest and staunchest motor boat on the lake; yet the bare thought of the trip nearly gives me a chill. Only a sense of duty forces me to go. Is that very contemptible to you?" he asked anxiously. "I can hardly expect you to understand what I don't understand myself."

"No, it isn't!" Marion spoke so warmly that her own words heightened her surprise. "Dad has told me that every man is afraid of something. I really admire the will which makes you superior to your fears."

"Thank you, my——Marion!" Henry Reid said gratefully.

Marion left the room and the hotel, idly wondering why she was not filled with scorn for what was palpably a weakness. In a moment of vivid contrast her mind dwelt briefly on Albert Lewis, who swam like an otter in an element that he dreaded no more than she dreaded the familiar atmosphere of her bedroom. It was decidedly odd that, instead of arousing her contempt, Henry's confession awoke in her only a pitying desire to mother a man so much older than she; made her feel very mature and kind.

Entering one of the long row of white bath-houses, she quickly changed, emerging presently in all the glory of an exquisite body, frankly revealed by her ultra modern bathing costume. Albert Lewis was strolling leisurely along the narrow beach in her direction, resembling an animated bronze statue, with his long, muscular, sun-browned arms and legs quite bare. A barely perceptible nervous disturbance warned Marion not to wait for speech with him. She ran lightly to the end of a spring-board, where a perfectly executed dive carried her far out into water that was already being warmed by the morning sun.

Rising, she shook the water out of her eyes, swimming with long and effortless strokes toward the middle of the lake and upward. The stuttering exhaust of a motor boat sounded close by, and, looking toward the small wharf beside the row of bath-houses, she saw her husband and the superintendent heading up the lake for their visit to the recording station.

Altering her direction slightly, she lengthened and quickened her stroke, racing with the boat until it left her behind. A casual glance over her shoulder showed her that Albert Lewis was standing motionless on the gravel of the beach, watching her.

Relaxing to her former easy progress, she allowed her thoughts to flow backward two years over a pleasant interval, to the time when she first saw this specimen of perfect physical manhood. Their brief acquaintance had begun with his rescuing her from this very lake, and had lasted little more than a week. But she had known many a mildly agreeable thrill of recollection afterwards, until her father's impending financial and nervous disaster confronted her with the harder realities of life, driving such things from her mind. Not that they had neared love, even enough to begin writing to each other. It had been, rather, an affair of intense physical attraction; a response of beauty to beauty. Now, she wondered, dallying with the thought in idle curiosity, what might have happened if they had been together more—before it was too late.

It was too late now, she realized very firmly. She owed everything, probably even her father's life or sanity, to the man she had married, who had always treated her with the utmost kindness. Furthermore, she had no patience with the children of a lax generation who experiment with such a serious institution as marriage. She had married with her eyes open and with the full intention of remaining faithful to her husband as long as both should live, in every act and word and thought. If she could not give him love, she could and would give him loyalty. And she did not realize that the very necessity for this continued self-assurance constituted her chief sign of danger.

Marion swam in circles for an hour, too busy with her reflections to note the passage of time. Tiring at last, she turned on her back and lay gazing up at a sky which showed not the faintest hint of a cloud, morning sunshine hot on one of her cheeks. She drifted with the almost imperceptible current caused by the flow of the water through great flumes to the power house below the dam.

She was filled with a lazy ease, her former restlessness left behind during her hour of vigorous exercise. It was good to be a rich man's wife, living in pleasant places, with every comfort she could wish, and nothing to do but enjoy them. It was even agreeable to have a husband whose keen intelligence and boundless energy won wealth and honor for them both, even if she did not actually love him.

This thought of her husband's continual gigantic planning and executing brought a half-formed comparison: It was two years since she had found Albert Lewis a life-guard on the shore of this lake, and he was a life-guard still. Had the man no ambition, further than that of displaying his own perfect physique to admiring vacationists? But she was too lazy to even follow that thought to any connected or logical conclusion.

A motor boat began puttering faintly, up the lake. Probably her husband and Mr. Williams returning, thought Marion in faint surprise. She had no idea that they had had time to make their trip to the recording station and start back. Turning her head, she saw the distant figure of the life-guard still standing like a statue, watching her.

The boat was rapidly coming near. Suddenly Marion felt a numbing pain shooting over her body. Cramp, she thought in terror; and threw up one gleaming pink arm, before that, too, was numbed, screaming wildly. Her face turned half over by the effort, she saw Albert Lewis' long leap as he took to the water. The drumming of the motor was loud in her ears.....

She rose, sucking in great gulps of air. Her eyes blinked free of the murk of water, and she saw the boat nearby, her husband standing on the prow, watching. He jumped, and as she went down again he was in the water beside her, grasping her clothes, her hair. For the first time she felt pleasure at the touch of his hands.

But he was unable to swim; afraid of the water; and therefore even more helpless than she. Marion realized that as she rose for the second time. Well, they would drown together, she thought; and wondered why the idea was somehow comforting.

A deft, powerful hand grasped her wrist, drew her arm across a warm shoulder in which muscles rippled reassuringly. She felt her head lifted above water; that she was being towed strongly. The short yellow hair of the life-guard appeared close before her eyes. She found that she could look around and see the boat drifting alone, and her husband's head upheld by Mr. Williams, another strong swimmer. With a hazy sensation of contentment, she let herself go.....

Marion partly awoke to find two strong arms clasping her body and legs; feel herself borne along. She opened her eyes, and saw her husband following, supported by Mr. Williams. About them walked a little crowd of excited tourists and hotel employees. It was pleasant to feel the rhythmic tread of the life-guard and hear his steady breathing as he carried her hundred and thirty-five pounds with no apparent strain, even after his long swim. She closed her eyes again, half conscious, half dreaming.

"A drop of whiskey, Mr. Reid—come." Dimly she heard the agitated voice of the hotel manager as they entered the door. A maid leading the way, Albert Lewis carried her up to her room, laid her gently on her bed.

"A doctor!" he said to the maid briefly. "Hot water. Whiskey, if you can get it." He was chafing Marion's wrists as the maid flitted out.

"Oh, my dear—my dear—my dear!" murmured the man, bending over Marion's face. "Was I too late? I wouldn't dare do this if you were awake, but now——" He kissed her cold lips passionately.

Marion lay still, her eyes closed. She was too busy wondering at her utter, dreamy indifference to even care to open them. What did it matter if he kissed her, a married woman? What did it matter if he did not?

"The second time I've saved you from the lake, dear!" whispered the man. "You're another man's wife now; but I love you—I love you!" He kissed her again.

Marion heard a familiar step in the doorway, and slowly opened her eyes. Her husband stood there, but he was not looking at her. And so she lay quiet and still, watching a little wordless drama played out in the clashing glances of the two men.

For a long moment their eyes were locked in a steady, level stare; then the gaze of the life-guard wavered and fell away. He was four inches taller and forty pounds heavier than Henry Reid, but now he seemed to shrink until he was actually smaller, his face blanching under the tan.

"I—I'm going, sir!" he said at last hurriedly. Marion felt ashamed because she had heard the naked fear in his voice. "Don't—don't——"

"I'll see you later," said Henry Reid quietly.

"I—I suppose this means the end of my job—that you'll——"

"Why, no, my boy." Henry Reid's voice was kind. "You shall have an increase of pay, or a better job if you want it. I assure you I am grateful. But we'll talk that over later. Just now, if you please——"

He stood aside, and Albert Lewis hurried out, in a bewilderment that was pitiful. Now, Marion thought comfortably, she knew why her husband was rich and honored, and Lewis was still a life-guard. Henry Reid feared nothing but water, and had the will to conquer even that fear. Albert Lewis was afraid of men!

Her husband began walking up and down the room, and she saw that his features were working convulsively. For a minute or two longer Marion lay still, trying to put two and two together out of the swift events of the morning; doing her best to understand a sort of chemical—almost a mechanical—change that she could feel within herself.

"Henry!" she said at last softly. "Come here!"

"Marion, I didn't know!" he cried. "Why didn't you tell me?" He came and sat down on the edge of the bed. Marion was aroused to full, clear consciousness by the startled certainty that never before had she seen a human face reveal such agony of soul. "But I'll give you your freedom if you want it. A divorce can be arranged. The boy loves you, he said; and if you love him——"

"Hush, Henry—hush a minute! You do run on so!" Marion was squeezing one of his hands in both her own. "If he loves me, he has my sympathy. For I've just learned that I love—you! Kiss me, Henry, before the maid returns—kiss me hard!"

"To meet your mother, Deb."

"But mother isn't coming till next week."

"She telegraphed that she is coming earlier than she expected. They'll be here tomorrow night."

"Mother!" It was all she could manage.

"Buck up, Deb. I've made all arrangements for your father. Miss Brewster is to stay with you tonight. He said for us to go to the river for supper as we had planned. Shall I come for you now, Deb?"

"Please. With our car. I came with the Grays. And bring the hamper, Miles."

"Right-O!"

In half an hour they were seated on the bank of the river, the hamper between them.

"Deborah."

Young Carter's face had grown so serious that Deborah was suddenly startled.

"What is it?" she asked.

"Let's eat our sandwiches," he evaded.

She laid hers aside and reached for his. "You've something to say," she said. "Out with it, Miles."

He felt a sudden tender pity for her.

"I know it's about father. Be quick, please."

"He meant to tell you himself, Deb; he was going to do it tonight."

She was very white. "I can stand it, Miles, if you will be quick."

Very gently he told her of her father's conversation with the stranger on the Pullman.

"He told your father," he went on, "that this generation needed to be given a job."

"You needn't go on, Miles; I can finish. Father came home and found me like those girls and he let me think he was—bad—so that I'd set about reforming him. Is that right?" she asked crisply.

"I've bungled it," despaired young Carter. "And you aren't taking it right. He had only a minute to think. He couldn't fake a mortgage for you to pay off or stage an epidemic so that you could nurse the town. This is what occurred to him and he set about it. It worked, too."

"Yes, it worked. What fun you two must have had behind my back."

"Fun! It has half-killed your father. Do you suppose he enjoyed having his daughter think he needed reforming? Why," he blew up, "you little fool! You act as though you'd rather your father was dissolute than that you should be tricked."

"Made ridiculous," she amended.

"You haven't been ridiculous for a minute; you've been splendid. I wish I knew that a girl would do for me what you've done for him."

"Do-does mother know?"

"Nobody knows but me."

Suddenly her head went down on her arms and her slim body shook with sobs.

He laid a hand on her shoulder. "You poor kid!" he murmured.

"You'll think I'm crazy, c-crying because I've found that father didn't need reforming," she sobbed.

"You aren't crazy at all, honey. You thought you were playing serious drama and it turns out to be slapstick, and your pride is hurt. But it's all right now. Shall we eat?"

But Deborah was not ready to leave the stage before playing a final scene. She rose, scorn on her expressive face.

"Eat!" she said. "Eat. But don't ask me to. I am very weary. For two months, day and night, my father has been on my mind. The evenings that he escaped——"

"Escaped is the word," grinned Carter, and was rewarded by a glare from her darkened eyes.

"The evenings that he escaped, I watched by the window for his return, as a mother watches for a wayward son.

"But I was coz—coz——"

"Cozened," assisted Carter cheerfully. "And a darned good word."

"I was deceived. It was all a merry joke. But I shall bear the scar of those two months forever. Never again shall I be a carefree girl."

"Just you wait till I'm back in Cambridge and you're in Wellesley and we'll make a stab at it."

"Eat," she commanded in her best manner. "And quickly, please. And then take me home where I shall try to forget my pain."

She sank gracefully to the bank and Carter heaved a sigh.

"Now that that's off your chest," he suggested, "suppose you have a sandwich."

She hesitated for an instant before taking two. "I suppose I might as well," she said, and returned his grin.

"Deborah," he said softly, "you little sport! This summer has meant a lot to me. Has it meant anything at all to you?"

She nodded. "Heaps," she admitted.

They ate their sandwiches in silence, their heels thumping the bank, the vesper songs of the birds reflecting the contentment in their young hearts.

Stella Rosevelt

faces behind him, glancing at those to whose conversation he had just been listening.

It was even as he had surmised when he heard that manly voice.

Archibald Sherbrooke sat directly behind him, and beside him a noble, matronly-looking woman whom he closely resembled; but there was an unmistakable look of pain upon the young man's face, and a wistful, anxious look in his handsome eyes.

"Not married after all this time, and with that sorrowful face and bitter sigh. I begin to think there may have been a misunderstanding of some kind, instead of a willful wrong," he said to himself. "He does not look like a man to prove treacherous to a woman," he added; "there is something noble and prepossessing about him; and yet Star said she denounced him to his face."

When the concert was over, and while he was slowly passing out with the crowd, some one at his side suddenly exclaimed:

"Hello, Meredith! where on earth did you come from?" and a friendly hand grasped and shook his with a vigorous cordiality.

"Alden! is it you?" he cried, in return. "I might ask the same question of you, since I had not a thought of seeing you here; but since it is evident that we are both Americans, it is safe to assume that we came from 'over the seas and far away.'"

"When did you arrive? Where are you stopping, and how long do you stay in London?" demanded Alden, his tongue going like a race horse.

"Well," Ralph returned, laughing, "you mean to know all about me, I see. I arrived a week ago yesterday; I am stopping at the Midland Grand, and my stay is—indefinite."

"Good! but now I have found you, I mean to keep an eye upon you. I tell you it sets a fellow up wonderfully to see a home face. Have you any other engagement for this evening?"

"No."

"Then come with me. I have an invitation to Lady Stamfield's reception—and, by the way, she does entertain charmingly—with permission to bring as many friends as I choose. Come; my lady is a delightful hostess, besides having two of the loveliest daughters in the world."

"Such an inducement as the latter I am unable to resist," Ralph responded, with a smile. "I will come with pleasure."

"You're a sensible fellow," responded young Alden, as, linking his arm familiarly in that of his friend, he led him away.

Ralph found Stamfield House a delightful place.

He was very cordially received upon being presented by his friend, and introduced to a number of pleasant people, and he began to think that he had not seen the best side of London, after all, since he had not heretofore been favorably impressed with its citizens.

After he had danced two or three times, young Alden sought him again, and took him away to the billiard-room, which, for that evening, had been set apart for a smoking-room.

"I want to introduce you to some fine fellows," he said, on the way thither; "'bang up' boys, we should say in America, who will give you a good time while you stay here."

He found a dozen or twenty young men gathered in the billiard-room, and was introduced to several of them by his friend, one being Lord Carrol, of Carrolton.

He half put out his hand, glanced up at the stranger, started, withdrew it, and bowed stiffly to his lordship. He had recognized Archibald Sherbrooke!

The fine, genial face of the young peer clouded at the act and his cool greeting; but, with his natural good breeding, he appeared not to heed it, and expressed his pleasure at the meeting; while Alden, the introduction over, turned away, leaving them together.

"I beg your pardon," Ralph said, the hot blood mounting to his brow, for his loyal heart could not forget Star and her wrongs. "I have heard you addressed twice today by another name—Archibald Sherbrooke. Has my friend made a mistake in introducing you to me as Lord Carrol?"

His lordship laughed, and his face cleared instantly.

"No," he said; "I am both Archibald Sherbrooke and Lord Carrol. I am troubled with a plurality of names, which frequently cause mistakes, some of which are ludicrous, and some—painful."

This last statement was supplemented with a heavy sigh.

"But," he added, more lightly, "I will shake hands with you over either," and he extended his hand again.

But Ralph would not take it.

He drew back a step, and bent a perplexed look upon his companion's face.

"Pardon me again," he said; "but before I take your hand, allow me to ask you a single question."

"Certainly; a dozen if you like," Lord Carrol answered, haughtily, for Ralph's refusal to take his hand had hurt him keenly.

"You have been in America?"

"Yes."

"You met there a young lady by the name of Miss Stella Gladstone?"

Lord Carrol started as from a sudden shock, and grew pale to his lips.

"Stella Gladstone! What can you tell me of Star Gladstone?" he demanded, hoarse from emotion.

"That her heart is broken—her life ruined," Ralph Meredith answered, sternly, for he knew now that he had found his man, and he meant to show him no mercy.

He trembled with excitement, and his fingers ached to strangle the villain and coward who had so basely betrayed the trust of the loveliest woman on earth.

"Her life ruined! Don't tell me that," Lord Carrol whispered, with white lips, while the look of agony which leaped to his eyes would have moved the hardest heart, had it been less sore than Ralph Meredith's.

"Yes, and you are the traitor who is accountable for it," he answered, hotly.

The young man flushed, and he drew himself up with sudden dignity, struggling to regain his self-possession, which had been sadly disturbed at the mention of that dearly-loved name.

"You forget yourself, sir," he said, haughtily. "What right have you to address me thus? Why do you speak to me in this way of Miss Gladstone, and thus arraign me for what you assert?"

"Why should I not?" Ralph Meredith demanded, in low, fierce tones. "Did she not tell me with her own lips of your baseness and treachery? And do you think that I can take the hand of the man, were he twice a lord, who has ruined the life of"—"the only woman whom I ever loved," he was about to add, but something restrained him and made him substitute—"an angel?"

Archibald Sherbrooke was very pale now. He was a proud, brave young man, and all the hot blood in his composition had been aroused by this sudden and unexpected attack from the stranger to whom he had been introduced by a mutual friend.

He had uttered words which, under any other circumstances, would have made him fell him to the ground and chastise him for his insolence.

But he controlled himself, for he saw that Ralph was a noble fellow, although he had constituted himself the champion of the woman whom he still loved with a deathless love, and meant to avenge her wrongs if he was assured that he had found the right man.

He reasoned, too, that he must be laboring under the same mistake of which Star had been the victim, and that the only way to deal with him would be to explain just how matters stood.

Besides, a wild hope was springing up in his heart that through him he might be able to find her whom he had lost, and whom he had never ceased for one moment to love.

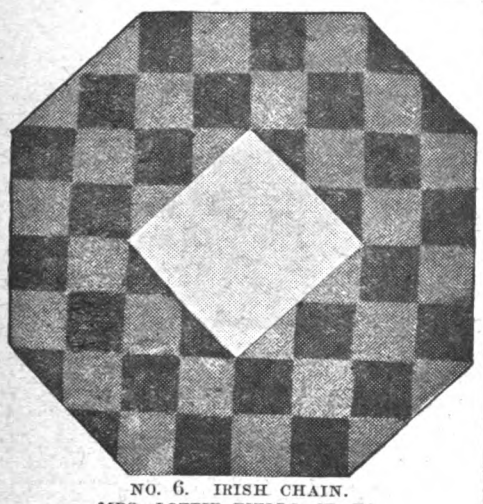
NO. 4. ODD FELLOWS' MARCH.
MRS. B. M. DICKEY, PA.

Utilizing Small Pieces

OLD and new, odd and yet attractive designs for working up small pieces are shown this month. These patterns give one somewhat of an idea of the almost numberless ways in which squares and triangles can be combined.

Many of the blocks, such as No. 5, Dove at the Window, No. 6, Irish Chain, No. 8, Jacob's Ladder, and No. 16, Blazing Star, are not complete in themselves, as when they are joined they form a continuous design.



NO. 5. DOVE AT THE WINDOW.
MRS. DELLA BYFIELD, KANSAS.

Of these the first two are old patterns which are usually developed of two colors only and white, while Jacob's Ladder is most effective made of a single color and white.

The first design in this column, which is known in some localities as Odd Fellows' March, is complete in itself and is usually set together with block of white of the same size.

This design or No. 7, The Rolling Star, can be made up of two or three colors and white, or contrasting scraps of calico, gingham or, in fact, any kind of wash goods.

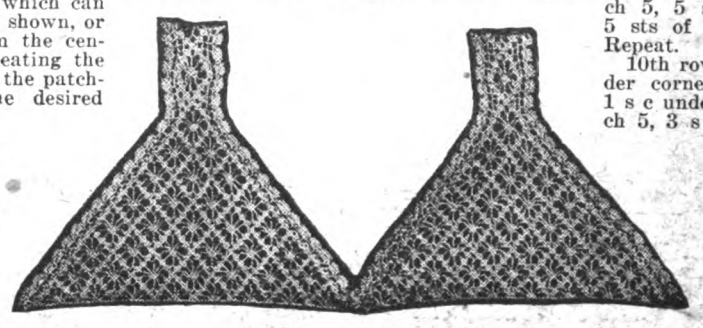
No. 9, The Ferris Wheel, and No. 14, Snowball, and No. 17, Star of Bethlehem, are all simple, attractive patterns, especially suited for using two shades only and white.

Of the pieced blocks, stars of all sorts seem to be as popular as ever, and it is very interesting to note how much they can differ in form and design. The Rolling Star pattern, No. 7, is usually filled out to make a square block with white and then set together with white blocks of an equal size.

No. 12 makes an attractive all-over design.



New Idea for Bedspread Square

No. 13 is a star pattern worked up into a hexagon block, enough of which are joined directly for a quilt top.

The Blazing Star, shown in No. 16, is an old pattern which can be pieced as shown, or worked from the center out, repeating the points, until the patchwork is the desired size.

No. 18 is another pattern which is particularly good to repeat. No. 15 illustrates a very simple manner of working up tiny bits, and No. 11, one of the ways in which these blocks can be fashioned into a larger pattern.

Many of the best known and more popular patterns were sent in by more than one worker, so in these cases the pattern used is credited to the person whose choice of colors shows the different parts most clearly.

SPIDER WEB CAMISOLE TOP.

Square for Bedspread

This simple pattern can be worked around centers of different sizes, but a five-inch center square is a very good size.

Cut all squares by a thread, if scrim is used, turn under edge and stitch with loose machine stitch. Work all around with single crochet, join at corner. To copy pattern exactly in second row, ch 5 after last s c in first row, 1 s c on first s c. This makes a corner ch. Work 14 chs of 3, 4 or 5 stitches along the side according to the number of cotton used and tension of worker. There should be an equal number of stitches between chains, and the last one should fasten with s c in last stitch on the side, the ch 5 for corner, 1 s c on next s c, 14 chs, 1 corner ch, repeat. Last ch finishes in st before first corner ch, then under corner ch work 3 s c, ch 5.

4th and 5th rows—Same as second, only increasing chains on the sides the same as in second row.

6th row—Make ch of three or more stitches from corner to center of first ch, 1 s c, repeat. In this row just enough stitches should be used to make a straight line. Join at corner, ch 1.

7th row—1 s c in each st, 3 s c in corner sts. Join, ch 1.

8th row—Same as 7th, ch 5.

9th row—5 s c on first 5 sts, ch 5, sk 4, 5 s c on next 5 sts. This row should be planned so as to have 10 groups of 5 s c and to make these come exact skip either three or four stitches between. At corner ch 5, 5 s c on first 5 sts of second side. Repeat.

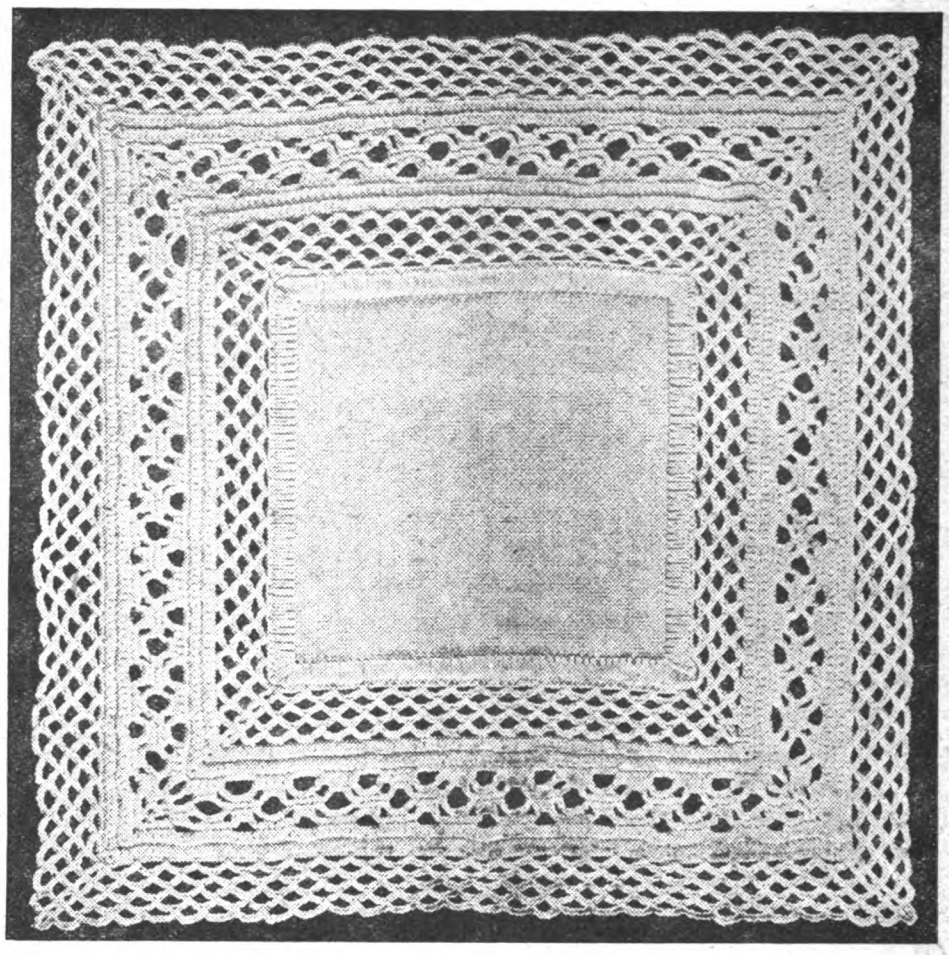
10th row—3 s c under corner ch, ch 5, 1 s c under corner ch, ch 5, 3 s c on center of 5 s c, ch 2, 3 s c on ch, ch 2, 3 s c of 5 s c. At corner, 1 s c in corner ch, ch 5, 1 s c in corner ch, ch 5, 5 s c. Repeat.

11th row—3 s c under corner ch, ch 5, 1 s c in corner ch, 4 s c under ch 5, ch 5, 1 s c under ch, 3 s c on 3 s c, 1 s c under ch, ch 5. Corners as usual. Repeat.

12th row—Corner ch, ch 5, 3 s c on 4 s c, ch 2, 3 s c under ch, ch 2, 3 s c on 5 s c. Corners as usual. Repeat.

13th row—4 s c under corner ch, 3 s c under next ch, ch 2, 5 s c, ch 2, 3 s c. Repeat around.

14th row—Same as 6th row.



15th and 16th rows—Same as 7th and 8th rows.

Next five rows all chains as shown, the same as the rows around the center.

BEDSPREAD SQUARE WITH SCRIM CENTERS. BY A. O. L. WERTMAN.

This yoke is made of four points, to two of which are crocheted the shoulder-straps, which are then joined to the other two points. Work is begun at the base or widest part of each point by making a ch 159 stitches.

1st row—1 d c in 4th st from hook, 2 d c in next 2 sts, * ch 5, sk 5, 5 s c, ch 5, sk 5, 4 d c, repeat from * 7 times, ending with 4 d c, ch 3, turn.

2nd row—* 1 blk (4 d c), under ch 5, ch 5, 3 s c on center 5 s c, ch 5, 1 blk, ch 1, repeat from * 7 times, ch 3, turn.

3rd row—* 1 blk, ch 3, 1 tr c in center s c, ch 3, 1 blk, ch 3, 1 tr c under ch 1 between blks, ch 3, repeat from * 6 times, then 1 blk, ch 3, 1 tr c, ch 3, 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

4th row—* 1 blk, ch 2, 1 blk (each side of treble), ch 5, 1 s c under ch, 1 s c on next tr c, 1 s c under ch, ch 5, repeat * 6 times, ending with 2 blks either side of last treble, ch 3, turn.

5th row—* 1 blk between blks, ch 5, 5 s c over 3 s c, ch 3, repeat from * 6 times, ending with 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

6th row—* 1 blk, ch 3, 3 s c, ch 3, 1 blk, ch 2, repeat from * 6 times, ending with 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

7th row—* 1 blk, ch 3, 1 tr c on s c, ch 3, 1 blk, ch 3, 1 tr c between blks, ch 3, repeat from * 5 times, ending with 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

8th row—Begin same as 4th row, and work over spider webs in the usual way.

9th row—Same as 5th row. One row has one and one-half webs completed. Continue as directed, working 6 webs over the 7 webs completed and decrease as shown in our illustration until work is but 1 web in width.

After row of blks, ch 1 tr c ch, blk, on last web turn with ch 5.

1st row of strap—1 blk, ch 2, 1 blk, ch 2, 1 d c under ch, end last row, ch 5, turn.

2nd row—1 d c on first d c of blk, ch 2, 1 blk between blks, ch 2, 1 d c on last d c of next blk, ch 2, 1 d c under ch, ch 5, turn.

3rd row—1 blk in second space, ch 2, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 3, turn.

IRISH EDGING.

6th row—3 d c, ch 3, 5 s c, ch 3, 3 d c, ch 3, turn.

7th row—1 blk under ch, ch 3, 3 s c, ch 3, 1 blk, 1 d c on last d c, ch 5, turn.

8th row—1 blk, ch 3, 1 tr c, ch 3, 1 blk, ch 2, 1 d c, ch 5, turn.

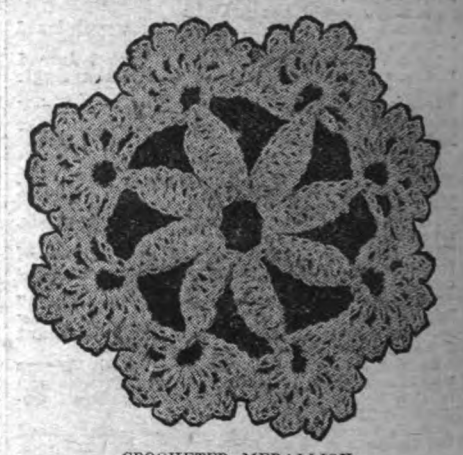
9th row—1 blk, ch 2, 1 blk, ch 2, 1 d c, ch 5, turn.

10th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

Repeat, making three more spider webs.

Make another front with strap, then two points ending with row on last web having two blocks. Join straps by single crochet or needle and thread. Join bottom of the yoke both back and front by single crochet over the first chains, across two points. Finish sides of points and straps as follows: After completing singles along bottom at end ch 5, 1 d c under ch end of 1st row, ch 3, 1 d c between blks end of 2nd row, ch 3, 1 d c under ch, ch 3, 1 d c between blks, repeat all around.

Scallop



Under 1st ch, 1 d c, 1 p, 1 d c, 1 p, 1 d c, 1 p, 1 d c, 1 p, 1 d c, 1 p, 1 d c, ch 2, 1 s c under ch, ch 2. One 5 picot scallop in next space. Repeat around.

These directions will result in a top for size 34 or 36 garment. For a larger one use No. 30 cotton. Make each point separate and in garment leave space between the points in the front, back and under the arms for the finishing scallop.

An Irish Edging

This is a very effective pattern for the edging of children's clothes or collar and cuff sets. A No. 30 or 40 cotton is best for linen or pique although finer cotton can be used for trimming sheer materials.

Make first row a chain or work directly into the goods as follows: 3 s c, 1 picot of ch 5, 5 s c, 1 p, 3 s c, ch 7, turn and sl st into 3rd s c beyond first p, turn, 3 s c under ch 7, 1 p, 3 s c, 1 p, 3 s c, 1 p, 3 s c, in 3rd ch, 6 d c, 1 s c, thus forming 1 petal,

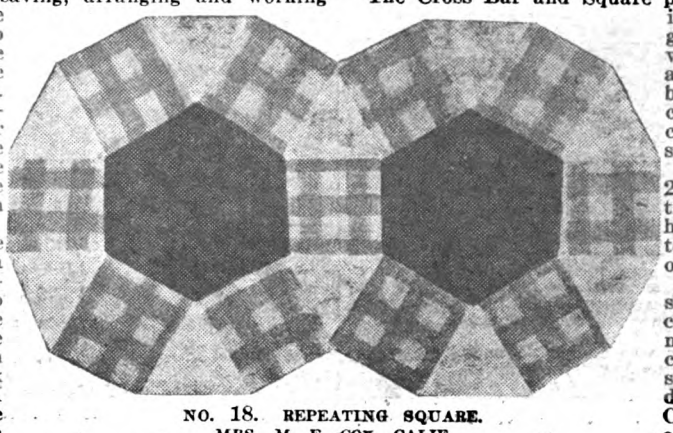
RUTH MANLEY.

Shell Edging

This is worked in the length and is one of the simple patterns which grows very rapidly.

Made of No. 50 white mercerized crochet cotton, it makes a good finish for lingerie or children's clothes.



SHELL EDGING.

Begin with ch 3 Join in ring. Ch 3, 6 d c in ring, ch 3, sl st to top of last double to form picot, turn sl st over 3 d c, ch 3, 1 d tr c (thread over hook 3 times), in top of first double, turn, 6 d c in center st of shell, 1 p, sl st to center, ch 3, 1 d tr c in first double of second shell, turn and repeat.

Easy Patchwork

There is always an accumulation of new bits of percale, gingham and other sorts of wash goods where the clothing for the family is still made at home, and the quantity of these scraps is, of course, usually regulated by the size of the family and the care which is taken of them.

An orderly as well as industrious COMFORT reader, who submitted a number of attractive designs in our recent contest, writes interestingly of the saving, arranging and working up of these bits so as to accomplish the most in the shortest time. For the benefit of other readers we are glad to be able to quote the following from her letter:

NO. 18. REPEATING SQUARE.
MRS. M. E. COX, CALIF.

"As the mother of a growing family of five, I do not have time to put in fine handwork on patchwork quilts, but I find it possible to accomplish good results by machine. I have made ten quilts in this way and none of them are simply a homely conglomerate mass of odds and ends for though I have to work quickly I plan carefully.

"A receptacle for all scraps is the first necessity. For this I find a neatly-made bag of some strong wash material is best. This should hang near the machine or on one's cutting table. Into it put all good-sized pieces left from cutting out garments, and when enough have accumulated to commence work on begin by cutting the pieces for the pattern decided upon. For machine stitching, squares, half-squares and diamond-shaped pieces are best.

"Cut carefully, having the pieces all of an equal size. Have two needles threaded with long, stout cotton, on one string, the light-colored pieces of a certain shape, on the other the dark,—by running the needle through the center of each piece.

"For some patterns four or more strings will be necessary as colors and also shapes are strung separately. When I have enough pieces ready in this way for an afternoon's work, I begin planning and stitching on the machine.

"Intricate and handsome designs can be worked up very easily in this way. I have made an entire quilt top in an afternoon, and in another half day have also quilted it by machine."

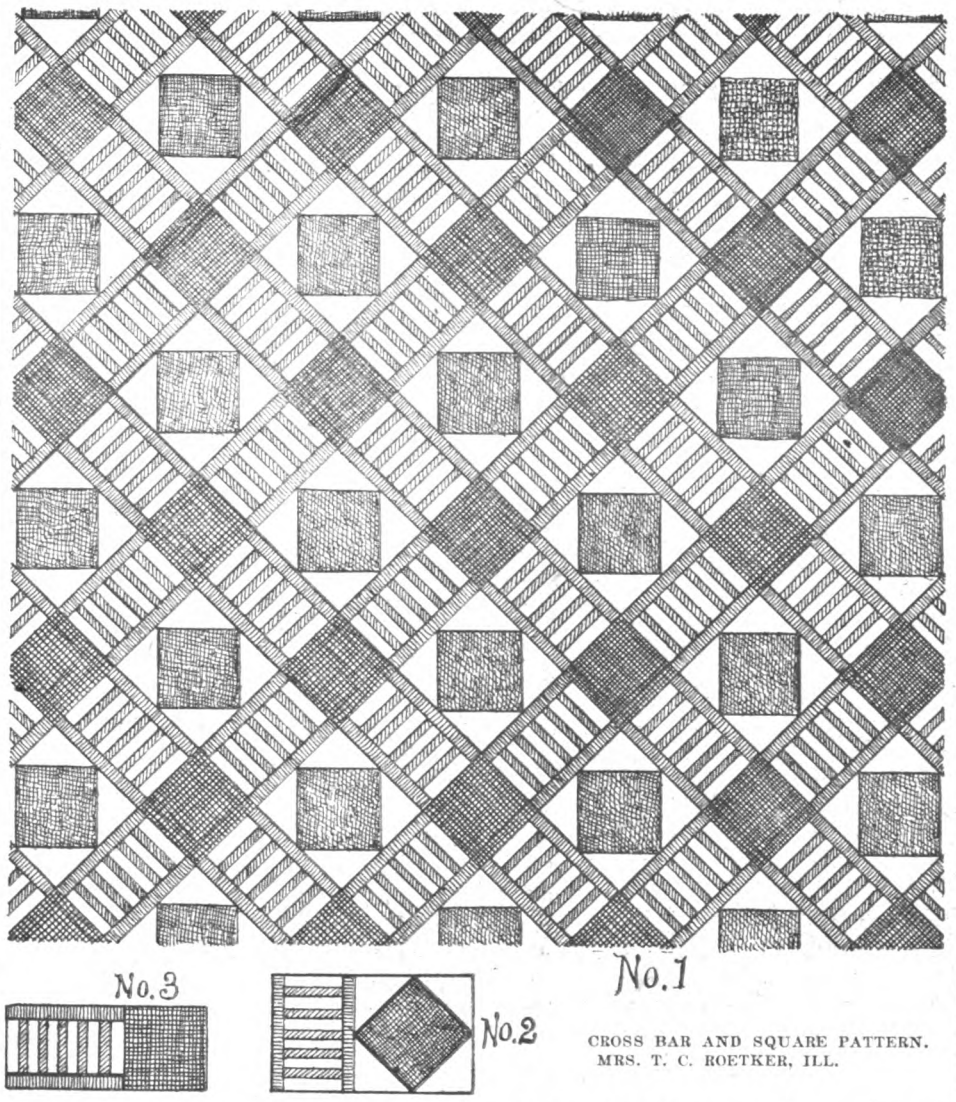
Many of the patterns illustrated this month are especially suitable for this modern and rapid manner of working.

The Cross Bar and Square pattern shown in No. 1 is a good idea of what can be accomplished by combining contrasting colors, cut in simple shapes.

Details No. 2 and 3 illustrate fully how this pattern is worked out.

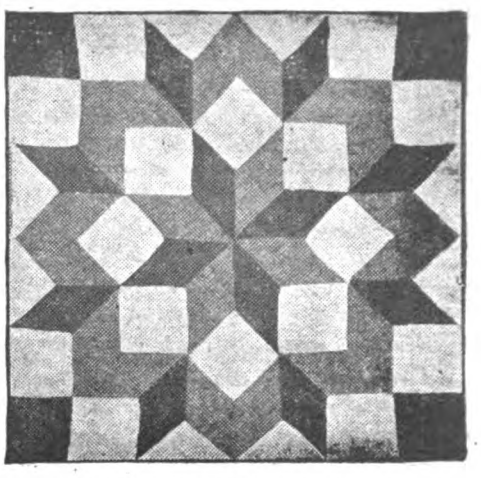
Many of the star blocks could easily be made by machine, also the single or double "Irish Chain." Quilts of this old pattern are very handsome when made up of red, green and white, with either the green or white for the large squares.

Another pattern which is particularly good for machine sewing is the old "Wild Goose Chase." This pattern, which is a very common one, is formed of three-cornered half-squares sewed together in a fancied resemblance to a flock of birds on the wing, by arranging the pieces so that the sharp point of one-half square joins the bias side of the one before it, the spaces thus formed being filled in with light goods.



"The Chase" is made long enough for the entire length of the quilt, then these strips are usually sewed together with alternate strips of goods as wide as the pieced strips.

Patchwork is not the cutting up of whole cloth into bits for the sake of sewing it together again, as has been said by someone, but rather the utilizing of goods which is already cut up.



A really attractive quilt results from the ingenious ways in which these scraps are used.

Without careful planning the result is a mixed appearance instead of a combination.

When one is not likely to have scraps enough of three or four or even a dozen materials, it is best to sort out first as to colors and then select some design requiring small pieces such as No. 11, 12, 13, 16 or 17. No. 18 illustrates the effectiveness of checked goods combined with plain. If you have an old gingham dress it can be used in this way.

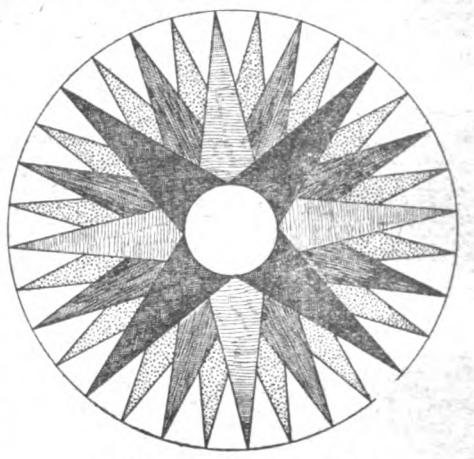
It is easy to cut checked goods as one has the lines to go by. In this pattern, white and a solid color to match the gingham is used.



To help out on colors, blocks of any size may be set together with narrow bands of solid color, a binding of the same finishing the edge.

Jute Crochet

Balls of heavy twine-like material, known as jute, are now used in making up sport bags, porch cushions and table-mats. A wide range of colors can be obtained, and articles can be made up very quickly as the jute is coarse.

For the sport bag illustrated in July COMFORT, natural-color jute was selected, decorated with flame-color wool poppies and green leaves.

To make this model, begin in the center and make two disks. Join these by crocheting

3rd round—Same as 2nd round.

4th round—2 d c in each d c.

5th round—Increase only as is necessary to keep work flat.

Add more rounds according to size one wishes the bag to be. Make two disks of the same size. To second side, after completing the last round, crochet back and forth on 7 or more sts for the arm strap, join to center of the first side.

Make strip for joining sides for double crochet two inches wide, and crochet or sew in place.

The Captive

By Flora G. Brent

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE young man lay back in the boat helpless, his hands and feet securely tied. He stared at the girl in front of him who rowed with swift, firm strokes and who paid no attention to him whatever.

"Please, little girl," teased the stranger, "tell me why I am a prisoner, and where you are taking me."

The girl did not appear to notice these words and only rowed with the same perfect rhythm and indifference.

"Won't you please cut these cords?" begged Jim Vaden. "They are really hurting my flesh, and I would be grateful if I might sit up. It is very uncomfortable lying in the bottom of this wet boat."

"I will not untie anything, for then you might escape and I would lose that five hundred dollar reward which is offered for you."

"So you get a reward for treating me like this. Pray tell me, young lady, of what I am guilty."

The girl's lips tightened, and her eyes flashed but she did not answer

"Strange that a fellow can't take a nap in this part of the country without being bound hand and foot and forced into a boat and carried to—say, Miss, where are we going, anyway? Come on, now, be a sport and reward me for good behavior."

"Good behavior!" snapped the girl. "When?"

"Didn't I walk into this boat after you tied me?"

"You were asleep, sir, and only wakened when you felt the end of my rifle in your ribs. You got into this boat because you knew I'd shoot you if you attempted escape," declared the girl, an angry flush spreading over her face.

Jim studied the girl from where he lay. She was pretty, and there was a roguish tilt to her nose. He liked her business-like air, and the way she managed this ridiculous situation. She undoubtedly thought she had captured a criminal, and he did not wonder she thought so for he had not shaved for several days and his clothes were torn and muddy from a week of tramping and roughing it. He had come into this part of the country partly on a camping trip but really to search for a girl whom, two years ago when a soldier on his way to camp, he had talked to a few moments while the train took on passengers. She had given him a kodak picture of herself with the name Bess written on it. That was all he knew of her, but she was the only girl he had thought about in all those months in France, and his one wish was to find her.

As he watched her now his face lighted up, and a low exclamation of delight escaped his lips. He believed he had found her. However, he liked this girl, and he was sorry she had such an opinion of him.

As they rounded a sharp bend in the river the girl hesitated and seemed undecided. For a few seconds she let the oars rest idly on the water. "I must row over to the bank and get my sweater and fishing rod I left there," she explained. "You—you won't try to escape?"

For answer Jim sighed contentedly and shook his head. The girl rowed on silently, a perplexed expression on her face.

"Did you really steal the money from the bank?" abruptly questioned the young woman.

"I wouldn't object to stealing money every day if I would be captured by you," laughed Jim evasively.

"But did you? I must know before we go on. If I am mistaken, you are free and can go your way, and if not I—I'll—you will have to go with me."

"I'll go with you. I really prefer it,' decided the prisoner gaily.

They had just reached the shore, the girl jumped lightly to the ground, and her captive sat up and shook his hair from his broad forehead, when there was a crashing of brush and a volley of curses issued from the throats of four men. As they came into full view, one, a small, dark, nervous-looking man, had his hands securely tied behind him. He had evidently tried to escape from his captors, for all appeared to be angry and agitated.

The men in charge of the unfortunate one stopped when they saw the young lady. "Hi, Bess," they called familiarly, "we have got him."

"Sure there is no mistake?" she asked, glancing shyly at the young man in the boat while a dull red spread over her face.

"Mistake! No. We found the money on him. Will see you later. Must hurry along," they answered as they passed on, apparently not having noticed the man in the boat.

Without a word the young lady took a knife and cut the cords that bound Jim Vaden. "You must pardon me. I—I was mistaken. You are free," she said soberly.

"I am going with you," declared the man as he seated himself in the boat and held out his hands.

"Really I can't take you now. You are not guilty." The girl laughed for the first time, and Jim joined in heartily. Again he studied her face closely, then drew a picture from his pocket. He compared the two then handed the photo to the surprised girl.

"Bess," he whispered softly, "have I really found you? For two years I have kept your picture before me. I thought I recognized you from the first. I am Jim Vaden of New York. Won't you allow me to row you home?"

"Come," said Bess Gilbert as she handed him the oars, "we will be late getting home."

Dr. West laid his hand on Bonnie's arm. "What you need is sleep, Bonnie, dear," he said gently. "You've got enough to worry over without taking on the troubles of a gambler."

Long after Dr. West had departed, however, Bonnie Lathrop walked the floor in despair. The thought that Trabue had turned her down caused the hot tears of anguish to fill her eyes, while the memory of her father lying ill in the room above, accompanied with the stack of bills in the old library desk almost drove her mad.

Presently she crossed the room and carefully surveyed herself in the long French mirror.

"You are a true Lathrop, Bonnie," she said, shaking her finger at the lovely reflection before her, "a true Lathrop—and any sacrifice you make is worthy the cause—it's your time to act—you must save your father and Elmwood."

With this decision, she went hastily up-stairs and carefully selected from her numerous gowns a very becoming costume; this she laid on a chair, then smilingly she got ready for bed.

* * * * * * *

The sun was still low in the eastern sky when Bonnie came swinging down the main street of Attalia City in a little black racer; at the first corner she stopped, spoke to a policeman, then moved on in the direction he mentioned her to go.

Presently she was rolling down a long, shady boulevard, peering eagerly at the houses which decorated either side, but not until her eyes beheld the big brass letters forming the word BILTMORE over an archway opening onto the boulevard did she slow down.

Getting out of her car, she made her way into the court, and there she paused before the house register. Rapidly her eyes ran down the list of residents until they came to the name of Justin Hall.

"Justin Hall," she read slowly, "Apartment 33." Just for a moment she paused, undecided whether to take the elevator or the door through which she had come—then with a sudden shrug of her shoulders, she turned to the elevator.

* * * * * * *

Nervous and weak from the stroke of the previous day, Colonel Lathrop awoke and inquired for his daughter.

"She went to the city this morning," the nurse told him, "but left instructions for you to eat a good breakfast and not worry about anything."

"An' heah's de brakfas', Marsa Lathrop," interrupted the voice of old Dorothy as she deposited a heavily-laden tray before the old man.

Colonel Lathrop made a great effort to eat heartily, but old Dorothy noticed with solemn anxiety that the food had scarcely been touched when she carried the tray away.

Beside the window in his luxuriously-furnished apartment, propped among gaily-decorated satin pillows, Justin Hall sat gazing idly upon a small flower garden in the back yard of the Biltmore Apartment house, when James Adams, his faithful friend and secretary, entered the room and handed him a card bearing the name of Miss Bonnie Lathrop.

"Miss Bonnie Lathrop," repeated Hall thoughtfully, then he looked up at James with a smile. "Some charitable sister, I suppose; show her in."

A moment later Bonnie Lathrop stood tremblingly before him.

"Well," said Justin, eying her critically, "did you come to see me?"

"Yes," answered Bonnie, "I have come to ask a very great favor of you."

"A favor of me?" repeated Justin. "Can't say that I was ever thusly honored in all my life before. You know who I am?"

"You are the Gentleman Gambler, are you not?" Bonnie asked hesitatingly.

For an instant Justin Hall sat staring at her in silence; something new and strange was stirring in his heart—Cupid's arrow had suddenly struck home—then he said pleasantly:

"I believe that is my reputation in the South, but who told you of me?"

"My doctor," answered Bonnie quickly. "He told me of your affliction; he told me also that you have a great deal of money—and—and I wondered if you wouldn't help me?"

Justin watched the speaker in silent admiration; never before in his life had he seen such a vision of loveliness except in his dream pictures. Bonnie winced under his ardent gaze.

"Pardon my stupidity," Justin exclaimed suddenly. "Won't you have a chair; we can talk better that way."

Bonnie took the proffered chair and drew it a bit closer to the speaker. There was something pathetically sweet about the lonely man's countenance that caused her to lose fear of him.

"Tell me," said Justin presently, "what brought you here?"

"As I said in the beginning," answered Bonnie, "I have come to ask a great favor of you.

"My father, like yourself, is suffering from paralysis, though he has a chance of recovery provided I can get him away from this place into a new climate."

"You wouldn't expect a man like me," said Justin, glancing down at his helpless legs, "to move him, would you?"

"Not bodily—no," responded Bonnie, "but I thought perhaps since the doctor said you had so much money and such a little time to live yourself, that you might—might—well, give me enough to give my father a chance of prolonging his life."

Justin looked his heartfelt astonishment, then he threw back his head and laughed.

"Just who is this doctor who has put a time limit on my life?" he asked pleasantly.

"Perhaps I shouldn't have said that," Bonnie answered slowly. "You see, he really never thought of me ever seeing you."

"You mean to tell me," interrupted Justin, "that West told you this?"

Bonnie nodded. "But, honestly," she continued in an anxious tone of voice, "I didn't know you were ignorant of your condition."

"So I've only a short time to live, have I?" said the man more to himself than to the girl. "Well, we'll see about that! However, my condition has nothing to do with your affairs. How much money do you need?"

Bonnie leaned a bit nearer the speaker and a flush of red dyed her cheek.

"Oh—I need a whole lot—more, probably than any other one girl ever needed in the world before. I just learned yesterday," Bonnie went on without waiting for Justin to speak, "that my father has been caring for me on borrowed money for ever so long; debts have piled up something terrible. The livestock is mortgaged, the land is mortgaged, and even the house we live in is mortgaged—I hate to say it, but nothing less than thirty thousand dollars would do be any good."

"Thirty thousand——" repeated Justin, "nice little gift, all right—and I must say the request is out of the ordinary."

"I know it is," admitted Bonnie blushingly, "but it seemed a last resort to me, and—and I—I just took a chance on it."

Justin had never seen anybody so anxious over anything as this girl was, and he had never before seen a girl who so thrilled his heart. Suddenly the man's face brightened, and reaching out, he took Bonnie's hand.

"Look here, young lady," he said earnestly, "just how badly do you want that thirty thousand dollars?"

"With all my heart, body and mind," answered Bonnie quickly. "Can't you see it means my father's life? Why, man, I'd most sell my soul for it."

"I understand," answered the man, "and I've a proposition to make."

Reaching into his dressing-gown pocket, he drew forth a letter and handed it to Bonnie.

The girl's eyes grew wide with astonishment as she scanned the first page—but it was the postscript of the letter that seemed most to excite her.

"Remember," it ran, "if you would inherit the fortune of your late Uncle John Hall you must be married by the 27th of this month."

Instinctively Bonnie's eyes sought the calendar on the wall, which registered the 26th—then she turned back to the man.

"What has this to do with me?" she asked, suddenly, handing back the letter.

"It's the one way I can help you," answered the man, "if you are willing to pay that price for it."

"The idea is preposterous," Bonnie cried. "I—I—couldn't think of doing such a thing."

"Why?" asked Justin thoughtfully. "It's a straightforward proposition; by our marriage I would inherit my uncle's fortune which would enable me to give you far more than you ask, and still have a good profit for myself; besides that, my widow wouldn't be so badly off when I am gone."

"I—I—couldn't do it," stammered Bonnie, "I couldn't marry you."

"It's better than selling your soul," answered Justin, "and it couldn't be any worse on you than it would be on me."

Bonnie looked at him in amazement.

"You forget who I am," she said haughtily.

"Not a fit wife for a gentleman gambler, I admit," answered Justin, "but it's the one way I have to grant your request."

"If I should do this thing," Bonnie asked presently, "would you leave me free as long as my father lives?"

There were tears in Bonnie's eyes when she turned her face towards the man again, and Justin noticed with delight that her lips trembled, and he reached for her hand again.

"Surely," he said slowly, "you could read in my eyes that I am not the sort of man who would hold a woman by force; what you need is money—I can supply that need in an honorable way, and be none the worse off."

"I'm tempted to do it," Bonnie answered thoughtfully, "but, somehow, I feel that I'd have to pay heavily for such a favor."

"I'll gamble on it that you won't," responded Justin.

At the word gamble Bonnie winced, and the man smiled.

"This is my plan," he continued: "We'll have the ceremony—that is necessary for me to inherit my uncle's fortune—then we'll divide the money; you can take your part of it, and so long as your father lives I promise not to come near you unless you change your mind—provided," he continued slowly, "you promise me that at his death you will either repay the debt or acknowledge me as your husband."

"A Woman—Again"

By Hilda Koppel.

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ALL over this big country of ours there are thousands of women "making good" at all sorts of professions; who are earning their living in all manner of ways.

In the little town of Hazelhurst, in Mississippi, a sweet-faced, attractive woman has made a huge success of her chosen work of dairying. She is Mrs. Louis B. Moore, and with rare business sense, with remarkable executive ability, she originated and carried out the idea, which is now willingly acknowledged to be a paying one, and which permeates a large section around Hazelhurst.

Mrs. Moore was originally the proprietor of a large hardware store in Hazelhurst. She became interested in the dairy industry through the farmers who came to her place to buy.

Acting on an impulse, this enterprising woman sent for one hundred and fifty cream separators, which were soon sold to nearby farmers. In an effort to encourage the poorer farmers she signed the purchase notes, thus enabling many men to own separators who would not have been able to do so otherwise.

Mrs. Moore, becoming more concerned in the dairy business, enlarged her field of activities. She personally visited every farmer whom she could succeed in interesting in dairying. She arranged for government experts to visit the country around Hazelhurst, where they gave talks to the farmers at the different schoolhouses.

With the aid of a few men who saw the feasibility of her ideas, Mrs. Moore succeeded in arranging for farmers to buy pure-bred Jersey cows on a cooperative plan.

She inaugurated the plan of sending a large truck out into the rural districts to bring the milk to her station in town, thus saving the farmers the trip into Hazelhurst to carry just a few cans of milk. The charge for this service is barely above expenses.

Milk men within an area of twenty-six miles send their products to a branch of the Brookhaven Creamery Co., managed by a woman.

The Illinois Central Railway has assisted in the movement by furnishing excellent service for the shipping of dairy products to New Orleans, Memphis, Jackson and Brookhaven. Early trains run north and south before seven o'clock. The cans are returned each day to the shippers, and the truck delivers them to the farmer's home by noon the same day.

From a beginning of a shipment of ten gallons a day, the dairy business has grown until, now, thousands of gallons leave Hazelhurst daily. Today the finest Tennessee milch stock is seen on every pasture. There are few farmers in that section who do not ship a certain quantity of milk every day in the year. The plan has been to encourage dairying, and cooperation is going to make the business the largest in Mississippi.

And the woman who has caused it all, who originated the idea and did much of the work to bring about the fulfillment of her plan, smilingly gives information.

"I became very much interested in dairying," Mrs. Moore declared, "and the more I learned about it, the more I wished to know."

Mrs. Moore, who is now thoroughly acquainted with all points of her chosen work, answered readily on being questioned.

"The points that lead to success," Mrs. Moore replied, "are: the proper selection of milch stock; the proper care of herds; sanitation in the cow-barns; a proper handling of the milk, and a regular market."

The unique success of Mrs. Moore in her chosen field is but one more illustration of the diversity of employments at which women are working every day and achieving victory.

about until they stood facing each other.

"The other paralytic patient, doctor, who did you say he was?" she asked anxiously.

"The gambler?" Dr. West answered. "I hardly think I said,—it would be unprofessional—but if you'd like to know, his name is Justin Hall."

"And—and—where does he live?" inquired Bonnie.

Thirty-three Biltmore Apartment—in the same city I do," answered the doctor pleasantly.

"When will you call on him again?"

Dr. West looked at the speaker in astonishment.

"Anybody would think you were personally interested in the famous gambler, Bonnie Lathrop, to hear you talk—but I shall not be able to see him again before tomorrow afternoon at four. Now, any more questions?"

"Only one, doctor," replied Bonnie. "Is—is he a kind-hearted sort of man?"

"Kind-hearted?" repeated the doctor, thoughtfully. "I would say so, though his reputation, I believe, is that of never having rendered personal service to anybody in his life."

stems, take several strands of wool, tie in leaves, then s c over the entire length. Arrange on bag as fancied.

Jute Pillows

Either round or square pillow cover of single or double crochet can be quickly worked up.

For round ones, begin as directed for bag and work until the desired size, center of one color with borders of another are attractive. Or different crochet stitches may be used.

For a square pillow make 15-inch square of single crochet, then add a border by working round the four sides.

In doing this make three stitches in each corner stitch. Borders of one row of color, one row to match center, and repeated, are effective. Checker-board borders or entire pillow covers may be made. In doing this two threads are used. Make a square of one color, drop this, join in second color and, holding the first cover just above the stitches into which one is to work, crochet the second square, pick up first color for third square and crochet over the thread used in the second square.

A plain single crocheted center for a pillow may be decorated with a large initial cross-stitched in with the color jute used in the border.

Luncheon mats for porch use can also be very quickly made.

School Bags for Children

As jute is very serviceable, it is especially suitable for children's bags. Use a natural or tan jute chain to measure 14 or 15 inches. Turn, 1 s c in each stitch, working under only one loop, make 2 s c in last stitch, turn, work along the other side of the chain, under one loop only of each stitch.

Now work round and round, making 1 s c on each s c and working under the two loops of each stitch.

When bag is seven inches deep, join in any color preferred for bordering the top.

Divide the edge of each side around the top into six equal parts and place pins at the points. Starting from one side of the bag with the color for the border, work 1 s c in each stitch to the first pin, then 7 rows below, draw loop through stitch and make 1 d c, 1 s c in each stitch to next 2nd pin, then 1 d c through seventh row below. Continue working in this way around the bag to the starting point.

This will give one a row of singles with three doubles on each side of the bag worked seven rows below the first row of the border into the body of the bag.

3rd row—S c to stitch before doubles, then 1 d c in 5th row below, 3 s c, 1 d c in 5th row, repeat.

4th row—Singles, 1 d c in 4th row below, 5 s c, 1 d c in 4th row, repeat.

7th row—All singles. This completes bag.

Make handles of single crochet and fasten to the center of the tops.

Decorate the front of the bag with an initial or a monogram in cross-stitch.

THE LITTLE BRASS RING

By Joseph F. Novak

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"IT" was in the air.

Now, if you ask me what "it" was, I'm sure I could not tell you any more than could Jack Staunton who at this particular moment was experiencing "it."

But hazarding an explanation, I might say that "it," as experienced by Staunton this late Saturday afternoon in August was a desire for companionship of the opposite sex.

He had returned to his native city after an absence of nearly eleven years; then he had been a boy of fourteen, now he was a man of twenty-five. Those eleven years had changed him completely, for, having gone to New York, a poor boy to seek his fortune, he had accomplished that ambition—for him, since, from a parentless, penniless urchin, he had made himself worth three thousand dollars a year to the corporation that employed him.

The return to his home city brought back to him most poignantly, thoughts of a girl, a sweet little slip of a creature who had always been his idol and inspiration. Where was she now?

To satisfy that desire, all he need do was look her up, but this he had not thought of doing. Why? Simply because in the old days her father had been accounted rich, and at the rate he had been making his fortune, he was probably a millionaire by this time and his daughter no doubt moved in the best of society. What would his success, so great for him, be in comparison with her father's financial rating?

No, though there was an overpowering desire in his heart to see her, he would not, for, if indeed he did not find the girl fettered and bound to another, she probably wouldn't remember him anyway.

But "it" was in his veins, and as he looked from the hotel window and saw the vacationists, suit-case laden, hurrying to street cars that would take them to railroad depots and thence carry them from the August dogdays of the city to the open country, he wished he was numbered among those happy ones. There were family clans, young, proud fathers with girlish wives and doll-like children; devastatingly pretty groups of flappers, dainty and spirituelle, looking piquant enough for a movie garden party, spruced up, pinched-backed young fellows. There were probably typists, sales-people and office help, but for once, or rather a heavenly two weeks, they could imagine themselves rich, issue commands and tip employees of summer hotels very like the most opulent of democratic aristocracy.

A pang of loneliness shot into his heart as he watched the happy crowds go by. How he wished he were a part of those crowds. And he decided to seek companionship.

Where, though? Staunton was a decent fellow and had no love for any pleasure that might spoil his self-respect, for though an offspring of very poor parents, they had been moral, honest and upright.

A sign on a street car decided him:

"TAKE THIS CAR
LAND OF JOY!"

Recollection crowded upon him and he smiled, for he recalled his first visit to the "Land of Joy," years ago when the amusement park had first opened. When just a bit of a kid, he had found a two-dollar bill. With more bravery than he possessed now, he had invited the girl of his dreams to go to the Park with him. And she, democratic child that she was, accepted. What a time they had! They rode on the carousal, looked at the pictures in the penny arcade (a thing of the past now), bought popcorn, candy and cracker-jack, washed the stuff down with cold pop, and after wandering about the park the whole afternoon, finally sat down to rest and fell asleep with their arms about each other, the girl's finger prominently displaying a little brass ring which they had found in a ball of popcorn.

Yes, for the sake of auld lang syne, he must visit the park, and off he started, an attractive figure in a light summer suit, oxfords, silk socks and straw hat, so well groomed that he might have passed for a young millionaire—the line of demarcation is not so pronounced these days.

He boarded the car and along it sped, picking up the crowds as it went along. All were good-natured and the more the conductor packed them in, the more hilarious the crowd grew—there was always room for one more.

At last in the dusky twilight, the gleaming lights of the arches and towers of the amusement park arose. Lines of street cars disembogued their crowds. Hawkers and fakers dinned their trashy wares, balloons squaked, the insistent whistle of the popcorn venders' machines shrilled ceaselessly.

Staunton passed through one of the numerous turnstiles with thousands of others and found himself within the realms of the "Land of Joy." Up above the treetops, the great sweeps and dips of the various "rides" were outlined in incandescents, forty-five different "orchestras," calliopes and musical combinations of all sorts blaa-blaa-ed their tunes, now and then drowned out by the racket of cars as they plunged down the "dips" to the shrieks of their occupants.

He noted the nonchalance with which the young fellows treated their "girls" to rides on the various concessions, and it stirred him. He could imagine how big they felt, how they felt they were impressing the lovely young creatures at their sides. How pleasant it would be to have a spirituelle little thing at his side, to compliment him, to flatter him and perchance give him a little opportunity to hold her hand, while he told her he was from New York, show that he had money and was willing to spend—how it would be to have that spirituelle little creature be the person of that baby-day romance—in short, "it" was in the air and he was possessed of it, a bit of midsummer-night madness!

He walked along under the trees, alone, for though now and then a girl gave him a "come hither" look, they were not the companionship he was seeking.

At length he sat down on a bench which bordered the merry-go-round. This was the especial joy of the children and the immense carousel with its flashing lights of red, yellow and blue, its gigantic monsters and horses, did not lack for patronage, especially among the very, very young set.

As he sat there, his eyes lighted upon a most charming picture. A little youngster in a sailor suit of spotless white, came along, clasping the hand of a veritable little fairy Titania. She was the daintiest little creature, dressed in a frock that flared like the skirts of a ballet-girl, her little bare arms and plump little shoulders invited kisses.

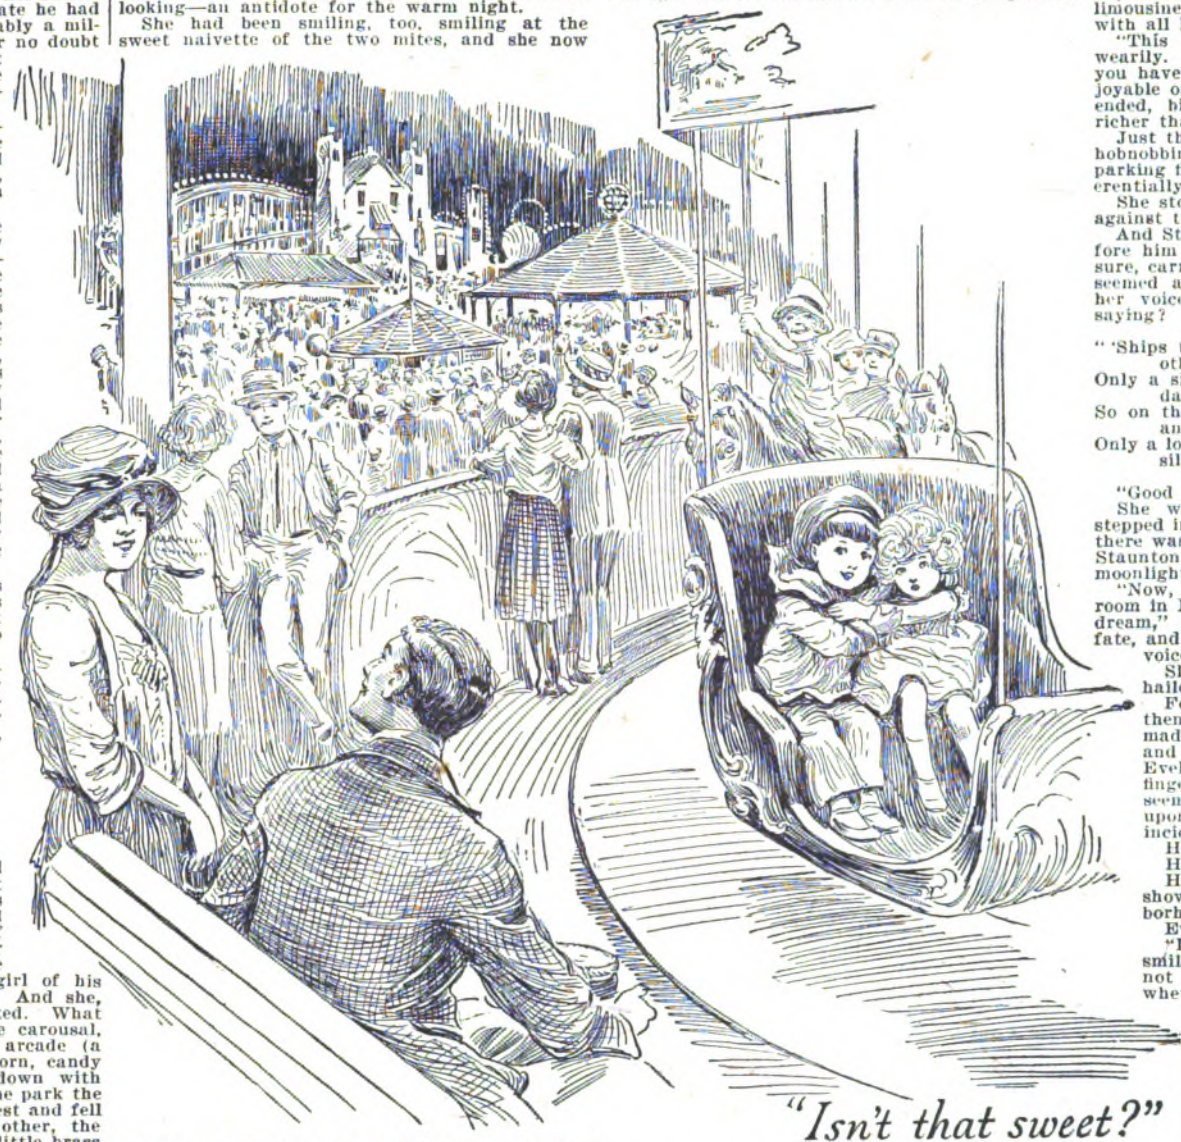
The two came along sedately, hand in hand, a little in advance of two men and two women, and from the way the women admonished the children one readily saw the youngsters were not sister and brother.

They reached the carousel and stopped.

"Papa, kin we go on th' merry-g'-wound?" queried the lad.

"Sure, kid, sure!" papa responded.

"Tum on, Mild'ed, tum on!" and he hastened to the carousel. Regardless of their white clothes, they clambered on and sat in one of the seats, holding each other with a confidence sweet to behold.



Jack Staunton found himself watching for the pair as the carousel made its revolutions, and as the parents had seated themselves near by, he had the benefit of the sweet smile of the tiny woman and the superior air of the little man, who, despite his bravado, however, looked just a wee bit out of breath for the carousel revolved with considerable speed.

Staunton was not the only one who had noted the little couple—others did also, and smiles wreathed many faces.

At length the ride was over and the youngsters clambered down. But they were so heartily enjoying themselves that Staunton determined to follow them—they so reminded him of the time he had played the gallant to dainty Evelyn Marsdale.

He found himself smiling, and as he turned, he smiled into a pair of brilliant brown eyes belonging to a most bewitching girl. She was dressed completely in white, except for the broad green collar and green silk cuffs of her suit. White silk stockings and white pumps were on her feet and a floppy hat of white and green was on her head. She was dainty and fresh and cool-looking—an antidote for the warm night.

She had been smiling, too, smiling at the sweet naivette of the two mites, and she now smiled at him—not with a flirting, encouraging smile, but one of those smiles people smile when they look upon innocent childhood. And then strangers may smile at each other, and the smile is understood, and such a smile brings back the belief in the brotherhood of mankind.

"Isn't that sweet?"

Her smile moved him strangely—had he ever seen anyone with those eyes?

The girl moved away, too, as he did, he purposing to follow the children.

Just then the calliope of the carousel began a popular song which wove in its theme those snatches of childhood songs:

"Ring around a rosie,
That's the game for me——"

The rattle of the "aerial railroad" drowned out the music, but presently it emerged from the racket again:

"And London Bridge is falling down, Falling down, falling down——" and again the interruption.

The little couple arrived at the miniature railroad and again the little gallant offered his services to fair lady.

"Tum on, Mild'ed, I'll hold you," he said.

And Staunton smiled again and as he looked up he found himself again smiling into those mysterious eyes of brown.

"Isn't that sweet?" the girl remarked, softly, almost as if she spoke involuntarily.

"It is charming," he returned, speaking as friend to friend, and in spite of himself: "It reminds me of a little incident that happened to me years ago."

And then, almost as if unaware of what he was doing, he began telling her the whole incident, while she listened, interested, sympathetic.

She smiled when the recital was finished.

"What happened then?" she queried.

"The judgment," he replied solemnly. "Shades of the whipping post! What a hiding I got! And the girl wasn't allowed to see me any more, for the idea was dreadful—a child of her social position going to an amusement park with the son of the trash of the vicinity." He laughed, but there was bitterness beneath it.

"The girl must have loved you very much," she laughed.

"Possibly. At five years, little women have not commenced to discriminate."

Then, somehow, he had an odd feeling, as if he had once before stood in that very spot, and talked with this girl and told her the story of the two runaways. And now, he didn't know how to "break-away," he wanted to ask the girl to ramble with him and perchance ask her to dance in the big ballroom or ride some of the break-neck rides.

Finally he blurted out:

"I don't suppose you believe in chance acquaintance but I'm from New York and don't know anybody in the city. I wonder if I could dare to ask you to dance with me? Of course, if you'd rather not——" but there was entreaty in his eyes.

"Why—why——" she hesitated. Then defiantly: "Yes, you may!"

"Thank you," and then he looked into her eyes and put a sincerity in that glance that he meant should quiet any qualms the girl might have had, for he realized that he had done what he had too often censured in others—he had deliberately sought to keep her with him. Yet, was it deliberate? He couldn't feel it was—some powerful fascination was drawing him on.

"Oh, it's just a bit of midsummer-night madness," and he let it go at that.

They went to the elaborate ballroom and enjoyed several dances there—then they sat down at one of the tables and watched the summer show and quaffed some heavenly slush.

By this time the girl had become quite chummy with him and at his rash sugestion permitted him to take her for a ride on one of the coasters. As the car started up the incline, the boys of the car yelled like college cheer leaders—then they simply put their arms about the girls and the young ladies thought it perfectly all right—though perhaps Flora Jane Jibby of the "Heart-Balm" column of a local newspaper might have condemned such liberty. But Flora doesn't know that as a rule these young people have an "understanding," they are "going together," and perhaps the next year when these same couples come to the amusement park they will come as "Mr. and Mrs." So it's all right—in most cases.

The car reached the top of the fiercest dip. A wild yell from all, and down the incline it shot. The girl was jostled against him—he clasped his hands over hers in a strong grip; up the car sped, down again, up and down for a third time when it smoothly rounded a curve.

There was the opportunity for holding her hand—and he had grasped it—beyond a doubt. He glanced at her. But evidently she felt it was perfectly all right, for straightening her hat, she laughed merrily, saying:

"Isn't it the wildest thing? I wonder what they'll invent next!"

"Do you remember the 'Loop the Loop'?" he queried. "That awful thing that had an actual loop in it and when one rode on it, his head actually dangled downward for a fraction of a second?"

"I remember it. It was in this park the first season it was opened. Wasn't it? A dangerous thing."

"Yes. The city stopped its operation after a couple of people lost their lives—though riders were warned that they rode the thing at their own risk."

"Did you take your little friend on the device the time you ran away with her?" And then without waiting for his reply, she continued: "Did you adore her?"

"Of course I did. And she has been my inspiration, always. You see, her parents were very rich and I've no doubt they are among the city's social elect now. When I got older, I guess I loved her with a boyish love. But as I grew older, I saw there was no chance for me, so I decided to go to New York, and make my fortune. I found that I wasn't adopted by a bank president in the manner of the Alger books, but nevertheless, I did manage to get into a place where I constantly received promotion until now I am making what seems to me to be quite a little fortune, considering what I started with. Pretty Evelyn Marsdale was always my inspiration, and it used to be my joy, when I bought a new suit to imagine I went calling on her, and I tried to imagine pleasure in her eyes, and encouragement in her actions—pshaw, what a fool I am! It is this glorious midsummer night."

"Yes, I think so," she murmured dreamily, "but I must go home. It is getting late."

"May I see you home?"

"No, please don't. I live in such a miserable street. I'm just a poor working girl, and it took nearly everything I had to buy these lovely clothes."

"That's just why I want to take you home. I thought perhaps you might be an actual society girl—you have the air and—oh, everything about you bespeaks the thoroughbred. And if you were an heiress and all that—good night for me."

"Why?" she asked quickly.

"Do you suppose I'd want to have anything to do with a rich girl?"

"No, I don't suppose you would,—Jack!"

"Jack! How did you guess my name?"

"I didn't guess it, Jack Staunton. Evelyn Marsdale has not forgotten you."

"You are Evelyn Marsdale? Oh, you're stringing me!"

"Am I?" she laughed good-naturedly. "Oh, no, I'm not. Do you recall the time you came to call on me—in our yard? My father went after you with a switch and I hid you in a barrel? And do you remember—the little brass ring?"

"Yes, yes, but Evelyn, I somehow cannot grasp it—that I should meet you in this fashion. I—I—sort of fancied that you were in society, and of course, if you were, you were not for me. But if you are poor—there may be some chance for me for I am making three thousand a year—good heaven, I am proposing to you! The moon makes us mad!" he exclaimed.

"Jack," she said gently.

"I don't know what you think of me, but somehow, finding you this way, seems like fate. I always thought you were a little princess when we were children, and I guess that regard became love." He laughed a little helplessly. "Have I a right to talk to you this way? Did I only imagine your father as a wealthy man? Was he merely comfortably fixed and we, through our miserable poverty, only imagined him wealthy? Have you ever thought about me, Evelyn? May I hope? I can open my heart to you when I know that you are on my social level?"

The girl sighed, a little wearily.

"You may see me to my car now, Jack," she said.

He thought she meant the street car, but she led him toward the enclosure where automobiles were parked.

"Where are you going?" he queried.

"To my car," she returned.

He looked at her in amazement, but she walked on, until she came to a luxuriously appointed limousine, upholstered in velour, and trapped out with all luxuries, even to a vanity case.

"This is my car, Mr. Staunton," she said wearily. "Thank you for the pleasant evening you have given me. It was the only really enjoyable one I've had in a long time. But it has ended, bitter-sweet. My father is rich, Jack, richer than he ever was."

Just then her chauffeur came up (he had been hobnobbing with others in the center of the parking field). She waved him back, and he deferentially touched his cap and retired.

She stood, a beautiful figure, in the moonlight against the rich velour upholstering of the door.

And Staunton stood—as if the solid ground before him had suddenly developed a gigantic fissure, carrying the girl away from him. She had seemed almost encouraging—almost. He heard her voice, as in the distance—what was she saying?

"'Ships that pass in the night, and speak each other in passing,
Only a signal shown and a distant voice in the darkness;
So on the ocean of life we pass and speak one another,
Only a look and a voice, then darkness again and silence.'

"Good by, Jack."

She waved to her chauffeur, he came, she stepped into the limousine. The door jarred shut, there was a whizz of gasolene exhaust, and Jack Staunton found himself standing, hat off, the moonlight flooding down upon him.

"Now, let me wake up and find myself in my room in New York, for this certainly has been a dream," he said bitterly. "Was it a whim of fate, and was it meant to be 'only a look and a voice, then darkness again and silence'?"

Slowly he left the auto park, then he hailed a taxi and was driven to his hotel.

For a long time he thought seriously, then his mind was made up. He had not made his little success by sitting down idly and waiting for it. He must not let Evelyn Marsdale slip so easily through his fingers. She had seemed encouraging. She seemed to have recognized him immediately upon his recital of the amusement park incident.

He would look her up.

He did.

He found the Marsdale home one of the show-places in an ultra-fashionable neighborhood. He rang and was shown in.

Evelyn came down at once.

"I wondered if you would call," she said, smiling just a little vaguely, and he could not decide what was in her thoughts—whether she was trying to blot out the revelation of the evening before or whether it was an attempt to treat the whole matter with levity.

"I had to, to know just what you meant when you quoted that passage from 'Ships That Pass in the Night'?"

"Well," she smiled. "You would only consider me as a poor girl and I was rich——"

"Oh," he replied. "Well, leaving the question of our relative monetary worth out of it—my word, is this that same little brass ring?"

He stepped to her side and raised the little ring which dangled on a tiny golden chain.

She nodded.

"You've kept it all these years! It is the emblem of an unconscious troth we made in childhood. Evelyn, you did think of me!"

"Always, Jack, dear. And last night when you all unknowingly spoke of what an inspiration I had been to you, I knew that I loved you. I did not want to be wedded for my wealth. And that's why I sometimes ran away from my wealth and tried to imagine how it would be to be poor. Jack, dear," and her voice grew very low, "I think I've always felt sort of engaged to you ever since you gave me this little brass ring."

Make Your Own Wireless Telephone

This Free Book Tells How

WIRELESS telephone receiving sets are comparatively easy to make. The man or boy with any mechanical ability whatever should be able to construct his own receiving apparatus by following the instructions in this book. The different parts that go to make up Radio receivers may now be purchased in almost any hardware or general store. Many of the parts can be made at home. This book shows you how to assemble them so as to make a receiving set which if purchased outright would cost many times what you pay for the component parts. It tells how to make not only one, but several different styles of receivers. It illustrates and describes every step of the process and the instructions are easy to understand because technical terms are avoided wherever possible.

Written by twenty Radio experts, this book is, for its size, one of the most authoritative yet published. It is 7½x5½ inches in size, contains one hundred pages and ninety illustrations and diagrams. Also in the back of the book is the official application blank of the Radio League of America and full instructions as to your becoming a member and receiving a membership certificate and button. We will send you a copy of this book if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you this book telling you how to make your own Wireless Telephone, free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8701.

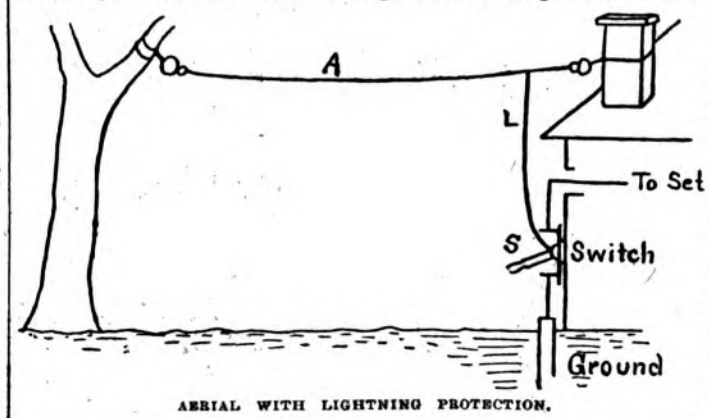
The Aerial in Radio Receiving Set

THE first thing to consider in the installation of a radiophone set is the aerial. The aerial system is one of the most important factors in good radio reception. We have heard and read so much of the use of bedsprings, steel roofs, etc., as aerials that most of the new radio enthusiasts are completely in the dark as to a proper aerial.

An ideal aerial for radio reception is a single wire from 100 to 150 feet long and its entire length at least thirty feet above the ground. It is better to have the wire more than thirty feet high, and it is sometimes possible to have one end much higher than the other. A single wire in the receiving aerial is sufficient, and additional work and expense of more wires is unnecessary.



The aerial should be well insulated at each end with either porcelain or composition insulators and if it is necessary to splice the wire it should be soldered.

In bringing the lead-in (the wire leading from the aerial to the indoor apparatus) down to the point where it enters the house, care should be taken not to have sharp bends as the high frequency tends to jump off these corners in what is known as brush discharge. A porcelain tube should be placed in the hole through which the lead-in enters the house. Although not necessary, it is well to use insulated wire from the point where the lead-in enters the house to the instrument; otherwise there is apt to be a short circuit with the ground lead.

The aerial should always be protected against lightning. The best method is to have a switch connected on the outside of the house and having the blade attached to the aerial and one side of the switch to the ground and the other side to the receiving instrument. In the illustration, "A" represents the aerial, "L" the lead-in, "S" a double throw single knife switch, "G" the ground. Thus by throwing the switch in one direction we connect the aerial to the receiver, and by throwing the switch in the opposite direction we cut out the receiver and connect the aerial direct to the ground. This protective device is very important as it is required by the insurance laws.

We also must have another ground lead. This is the ground to the receiver and is generally made onto a water pipe or radiator. Where there is no water pipe or radiator it is necessary to connect to the outside ground. Make sure also that the ground connection of the protective device is made below the switch in the same way. The outside ground may be made to some pipe going directly into the ground or a number of ordinary water pipes about six feet long may be driven into the ground and a soldered connection made to these pipes.

The aerial is now complete and if connections are all made as directed there should be no trouble in receiving both radiophone and radio telegraph signals with a properly constructed receiving set. The next article will give in detail the receiving circuits now in use and their characteristics.

AERIAL WITH LIGHTNING PROTECTION.

Technical Terms Used in Radio

In order for our readers to more readily understand the various radio articles in this and other magazines we will run a series of definitions of the technical terms used in these articles.

AERIAL.—One or more wires insulated at a certain height above the ground and used to radiate energy in the form of ether waves produced by a transmitter. When used for receiving purposes the correct name is antenna though both terms are used for either reception or transmission.

AMPLIFIER.—The term used in referring to either an amplifier tube or an amplifier receiving set.

CRYSTAL DETECTOR.—Certain metallic crystals when introduced in a radio circuit have the property of rectifying the incoming signal oscillations so that the resultant intermittent direct current will operate a sensitive telephone receiver.

GROUND.—In radio work the ground is the low potential end of the circuit and functions in connection with the aerial or antenna of most sending and receiving systems. The term "ground" is used in any connection to the earth, river or sea.

INSULATOR.—A non-conductive material and one through which electricity will not pass.

STATIC.—Natural electrical discharges occurring in the ether and in reality miniature lightning storms. Since these discharges travel through the same medium as radio waves, they are readily picked up by receivers and prove very troublesome at times. It is comparatively difficult to tune out these disturbances for they have no definite wave length.

Questions relating to the radiophone, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Radio Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department.

Questions and Answers

Q.—What wave length does Pittsburg broadcast music on?

A.—Pittsburg and all other broadcasting stations use 360 meters.

Q.—Will a crystal detector receive voice and music?

A.—Yes, a crystal gives very good results over short distances.

Q.—What size wire should be used for an aerial?

A.—Number 14 wire is used and also a regular antenna wire composed of seven strands of No. 24 tinned copper wire.

Q.—What is a soft tube? What is a hard tube?

A.—A soft tube is a vacuum tube only partially exhausted and used for a detector. The hard tube is a vacuum tube highly exhausted and used for amplifying.

Q.—Is it necessary to have a license to have a radio receiving set?

A.—No. Anyone may have a receiving set but a license is required to transmit.

Q.—Is it possible to use a single watch case receiver for receiving radio music?

A.—Yes, but they are only about 75 ohm resistance and will not give very satisfactory results.

Q.—Are there any broadcasting stations in Nebraska?

A.—Yes, there are two in Omaha, Nebr. They are W. O. V., operated by R. B. Howell, and W. O. U., operated by Metropolitan Utility District. They are both on 360 meters. Other stations in Nebraska are: W2AG—Ft. Omaha, KDEF—Omaha, WAAW—Omaha, WKH—Norfolk, 440 meters, 9YY—Lincoln. No data obtainable on these stations.

Q.—Is it possible for one to make his own audion, using an alcohol torch to heat the grid and plate instead of using the storage battery and filament?

C. L. C., Holcomb, Wisc.

A.—Your question, although very unusual, is a good one. You have evidently read of the origin of the audion tube but have lost the most important point. The filament is not used to heat the grid and plate, but when the filament is heated it gives off electrical ions of a negative character. These ions strike the plate and a path is formed through which electricity will flow from the filament to the plate. As all the ions are negative, only one side of the alternating current will flow through this plate. Thus the resultant current is a rectified, pulsating direct current. The grid acts as a sieve and regulates the number of negative ions flowing from the filament to the plate. You could use your arrangement by using the alcohol torch to heat a cup of sodium and the sodium will produce the negative electrons, but this is not a practical arrangement.

Q.—I live in Eastern Oregon, in a deep canyon. What kind of radio phone would be most satisfactory in my situation? T. M., Immaha, Ore.

A.—Your location is very poor for radio work, but you will find that if you get your aerial as far as possible away from the walls of the canyon you will get good results on any good radio receiver.

Dominion a chance to speak a word. By way of description, I am twenty years old, have medium light hair, blue eyes, fair skin and weigh 155 pounds. I live on the farm. We have two Fords and lots of farm machinery. I graduated from high school two years ago, and would have got through sooner but for missing one session when my brothers were in France.

Virginia is hard to beat I think in many ways, but in my section there is one deficiency: a great shortage of young girls. A feller might as well be looking for hens' teeth as for a marriageable girl. Of course some are to be found at a distance, but the roads forbid travel—sometimes even in a Ford. Oh, by the way, Uncle, I am something of a girl myself. I put my sister's hat, coat and fur on, had a kodak picture taken, and fooled everybody who looked at it. They all thought I was a girl. But what I was really getting at: I had charge of the housework and cooking for a week recently while my only sister at home was in town—and I made it all right.

I have been reading COMFORT for years and I have always enjoyed reading the continued stories, the cousins' letters and Uncle's answers to them. I am a new League member and look forward to hearing from the cousins. I do not wish to wear my welcome out the first time, so I am going to close. Please try and slip this by Billy when he is not looking and print it for me. Hoping very much to see my letter in COMFORT, I remain,

Your loving nephew and cousin,
WILMER D. SWEET.

Wilmer, I am almost afraid to tell right here in print how handsome you are! That picture you sent certainly makes you out to be a good-looking guy if there ever was one. Billy put it right in the center of page 1079 in his Album and said, looking at it admiringly: "Uncle Lisha, Wilmer looks too sweet for anything!" And I had to admit Bill was right this time. I'll bet you fooled 'em when you dolled up in your sister's clothes. It would take some pretty nifty strawberry blonde to beat your golden hair and blue eyes above a silver fox fur neckpiece, I'll say.

I certainly believe, Wilmer, that the Old Dominion's roads around your country must be just as bad as you say—or otherwise there would be a procession of Fords, all packed with those hens' teeth you wrote about, and all headed for Etna Mills. And roads or no roads, believe me, Wilmer, if they saw the picture Bill has on page 1079 they would get to your vicinity even if tractors or steam rollers were necessary to travel over the gumbo. Wilmer, beauty is a responsibility and you will have to watch out.

PUTNAM, NORTH CAROLINA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

This is my third attempt at writing to COMFORT, which we think is the dearest paper of all—particularly the Cousins' department. I think it so nice for the cousins to write and tell all the interesting things in the way they do. Uncle, I have been wondering how old you are. I can just imagine you have grey hair and are bald-headed. But I know you are a dear, Uncle. I don't think bald-headed people are ugly. I think they look as good as any one else. My father is bald-headed and also my grandfather.

I think that fellow was out of his mind who said there were no pretty girls in the U. S., but I won't say anything about the boys for I think we have some good-looking boys in this country.

Uncle, I have written three times before and I will be heartbroken if I do not see this in print. If any of the cousins care to write to a girl with fair complexion, grey eyes, brown hair, who is fifteen years old, four feet, two inches tall and weighs 117 pounds, I will try and answer all letters received.

Best wishes and love. NELL STUTTS.

Nell, what set you to wondering about my age? To tell you the truth, I wonder about it sometimes myself and have never been quite able to make it out. I vary like the weather and the tax rate. The safest thing for me to do is to list myself as did the widow in court the other day who said coyly: "I am over eighteen." Well, I'm over eighteen, Nell, and have probably been so for some years although I have no exact way of telling. Billy, for instance, thinks I act too young and frivolous and has told me so many times. But Bill is not bald-headed. Far from it. Of course it's hard to be bald-headed at eighteen, but it has been done. However did you guess or find out that I have been offering summer pasturage to adventurous flies? It is a sad state and I like to hide the bare fact with a Panama hat. In my baldest moments I comfort myself with the reflection that it is better to be bald-headed outside than inside. However, I must tell you in confidence, Nell, that there are times when I think I may really be bald on both sides. These are desperate thoughts and I must not dwell on them. Speaking of baldness, Nell,—as I never would, only you commenced it—did you ever hear about the bald North Carolina farmer who was putting in a load of late timothy hay during a heavy shower? That poor chap got a lot of hayseed on his head, the shower started the seed a-sprouting, and he has had to use a lawn-mower ever since to cut his new crop of green hair. He says it's a nuisance keeping the mower sharp and he'd much rather be bald-headed again.

Well, now you have it all settled, Nell: You have a bald-headed father, grandfather—and uncle. But really and truly wouldn't you like me better if I had just as many black curls as Cousin Ted Carmichael?

VICTOR, IDAHO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

This is my third letter to COMFORT. Billy must have got the other two for I have never seen or heard anything of them. Now there is plenty of grass for Bill's cavernous appetite, so I have hopes of this one getting by. I think COMFORT is a grand old paper which grows better with age. The cousins' letters are very interesting. I believe that Ruth, the author of the first letter in the April issue, must be one of those rare American girls that Cousin Jack Wilcox referred to. I agree with Cousin Jack and Cousin Irving Hanners in regard to what they say about the girls of today. Real, honest-to-goodness, nature-beautified, true-hearted girls are scarce and getting scarcer. I'm not saying what I think of the boys. I will leave that for the girls to do. Don't be backward, girls. Come forward and tell us what you think of us. Surely we are not so perfect that there is nothing about us to criticize. We will promise not to get peeved as some of you did with poor Jack. Don't let us do all the criticising.

Uncle, that was a dandy talk you gave in the April COMFORT about the farmer. The farmer's wages dropped from five and six dollars a day to five and ten cents a day and they haven't gone on a strike for more pay yet. I am a young bachelor farmer from the wild and woolly West. I do not think the West is any more wild than the East now, so far as inhabitants go. But it is still wild because most of it is still in the same wild state that God left it, not having been spoiled and tamed by the hands of men. I am a lover of nature and all things beautiful. Anyone who has to live in a crowded, dirty, noisy city, especially this time of year, sure has my sympathy. I live in a small valley called Teton Valley, which is surrounded on three sides by high, beautiful mountains. The highest point of these mountains is the Grand Teton, the Watch Tower of the Rockies. This peak is about fourteen thousand feet in the air and so steep that no one has ever reached its summit. Lovers of mountain scenery who have visited the wonders of the U. S. testify that this peak and the country surrounding it is second to none in grandeur.

Uncle, I have an idea: You come over this summer and bring your Goat. We will go and climb as near the top of that peak as we can. Then we will send Billy up with a long rope. He can fasten one end of this rope to the top and we will climb up and have the honor of being the first to ever set foot on top of the Grand Teton. Some idea, isn't it?

I live only a little way from the Yellowstone National Park. Thousands of tourists go through this valley every summer on their way to view the natural wonders to be found there. Perhaps some of the cousins pass right by my place every summer and never stop in to see me. I expect to work in the Park this summer as chauffeur and guide, so maybe I will have a chance to see some of the cousins. I would like to receive letters from all—especially those who have gone or are intending to go through the Yellowstone Park. I will answer all I can.

With best love to you, Uncle, and all the cousins,
Your nephew, CYRIL HAMBLIN.

Thanks for your fine postcard photograph, Cyril, whhich gave me glimpses of the valley where you dwell and over which the Grand Teton holds mighty guard. Ever since man had eyes to look upward with he has been glad, like you, Cyril, to raise them unto the hills and gain help and peace from the serene strength of mountains. A great peak such as your valley's Watch Tower makes a standard by which we can more truly gauge our own and the passing affairs of other men. What do the unhealed battlefields of Europe, the unrest or the leaguing of nations mean to your Grand Teton, Cyril? the old boy will hold his head just as high when governments proud today are as dead as Egyptian dynasties and aliens walk their streets and place strange tablets above their tombs. To love nature, is to be able to live where our lives can be blended with the seasons, is to be putting out new soul roots each year. If we lived rightly we could keep our hearts as evergreen as the pine trees.

That idea of yours about getting up to the Teton's unscaled topknot is a good one, Cyril, but it has one fatal flaw. You say, "we would have the honor of being the first to set foot on top." And who are "we"? I suppose you mean you and me, Cyril? Well, let me tell you that if we sent Bill on ahead to fasten our rope that it would be his four feet which would first reach on top and he would take good care that nobody else received credit for capturing the Teton's scalp. Bill would write an article for the National Geographic Magazine on "Topping the Teton;" he would have a brass cylinder with his photograph set in concrete on the summit, and the only way you and I would figure at all, Cyril, would be as assistants or guides who arrived later on the summit after the dangerous ascent had been made by B. Goat, Esq., F. R. G. S.

I hope there may be many of our big Family who will say "howdy" to you in some part of Yellowstone Park's two million acres this summer Cyril. You might stage a reunion about Old Faithful, that Big Hot Water Faucet of Dame Nature.

LOVELAND, R. R. 1, BOX 24, COLORADO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I have just finished reading COMFORT and I think the letters are just wonderful. I have often wanted to write to you before, but how could I when Billy watches out so for colored stationery like I use? I don't think there has ever been a letter in COMFORT from Loveland, has there? It's the "Land of Love" as sure as I am writing this letter! Uncle, have you ever visited Loveland? and if so did you go to Estes Park? I have lived here seven years but I have never been to Estes Park. I am ashamed, but it is true.

I am a Freshie, and oh, how I hate those studies! You couldn't make me give a perfect recitation in history because I hate it, and when I hate something I can't do it as well as I ought to. I wonder how many of the cousins like this study.

It rained last night and I had to walk two miles to school in the mud this morning. Oh, glory! You should have seen my shoes. When I reached school they were just covered with mud and it took me almost a half hour to clean them.

I suppose I will have to do as most everyone else does and tell you what I look like; but of course I won't give a full description because you might be shocked. Well, here goes: I am five feet, one inch tall, blond hair, grey-blue eyes and weigh 110½ pounds. I am almost sweet sixteen and have never been ummmmmmmmm.

I would like to receive letters from some of the cousins. I won't promise to answer all, but I'll do my best.

Your niece, MARY WEBB.

Mary, you want to know if I have ever visited Loveland. Yes, indeed; I have been there many times, although I have never been there as often as I would like, nor stayed as long as I would wish. You may think it queer when I add that, as it happens, I have never been in Colorado. However, although you may not realize it, the borders of this town of yours are wider than you think, wider than any part of the world. So it has not been a difficult thing for me to walk your streets on lucky occasions and hold converse with other dwellers in your "Land of Love." I should like above all else to settle down and live in this town of yours forever, Mary; but somehow horrid businessy affairs are always preventing and fixing things so that I have to stay in Grouchtown, Scowlville, Growlton and other ugly communities. But there is one smoky big city I positively will not visit—this is Hateburg, a town which has largely increased its population during the past few years. Why, in this town some people have lived and done

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Washing the Car

DON'T wash the car too often as you will ruin its highly-polished finish. Don't polish it too frequently or you will get the same result. There are advocates against ever placing a polish on the finish and advance good arguments in the support of their statements. Don't try wiping the dust off with a rag. Regardless of whether the cloth is of the soft or hard type, it will usually grind the grit into the finish. When washing the car remove the nozzle from the hose and use a gentle stream of water. Considerable has been written about applying the water to the car until the mud and dust soften and flow off. I have followed this advice to the letter and believe the mud on my car would still have been there if I hadn't got busy with a sponge. The water surely softens the mud and dust but the film does not flow away. A sponge is needed to remove this film after which the car should be wiped with a chamois skin which has been wrung out of water. This step prevents spotting.

Helpful Pointers

Turning off Switch

Turning off the ignition switch on a grade so that the motor will act as a brake is not to be recommended. When this is done the muffler loads up with combustible gas which is usually fired when the ignition switch is turned on. The common result is a blown-up muffler. Another reason why the switch should not be turned off is that the cylinders will be loaded with the gasolene mixture which will attack the oil on the cylinder walls and destroy its lubricating qualities. It is good practice to use the motor as a brake on long or steep grades but the proper method for so doing is to leave the switch turned on and retard the spark and throttle levers.

Dust in Motor

Did you ever return from a motor trip "white with dust"? Have you stood in the open for many minutes vigorously wielding the brush, endeavoring to remove the dust from your clothes? Of course you have, several times. Now have you ever given a thought as to what your motor breathes? It must have air so that the gasolene might be rendered combustible. Stop to consider the amount of dirt and dust you were compelled to eat on the trip and then think about the amount of dust and dirt that entered the motor with the air. There was no way provided for separating the dust so it necessarily went into the motor with the air. Dust entering the motor is just one of the reasons why the oil in the crankcase should be drained off occasionally, the case flushed out with light oil and then filled with new lubricant of the proper grade.

Overheating

If your motor overheats during the hot weather take a look at the fan belt. It may be slack and require taking up.

Piston Freezing

There are several terms commonly used in connection with an automobile which might not be readily understood by all new and old owners. For example, one common expression is "frozen piston." Now this condition might take place on the hottest day as well as on the coldest day, and as a matter of fact the temperature of the air has nothing to do with it. When a piston is fitted very closely in the cylinder and does not have proper clearance for expansion or if there should be a lack of lubricant to the piston, the expansion would take place to such extent as to cause more and more friction until finally the piston would stick fast. This is the condition commonly referred to as a "frozen piston."

Spring Clips

The spring clips (the parts that hold the springs to the axles) stretch after being in use for a short time and it is therefore imperative that they be adjusted at least once each month. Use a large wrench on the nuts and draw them up tightly. It is almost impossible for a spring to break at the center bolt if the clips are kept tightly drawn up. Loose clips will permit the axle to slide out of position and shear off the spring center bolt.

Storage Battery

The manufacturer usually provides means for securing the storage battery tightly in place. However, after the battery has been removed once or twice the owner is apt to neglect the securing of the battery in place. If the battery is placed in the box and not secured there is danger of its "jumping around" during the operation of the car on the road and causing broken cells or loose terminals. Acid leaks from the cells when such a condition exists and it is only a short time before the battery is a total loss.

Mountain Grade

Long use of the car brakes down mountain roads causes the brake linings to wear rapidly. As a matter of fact, there is danger of the linings burning out before the level stretch is reached, and thus you may be compelled to guide a "wild" car down the grade. A friend of mine had this experience in New York State last summer. The railways follow the valleys, and it therefore is essential that the car be kept under absolute control at all times. It is nice to experience that toboggan sensation but the sport certainly is not worth the chance taken. I much prefer to engage the second gear and retard the throttle and spark levers and in this manner permit the motor to do most of the breaking. A little help with the brakes occasionally will hold the car back sufficiently so that you have absolute control at all times. If the grade is an exceptionally steep one, engage the low gear. After the car has gained considerable headway it is impossible to change to a lower gear so bear in mind that the changing must be done first instead of as a last resort.

Answers to Correspondents

MRS. E. E. H., Merigold, Miss.—Assuming that you are inquiring about the effect of driving the car at all times with the spark fully retarded, I believe that you will agree that the manufacturer would have omitted a spark lever if such a condition was favorable. When the motor is idling, the spark lever should be retarded, but it should be advanced proportionately to the motor speed. In plain talk, the motor would lack pep were you to leave the spark fully retarded, and you would not drive a great distance before the water in the cooling system would boil. The safe rule to follow is to carry the spark as far advanced as possible without causing the motor to knock.

Regarding your inability to start until the cylinders have been primed, believe you should be able to overcome this difficulty by use of the choker. When the carburetor is choked a much richer mixture is produced. If, however, pulling over the choker does not help, it would seem that the carburetor should be adjusted for a richer mixture.

I do not understand the condition referred to when you state that there is a "leak between the needle valve and engine." If the carburetor floods at all times then the level is either too high or possibly there is a particle of dirt between the needle and its seat.

I am certain there is not a great deal the matter with your car and I suggest a careful study of the instruction book furnished by the manufacturer. Unless you are experienced in motor construction, it might be well to call on the dealer of whom you purchased the car and have him explain certain features you do not at present understand.

F. Y., Austin, Texas.—You have presented a subject which cannot be answered fully due to lack of space. In Fig. A we show the standard three-speed S. A. E. gear shift, while in Fig. B we show a shift that is not considered standard. The different makes of cars have different shifts and it is impossible from external appearances to determine the method used. When you sit in the driver's seat of a car with which you are not familiar, it is best to idle the motor and try making shifts and letting in the clutch until you have figured out the arrangement. In 1920 I received an inquiry for a list of gear shifts and the one I compiled at that time is given below. I have not made up any lists since that time but do not believe many of the manufacturers have changed their shifts since that time. Sitting on the left front seat, we will let L. R. stand for left rear, L. F. stand for left front, R. F. for right front, and R. R. for right rear.

Regarding the location of the clutch foot brake, believe you have reference to an arrangement such as used on the Reo models. The left foot pedal on these models operates the clutch and service brake. Depressing the pedal about half way throws out the clutch. Further depression of the pedal operates the service brake. The right foot pedal operates the emergency brake. No emergency brake hand lever is used, both pedals having ratchets which can be easily operated to lock the pedals in any position desired. When the car has an emergency hand lever and two foot pedals, the usual arrangement is for the left pedal to operate the clutch and the right pedal the service brake. The emergency brake is controlled by the hand lever.

The location of the foot accelerator is a matter of choice on the part of the designer. However, it is usually placed in the toe board in a convenient position for the operator.

The location of the spark and throttle levers is also a matter of choice. When the levers are placed on top of the steering wheel, the top lever is usually the spark lever and the bottom one the throttle lever. When there is a lever on both sides of the steering post, the left lever usually controls the spark and the right lever the throttle. Some designers have the spark and throttle advance up the segment while others have the advance down the segment.

P. N., Mascot, Tenn.—The usual firing order for a six-cylinder motor is 1-5-3-6-2-4 or 1-4-2-6-3-5. The usual proceedure is to arrange the cranks 1-6, 2-5, and 3-4 in pairs and space them 120 degrees apart.

The crankshaft in an eight-cylinder motor is like the shaft used in a four-cylinder engine. There are but four crank pins, two connecting rods using one pin.

Two firing orders for an eight-cylinder motor are as follows:

I do not quite understand what benefit you will derive from getting the names of a few major parts entering into the construction of a magneto. The study of electrical apparatus is an issue to itself. However, for your information some of the common terms heard in connection with a magneto are magnets, pole pieces, windings, armature, condenser, circuit breaker, distributor, brushes, etc.

The generator produces electrical current. When run at sufficient speed it furnishes current direct to the ignition and lighting circuits. It will also produce more current than will be consumed in these circuits and this is sent into the storage battery for use at such times as the generator shall be inoperative or not running at a sufficient speed to produce all the current needed.

The Ford car uses one kind of splash system. The oil is poured into the crankcase and when the motor is started the flywheel picks up the lubricant. The centrifugal action causes most of the oil to be thrown off the flywheel and some of it is caught in a tube and flows to the front end of the motor. As the oil flows back in the case it fills the little basins under the connecting rods. There is a small scoop fitted at the bottom of each connecting rod and as the rod swings around the scoop dips into the oil in the basin directly beneath and in this manner kicks a shower of lubricant up into the cylinder.

Other makes of cars having a system classified as splash lubrication also have a pump for circulating the oil. A reservoir or tank is placed under the crankcase. The pump, which might be plunger, gear or some other type, drives the lubricant out of this reservoir and circulates it to the timing gears, main bearings, etc. However, the principle involved is that the basins under the rods are kept filled so that the scoops on the rods can kick or splash the oil up into the cylinders.

MRS. J. B., Waubun, Minn.—Reboring cylinders and fitting oversize pistons is a successful practice and if properly done produces a result as good as new. If the score is not too deep, sufficient stock to make the walls very thin will not have to be removed. If, on the other hand, the scores are deep then they should be filled in first, after which the cylinders should be rebored. It is not necessary for anyone to have worked on your car to make the cylinders oversize. Natural wear causes them to gradually get out of round, and in time reboring is the proper remedy for the condition. Providing the mechanic will stand back of his work, I would suggest reboring and fitting oversize pistons and rings.

MRS. M. McA., Hayward, Wisc.—Without having the opportunity of inspecting your car, it is impossible for me to state the exact cause of your difficulty. Whenever a car stops dead on the road, the first thing I would look for is ignition. Switch on the lights to determine whether the battery is delivering current. If so, remove the spark-plug and ground it on the outside of cylinder. Turn on the ignition switch and spin the motor either with the hand crank or starter. If a spark jumps the gap of the plug, you are then reasonably certain that the ignition is O. K. Next take a look at the carburetor. Try to flood it by priming, and if it will not flood disconnect the gas line. Of course you must first make certain that there is gasolene in the tank. If gasolene does not flow from the line when it is disconnected, the line is either plugged with foreign matter or a shut-off in the line has worked closed. If you do not receive ignition current, check up the equipment until the trouble is found. If you are not getting gasolene to the carburetor, direct your efforts to the carburetor system.

J. W. B., Cedar Key, Fla.—Water in the crankcase of a Ford will not affect the magnets. However, the condition should be corrected as soon as possible as it will have an injurious effect on bearings, etc.

Regarding water blowing up into the radiator, it is just possible that a leaky cylinder-head gasket is the cause of this condition. If the gasket is old or worn, try a new one.

Sixteen valves can be fitted on your motor successfully but unless you are going into the speed game I am sure that the results will not be sufficient to warrant the expense.

Gardening in August

"AUGUST tells the tale!" Whether the efforts of the gardener are to meet with real success or dismal failure is a question that is usually answered this month, for long-protracted drought is a menace that often levies a heavy toll unless steps are taken to soak down the thirsty soil and supply growing things with the necessary moisture that fails to "fall from out the brassy, cloudless skies." Water the garden in the evening, giving it all the moisture that the parched earth will "drink," then cultivate to form a loose surface mulch as soon as the soil can be worked. Remember that a hard-packed surface soon bakes, cracks and induces rapid evaporation of soil moisture.

August can hardly be considered as a planting month; really it is more of a harvest month, with a welcome array of peas, beans, beets, berries, tomatoes,—yes, and new early potatoes, to lend ready proof of summer's lavish bounty to the farm bill-of-fare. But there are still some vegetables that may be planted if desired. Peas may still be sown during the first week of August if the soil is moist enough to sprout them. Then there are turnips. Few gardens but could readily make room for these tasty globes of succulence that so admirably lend themselves to winter storage. Market gardeners remove the dried tops of early potatoes, already dug, or the vines of peas that have borne their crop, then quickly level and work the soil, broadcasting or drilling in rutabagas or Dutch turnips. Turnips make their best growth and are better flavored when grown in the cool, moist months of early fall, surviving severe frosts, and allowing the gardener to dig them almost at will up to the time the ground freezes. Given a fair amount of rainfall, we can think of no other crop that will so amply reward the grower with mammoth yields for a minimum outlay of labor. And how welcome turnips are, either the yellow or white, either mashed or sliced, in soup or as an essential portion of a grand old-fashioned New England boiled dinner, when chilly winds and winter snowstorms make us hug the stove or fireplace!

Some Odd Jobs

The observant gardener will find plenty of jobs for willing hands in and around the garden. Late-planted tomatoes should now have their foliage thinned out to permit the fruit to ripen evenly. Fruit that is shaded or that rests upon the ground where it will likely rot should be picked and placed upon the shed roof, window-sill, or laid on straw in a cold frame with the sash in place and allowed to ripen.

Cover the late-bearing currant bushes with mosquito netting, if this has not already been done, to protect the crop from the birds. Bury the joints of squash vines at intervals; new roots will form where joints are covered with earth, and this offers protection from borers. If the vines are growing too long and setting too many small squash, snip off the ends to stimulate the growth and increase the size of a few choice specimens. Pinch back limas or other pole beans that have grown so tall they overtop their supports. If you are numbered in the ranks of those who love a "mess o' greens and ham hocks," plan on a supply for fall by sowing spinach now.

Keeping the upper hand in the fight against weeds is less difficult now than it was earlier in the growing season, for weeds rooted up by the hoe or cultivator "stay killed." But there are sure to be patches of burdock, masses of quack grass, or jungles of Canada thistle that have preempted a fence corner or other out-of-the-way place from whence they are spreading slowly but surely to gain a foothold in the garden. Now is the time to take them in hand. With a sharp spade dig out the hearts or crowns of the burdocks, then place a generous handful of common salt in the hole over the cut crown. Mr. Burdock will give no more trouble. If quack or thistle patches can be plowed—in fence corners they can't, which we regret—then plow two inches deep. This cuts off the roots and permits the sun and heat to dry them out and kill them. Plow again six inches or more deep, then disk and harrow. If no green growth is allowed to persist, the fight can be won in a single battle. Small patches in fence corners can be spaded up, then worked from time to time with the spading-fork, tossing the roots to the surface to dry out and die. Be careful that no roots remain clinging to any kind of garden tools; if they do you will find new centers of weed infestation springing up where the roots are dropped.

Pruning the Cane Fruits

Observation indicates that under ordinary farm conditions the cane fruits are more often than not sadly neglected and allowed to "run to tops." Scant crops are the sure result of such handling, and a little work at the right time would be time well spent.

Prune black raspberries by pinching out the tips of the young growing canes during late summer, or when they have reached a height of 18 to 24 inches. To accomplish this it is usually necessary to go over the patch several times during the growing season, as all the canes do not appear at the same time. The penalty for allowing canes to grow beyond the desired height is weaker, spindly plants. Then in the spring thin out the canes, leaving only three to five of the best ones to each bush. Remove all lateral shoots or side runners, or cut them back to 12 to 18 inches.

Correct pruning of red raspberries consists in removing all old canes as soon as possible following the fruiting season, then thinning out the new growth. Here the new canes are not pinched back, but are allowed to grow. Proper thinning out of the new growth and spacing of the new canes is important. All suckers and weak canes should be cut out and if the raspberries are grown in hills not more than five to seven of the best canes should be left in each hill to produce the next season's crop. They are most commonly allowed to fill the space between the original plants, forming a solid row or hedge. The hedge row should not be allowed to become more than 10 to 12 inches wide and the canes should be spaced so to stand six to eight inches apart.

Experienced growers consider it highly important to pinch the high-bush blackberry canes at least when they are about two feet high, as this encourages the low setting of the fruit buds. Do not prune in the spring until the canes are in flower and the amount and location of bloom can be seen. Otherwise too many fruiting canes may be removed. As a general rule, about one-half the bloom should be cut off.

Rye for Early Hog Pasture

Rye is perhaps the earliest and best of all spring pasture crops for hogs, provided it is sown during late August or early September, enabling it to develop an extensive root growth and make a thick stand before the weather becomes too severe. Started early and given a favorable, open fall with plenty rainfall, it may even be pastured lightly along toward Thanksgiving. Too close grazing and constant trampling in late fall will more often than not cause winter killing.

Following ordinary Northern winters with a good blanket of snow, there is no other forage crop that is hardier or that will start growing earlier in the spring. As soon as the frost is out of the ground and the land has become firm it may be pastured lightly, with a steady increase as soon as the spring growth starts. From this time until the stems commence to joint it will withstand pasturing, but if a crop of grain is desired, the hogs should be removed at this time. If this is done a good grain crop may still be obtained, as a rule.

When hogs are turned upon rye pasture for the first time see that they receive a full meal of their accustomed feed before they are turned out. A sudden change of feed is harmful at any time, but if the change is made "on an empty stomach" they will at once gorge themselves on the succulent green feed and the consequences may prove quite serious. Particularly is this true with sows that are nursing litters, for small pigs will almost certainly scour if their dams overeat the new feed. The plan commonly practiced by experienced breeders is to feed a full meal of their ordinary ration first, then allow them to go out with full stomachs, limiting their stay on rye pasture to not more than two or three hours the first day. The time may be increased from day to day until, at the end of a week or so, they may be permitted to remain in the pasture at will.

Selecting and Managing Herd Bulls

It has been said that "The bull is half the herd," but the truth of the matter really is that, weighed in the milk scales and in the annual balance sheet, he is far more than half the herd. In truth, the whole success and future of the dairy industry depends upon the bulls used by dairymen. The pure-bred sire indelibly stamps his progeny with the "trade-mark" of his own breed, and his owner soon feels the direct benefits resulting therefrom.

For the farmer of average means the best plan is to buy a young bull whose maternal ancestors during several generations showed good yearly milk and butterfat production records. Only bulls which have the backing of closely-related, high-producing ancestors can improve a herd. Keep this point in mind: Most good bulls are registered, but not all registered bulls are good. The prepotent bull stamps his calves with his own desirable qualities. Therefore he must have desirable qualities, and he must be strong and energetic in order to pass them on. Look for the wide muzzle, the broad forehead, prominent eyes, deep chest, big barrel, open-jointed frame, long, straight rump and loose skin all combined in the good-sized animal. In addition to outstanding masculinity, strive for vigor and vitality in the new herd sire. Beware of the undersized, lazy, dull-eyed bull; he seldom is a moneymaker.

See that the herd bull gets plenty of exercise. It will improve both his condition and his temper. Do not keep him "jailed" day after day in a small box-stall. Give him a strongly-fenced exercise lot, provided with some sort of shelter from sun as well as flies, and he will exercise at will. Feed him for masculinity rather than for fat. See that his winter quarters are light, well ventilated and sanitary. Handle him frequently and gently while he is still young; it will then be easier to manage him when he grows older. Use a bull-staff at all times, and insist that the hired men do likewise. Remember that it is the docile bull—so called—that does the damage. Do not let him run at large with the cows.

Many young growing bulls are underfed, whereas the aim should be to get early, steady and rapid growth that guarantees size, stamina and vitality in the mature animal. A good growing ration for the young bull is: skim-milk; clover or alfalfa hay; silage or roots, one to five pounds, depending upon his age; and one-half to one pound of the following grain mixture: oats, three parts; wheat bran, 1 part; corn, 1 part; and oilmeal, one-tenth part. The mature bull requires feed that gives strength and vitality, but not fat. He should receive from eight to 15 pounds of silage daily, but no more. A good ration is: silage, eight to 15 pounds; hay, eight to 12 pounds; and grain mixture, two to four pounds, consisting of three parts of oats and one part of wheat bran.

Marquis Wheat Is Favorite

According to a statement recently published by the North Dakota Agricultural Experiment Station, Marquis wheat has come to occupy an outstanding position among the varieties of wheat commonly grown in that state. Although not resistant to stem rust, the earliness of Marquis enables it to escape infection in a large majority of instances. Power, Haynes and Preston are highly susceptible to the disease. Kota is superior to Marquis in stem-rust resistance and apparently in drought resistance, is a high yielder, and appears to be a first-class milling and baking wheat in every respect, but as yet it has not become generally known in this region. Flour from Marquis wheat excels that from any other commercial variety for bread-making purposes. Varieties grown in the drier sections of the state produce stronger flour than when grown in eastern North Dakota where the rainfall is heavier.

Durum wheats generally have higher acre yields than common wheats, growing more vigorously and usually exhibiting greater resistance to drought and rust. Flour from durum wheat, however, does not have the strength of gluten associated with flour from common wheats. Of the common amber durum varieties, Kubanka is superior to Arnautka. Monad, a variety of more recent origin, exceeded Kubanka in yields and rust resistance, but its flour does not give quite so large a loaf when baked. Acme appears and behaves quite similar to Monad. Although the red durum variety D-5 yields well and is least susceptible to rust, its milling and baking qualities are distinctly inferior to all other varieties and it is considered unsatisfactory for macaroni and other edible pastes.

Calf Feeding in England

In England calves are kept on new milk for the first two weeks, after which they are put on mixed new and separated milk. After the fourth week when they commence to nibble at hay they are fed from one and one-half to two gallons of separated milk per day, to which is added four to six tablespoonfuls of cod-liver oil. At the age of ten weeks the oil is discontinued, the calf being able by this time to obtain sufficient carbohydrates from the hay ration to supply the necessary heat and fat. During winter a little linseed cake, crushed oats and wheat bran, along with pulped turnips, is introduced into the ration so that at the age of from four to six months milk may be discontinued altogether. This ration is continued up to one year of age, producing thrifty, growthy, healthy calves.

Value of Purebred Sire Proved

The Pennsylvania State Hospital, cooperating with the Pennsylvania State College, has issued some interesting figures showing conclusively the value of a pure-bred dairy sire. The institution owns King Korndyke Sadie Vale 20. Four of his daughters have completed records as two- and three-year-olds. Their dams had yearly records as mature cows. The average production for the daughters was 12,200 pounds of milk and 648 pounds of fat, while the record for their dams averaged 9,445 pounds of milk and 452 pounds of fat. This represents an increase of 30 per cent. in milk production and 42 per cent. in fat. Moreover, the dams' records were made as mature cows, while the records of the daughters were made with their first or second calves. Putting the daughters on a mature basis, the increase would be 55 and 70 per cent. respectively. It seems that this plainly answers the common question, "What is a pure-bred bull worth?"

Combating New Plant Diseases

CUCUMBER MOSIAC.—Following two years' investigational work which has been conducted in the Middle West, it has been found that white pickle or cucumber mosiac is by far the most serious disease affecting the cucumber in that region, and that it is equally serious in Eastern States. Contrary to a mistaken notion long held by many growers, this trouble is not due to weather nor is it preventable by soil management. The virus, introduced into a wound in a healthy plant, will produce the disease. Insects, particularly the cucumber aphis and the striped cucumber beetle, are among the most important agents in its transmission, though it is also spread from plant to plant by the hands of pickers.

In seasons particularly favorable to the reproduction of plant lice the disease is always worse than in seasons when these pests do not thrive. The disease never winters over in the soil and only very rarely in the seed of the cultivated cucumber, according to the findings of the investigators, but it does survive in the seed of the common wild cucumber. As this plant is considered as one of the most important agents in the perpetuation and dissemination of the disease in many districts, removal of wild cucumbers should be practiced. Where this has been carefully done almost complete freedom from mosaic disease has resulted. Other plants besides those of the cucumber group are attacked, and it has been found recently that a perennial species of the milkweed carries the disease over winter in its roots.

TOBACCO DISEASES.—Experiments conducted for the purpose of discovering methods to eradicate or control root rot in tobacco have shown that disinfecting the soil of the seed-bed, either by live steam or the use of formalin, and the adoption of rotations were the only methods which proved effective.

Continued observation of the mosaic disease of tobacco have indicated that certain varieties are especially subject to the disease. Experiments now under way point to the possibility of developing new strains of tobacco that are totally or partially resistant, however. Already a resistant strain of White Burley which gave a yield equal to that of the ordinary type has been obtained as a result of crossing ordinary White Burley with a variety naturally resistant to the disease.

BEET NEMATODE.—This disease, now quite widespread in sugar beet growing regions of Utah, is steadily spreading to new districts each year. Experimentation indicates that crop rotation seems to be the only method of combating the disease. Such rotation should include a leguminous crop, such as alfalfa, clover, peas or beans. If alfalfa is grown, a crop of wheat or corn may follow before beets are planted again.

SPINACH MOSAIC.—This disease, also known as spinach blight, has caused severe losses in the truck-growing regions of Virginia. Extensive experiments have been conducted for the purpose of developing varieties resistant to the disease. Crosses have been made between the commercial variety, Savoy, and a wild variety obtained from China. As a result of this cross-breeding, one resistant variety has been obtained and named Virginia Savoy. Grown under carefully-watched tests, this resistant variety was affected with mosaic disease to the extent of only about one-half of one per cent., while adjacent beds of commercial non-resistant Savoy suffered a loss of more than 10 per cent. Seed of the new resistant variety is said to have been grown under contract for distribution, and no doubt will become available for spinach growers in blight regions in the near future.

Saw-fly Injurious to Young Pines

Young pines, both in nurseries and growing wild, are often completely defoliated by the larvæ of a saw-fly known as Leconte's saw-fly. Defoliation is usually severe in its effects upon young pines, killing, misshaping, or weakening the trees to such an extent that attacks of secondary enemies often kill them. This pest is common on the scrub pines throughout Eastern States and is a constant menace to the better varieties found in nurseries or reforesting areas.

Control of the saw-fly depends largely upon the extent and location of the infestation. In nurseries and parks, where the infestation is heavy, a thorough spraying with lead arsenate at the rate of two pounds of powdered lead arsenate to 50 gallons of water (or six teaspoonfuls to the gallon) will give good results. Spraying should begin promptly when the first larvæ are discovered. In a scattered infestation, hand picking or knocking the larvæ from the trees and crushing them will be found more economical and at least as effective. In larger areas of either natural or artificial growth control cannot well be practiced because of the expense. Whenever these insects are observed in any locality and control masures are practiced against them, it is important that the territory be carefully observed during the 14 months following treatment, since it is highly possible that some larvæ may have escaped the treatment and have spun cocoons. This possibility makes watchfulness necessary over the entire period required for adult insects to develop from the larval stage; otherwise adults may emerge from the cocoons and reestablish the infestation.

Questions and Answers

GROWING DEWBERRIES.—Will you kindly tell me through Modern Farmer what dewberries are and how to grow them. I have never seen them grown, and am curious. C. O. E., Minn.

A.—Dewberries are quite similar to blackberries in many respects, but the canes creep along the ground, forming new plants by rooting at the tips, instead of growing erect as do blackberries. Set the plants three feet apart in the rows, and have the rows five or six feet apart. They may also be "check rowed," setting the plants five feet apart each way. Set out the plants in early spring and cultivate thoroughly throughout the growing season. Let the canes lie on the ground during the first year. The following spring drive stakes five or six feet long at each hill, or construct a one- or two-wire trellis along the rows to support the vines. If stakes are used, wrap the canes once or twice around them and tie in two or three places with soft twine or twisted cloth which will not cut. If a wire trellis is used, tie the canes along the wires in the same manner. Dewberries are pruned much the same as other cane fruits. Cut out the old canes after fruiting and clip back the new growth if the canes grow longer than five or six feet. Leave about six canes to each plant. In colder Northern regions the canes must be laid down in the autumn and covered with earth, straw or other material for winter protection. This covering is removed in the spring and the canes are then retied to their stakes or trellises.

HOLSTEIN OR FRIESIAN.—I keep Holstein cows and know that their right name is Holstein-Friesian. Is it right to call them Friesians as some folks do, or is this another breed of cows?

A. B. W., Vermont.

A.—In the United States the correct name for the breed commonly referred to as Holstein is Holstein-Friesian. In Great Britain the same breed, or at any rate cows descended from the same stock in Holland, are called "Friesians," and the British herd book of the breed is known as the Friesian herd book. There seems to be some reason to favor the British name, as the breed was originated in the portion of Netherlands called Friesia. Holstein, in northwest Germany, does not rank with the former as a cow-producing country, nor did it play an important part in the origin of this great breed.

Housing and Feeding for Winter Eggs

EVERYBODY who keeps hens should give the subject of housing and feeding for the winter special consideration, for birds should be placed in their permanent quarters, given regular egg-producing rations, and started before the end of the month. Upheavals, such as change of houses or method of feeding, upset the birds and check the egg-laying machinery, and as the winter schedule should not be changed after it is once started, do what needs doing to the houses, and how many birds you are going to keep through the winter, what feedstuffs and litter you are going to use, must all be well considered and decided upon without delay.

First comes the house. No matter how plain and shabby it may be, it can be made storm proof, clean and well ventilated without much expense. Stop up all the cracks and holes and cover the roof and sides with tar paper. Clean the walls and all the inside fixtures, then give them a coat of thick whitewash, being careful to get it into all the cracks and crevices, for those are the places where vermin congregate.

The floor of the house where you keep the birds must also come in for its share of cleaning. If it is just a dirt floor, scrape it off two or three inches deep, and cart in the same amount of strong clay soil that will pound down to a hard, smooth surface. If the floor is of boards, wash it off with plenty of hot, soapy water, using a good hard broom. Let it dry thoroughly, and before the birds are put into the house, cover at least six inches with deep litter. The best way to be sure of ventilating the ordinary chicken house is to take out the sash in half the windows at opposite ends of the house and cover the openings with strong unbleached muslin.

I like to have one or two glass windows on the south or southwest side of the house, as they allow the direct rays of the sun to get in, and the birds enjoy it in cold weather. It is well to have a frame door covered with muslin, as well as the wooden door, as the muslin will let in some air and light, and should keep out snow during the stormy days when the hens will have to be kept in the house.

The matter of litter for the floor is almost as important as the selection of foodstuffs. Many people think that any old hay or straw will do for hens to scratch in, but it won't. Musty, moldy or old hay causes more sickness among fowls than anything else, as it breeds several different kinds of spores or germs, which float in the air when the hens scratch up the material, and are inhaled by the birds and rapidly develop diseases of the lungs and intestines, and one special germ even affects the eggs laid by hens, causing white diarrhea in chickens hatched by them. So you see how important it is to have clean litter and nesting material. We use shavings and chopped corn-stalks topped with dried leaves as long as we have them. We gather all we can in the fall and store them in boxes. Several years ago we tried shavings only, and had many cases of crop-bound hens, but have had no trouble since we tried the combination of corn-stalks and straw. The shavings are particularly valuable because they are cheap and prevent the other materials from packing down, and so insure a ciculation of air through the litter, which keeps it sweet.

The next important matter is to decide how many pullets and year-old hens you can keep through the winter. Don't overcrowd your house. There is nothing more detrimental to egg production or strong chicks in the spring as overcrowding stock in the winter. Twenty well-cared-for hens, with plenty of house room, will produce more eggs and better birds next spring than fifty who are crowded. Besides which, if a lot of hens are crowded into small quarters at night, their breath and the moisture of their bodies is more than the air can carry off, and it rises to the roof, where it freezes during the night and melts during the heat of the midday sun, so causing a perpetual recurrence of moisture day after day, which soon makes the house damp and unhealthy. Plenty of cold fresh air perpetually circulating through the house keeps it fresh and dry, and is beneficial to the birds.

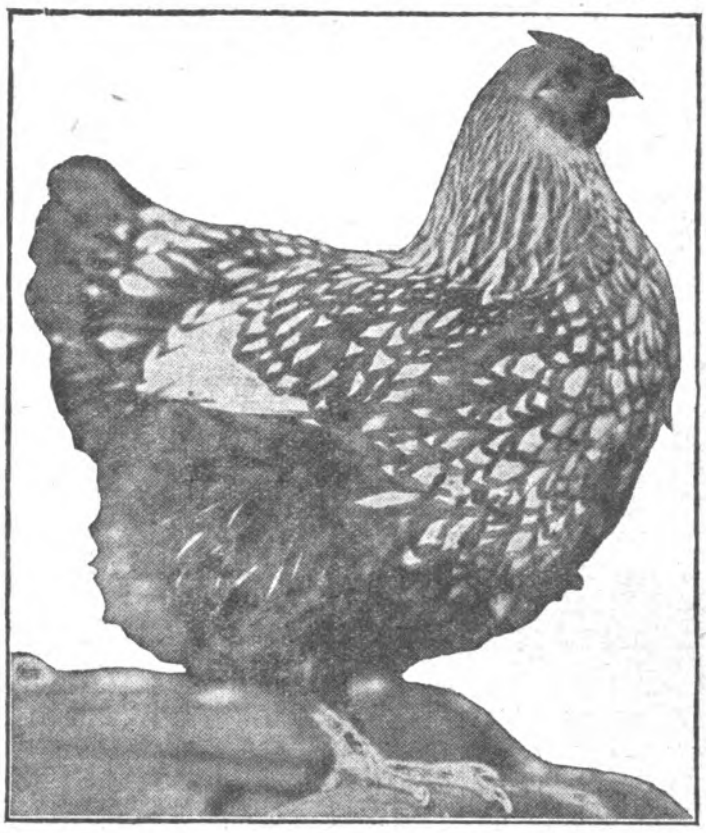
Having arranged the house and the number of birds to be kept, general care and feeding is the next thing to consider. The breed of chickens you keep, the part of the country in which you are located, must influence that to a great extent. In sections of the country where the weather is extremely cold, hens require rations in fats and oils to keep them warm. On the other hand, in the Southern States, they require only enough fat-forming foods to nourish their bodies and produce eggs.

Hens must have a variety of food to produce eggs in winter. The best way to convince you of this fact is to give you a chemical analysis of the egg, which is: Water, 650 grains; albuminoids, 80 grains; oil, fats, etc., 135 grains; mineral water, nine grains; sugar, coloring matter, etc., 26 grains. The remaining hundred parts of the thousand of the egg are used in the shell, which contains about 50 grains of salts of lime, and about 50 grains of pure, uncombined lime, the remainder being carbolic acid water of crystallization. Albuminoids are the flesh-forming parts of food, often called nitrogens.

Oils and fats come under the head of carbons. Mineral consists of lime, soda, potash, magnesia and sulphur. Knowing the materials necessary for the egg, no one ought to be foolish enough to expect a biddy to produce eggs unless she is provided with the necessary materials. Farmers complain that hens lay nearly all their eggs in the spring, when they are hardly worth the trouble of marketing, and stop as soon as the prices go up in the winter. And it is true of most farms, simply because in the spring hens can find all the elements necessary for the formation of the egg, but after frost destroys the green grass, clover and insects, they stop producing because they have no materials from which to make the egg.

Now, however, I hope to convince you of the common-sense advantage of balanced rations. The next consideration is, what ordinary farm products are best and cheapest to feed biddy on during the winter. Clover, alfalfa (green or hay), linseed meal or wheat brain all contain about six pounds of lime in every hundred. Turnip tops, beets and carrots also contain a goodly amount, hence their great value in making up rations for laying hens. Clover hay, linseed meal and wheat bran are also flesh-forming foods, like middlings or skimmed milk. Oil and fat we get principally from corn and buckwheat, and the lesser amount from wheat, rye, clover hay, linseed meal and unskimmed milk.

Minerals are principally furnished by the process of digestion, which reduces to ash the grains and herbage which contain lime, potash, magnesia and sulphur. One quart of mixed grains is as follows:



Two parts of coarsely-cracked corn, two parts wheat, one part oats, buckwheat or barley. One quart of this mixture, scattered in deep litter, for twenty hens in the morning. At noon, a mash made as follows: Mix two parts of wheat bran and one each of white middlings and corn meal, one-half part each of gluten feed and meat scraps. Alfalfa or clover hay we must have, as it gives depth of color to the yolk of the egg, and the necessary balance to the rations; so, to make the mash, put four quarts of either alfalfa or clover hay which has been chopped fine into a can with a tight lid. Pour on it just enough scalding water to thoroughly moisten it. Cover and allow to steam for three or four hours, then add one quart of the ground corn mixture. Feed about one pint to every ten hens, the first morning. If they eat that up clean in less than ten minutes, increase the quantity slightly, and be very careful to give only what they will eat up clean in fifteen minutes.

The mash must only be steamed enough to crumble, not pasty nor wet. About one hour before dark, feed the same as in the morning, except that an extra half pint may be added to the quantity, and when the weather is cold whole corn should be used instead of cracked corn. Sharp grit and oyster shell must be before them all the time, and unless you have drinking fountains which will not freeze the dishes should be emptied and refilled with warm water morning, noon and night. Change the litter on the floor of the house every two or three weeks and shake it up every day. Follow these directions and you should have plenty of eggs from October until June.

Culling is the important work just at this season, for with the present price of feed nobody can afford to keep "deadheads." As soon as hens stop laying in July and August, clear them out to make room for pullets.

The indications that a bird is physically qualified to produce eggs are: A clear, full bright eye, the eyelids wide open and not sluggish; a good, strong pair of shanks, with straight, well-worn toe-nails, showing constant use in scatching. Only a healthy fowl is a laying fowl, and such a bird must of necessity have a good appetite. A hen that is laying has an enlarged abdomen, due to the enlarged intestines, ovary and oviduct, and the body is deeper at the rear than at the front of the keel. These points are not so well marked when the hen ceases laying.

In the non-laying hen there is likely to be an unusual accumulation of fat in the abdomen and under the skin of the body, so that a plump appearance presents itself; the fat under the skin of the shanks, especially in the back, causes that part of the leg to have a round appearance. When this hen is in her laying period, the surplus fat to a certain extent is used, and the shanks lose their round, plump appearance, and the same is true of other parts of the body, especially in the region of the pelvis and the vent. The face appearing more plump and fat, thins out, and the skin of the face, comb, earlobes and wattles are sex characteristics and become changed, as just stated, as the ovary and oviduct become enlarged and active. When the hen passes from a laying to a non-laying state, the ovary and oviduct shrink, and the comb, wattles and earlobes lose their soft, pliable and red appearance, becoming more dull in color, and the comb looks as if it had been powdered.

The pelvic bones are wide apart in the heavy producer but contract again when she ceases to lay. The fullness of abdomen and width of the pelvic arch will depend on how heavily the hen will lay during the next two or three weeks. At the same time, the pelvic arch enlarges and the vent grows larger and flabbier. A heavy-laying hen has a soft skin all over the body. The non-laying hen has a hard, plump body, with bones not too evident. A pinched body indicates a small capacity and a poor producer. The meat bird has a tendency to turn her food into fat, which is indicated by the thick pelvic arch and a hard abdomen. In the laying hen the ischial bones of the pelvic arch are thin. In the heavy-laying hen there is noted bleached shanks, beak, earlobes, eyelids and vent.

The yellow color is due to xanthophyll, which occurs principally in the green feed; thus the more green feed the bird consumes, the slower will be the bleaching of the parts when the laying period begins. In the heavy-laying hen the capacity will be indicated by the distance from the posterior end of the breastbone to the pelvic arch, which should be three or four fingers' breadth. In the non-layer the pubic bones may be scarcely one finger's breadth apart.

And when on the job of culling, don't forget that there are many advantages in the capon over the ordinary roasting fowl. He is much larger, attains weight more cheaply, is always in demand because of a larger carcass, and sells for from ten to twelve cents a pound higher than the rooster because of the quality of the meat.

After cockerels have reached the age of four and a half to five months, they become quarrelsome, and are hired to keep in flocks of more than four or five, whereas capons can be kept in large flocks and are as docile as pullets.

It is not advisable to caponize the lighter breeds, such as Leghorns, etc., as the large carcass cannot be obtained from such fowls. The American type, such as the Plymouth Rock, Rhode Island Red and Wyandotte, and the Asiatic type, such as the Brahma and Langshan, are breeds which may be caponized profitably.

Subscribers are entitled to advice of our Poultry Editor free, through the columns of this department. Address Poultry Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. BE SURE to give your full name and address, otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

B. C.—Examine the flock, and take out all the hens which have a baggy underbody. Confine them in a separate house and yard, or if all your birds are confined, give those you remove free range, if possible. Add a teaspoonful of magnesia to every quart of drinking water. If they are confined, feed very sparingly on oats and plenty of green vegetables. Or, if you can give them free range, give just a few oats at night, and plenty of sour milk to drink, for three weeks.

H. F. M.—The egg organs of a fowl are very delicate, and easily upset. Overfeeding, or very stimulating food will make them lay very heavily for a time, but sooner or later the strain commences to show, and the birds break down in one way or another. Eggs containing blood are the forerunners of most serious trouble, unless you immediately take steps to stop it. Cut down the amount of food at once. Give nothing but a little scratch feed at supper time for a month, if the birds are on free range. If they are confined, give only half the usual quantity at each meal, and that scattered on deep litter, so that they will have to scratch for every grain. Omit the mash feed entirely. Give them all the green vegetables or lawn clippings they will eat, and sour milk to drink.

E. T.—Brooder chicks, or chicks confined in small enclosures, get very few, if any, insects, and their natural craving for animal food often turns them into cannibals. Chop a hard-boiled egg once a day for every twenty chicks, and get some commercial meat scraps, chick size. Commence with about a teaspoonful for every twenty chicks, and increase the amount very gradually until it can be left before them in a pan. Remember, you must be very careful about the quantity at first, or they will get bowel trouble.

D. H. H.—There are so many reasons for chicks dying in the shell that it is very difficult to assert the cause of the trouble without knowing all the conditions. The parent stock may be wanting in vitality. If they are overfat, over lean, or have suffered any illness in the past, or are inbred. Too many hens for the number of male birds is a frequent cause, but in such cases, the germs are fertilized only sufficiently to develop the chick, and lack the necessary strength for the exertion of breaking through the shell and starting the internal machinery of the body working. Then when it comes to the matter of incubation, really strong eggs may suffer for the want of moisture, heat, or an excess of either, especially during the last twenty-four hours. After the evening of the nineteenth day, don't open the door of the incubator until the hatch is well over on the twenty-second day. It won't hurt the chicks to tumble over each other. If the machine has a glass door, cover it up at hatching time to keep out the light, and the chicks won't move about very much. If you open the door to take out the first ones that hatch, you reduce the moisture and heat in the machine, and the remaining eggs will rarely hatch well. I advise all beginners to use a hygrometer. They cost only about $1.50. Any drug store or place where they sell incubators can procure them, as they are made by the same firms that make thermometers. During the first week the hygrometer should register 75 degrees; the thermometer 102 or 102½. Second week, hygrometer, 70; thermometer, 102½ to 103. During the third week we have a changed condition of affairs. The small systems of blood vessels of the first week have greatly increased, so that by the fourteenth day the white of the egg is full of veins in which the blood is rapidly circulating and the chick is growing fast. -Bear in mind that the first ten days are devoted to the development and in that short time the chick is fully formed in all its parts. During this period the quantity of blood in circulation is comparatively small. Then comes the ten days of growth, or increase of size of body and its parts when great quantities of blood are rushing through the numerous blood vessels, carrying the building material. It is during this latter period that the water (after being used in the blood circulation) should be allowed to escape freely from the egg, with consequent rapid enlargement of the air cell. Therefore, during the last week of incubation I would remove the water pans or wet sand from the egg chamber and let the humidity decrease to 50 degrees, or possibly 40 in some cases. Simply removing the extra supply of water usually answers the purpose. The moisture supply must be renewed again on the nineteenth day to 75 for another distinct purpose. If the air surrounding the hatching eggs is dry, the chicks are likely to have a hard time breaking through the tough inner lining of the eggs. When this parchment-like lining is dry, it is exceedingly difficult to tear it, and its strong bands may hold a vigorous chick a prisoner even after it has broken the shell clear around. Keeping the air of the egg chamber moist renders the inner linings of the egg-shell easy for the chick to burst through. The greatest danger from overheating comes during the first few days of incubating. It is well to hold the temperature at the level of the tops of the eggs under 103 F. for the first week. I like to keep it at 102. During the third week the animal heat exerts some influence, and 103 will be about right at the upper part of the egg. While the chickens are hatching from the egg, 104 may be registered at the level of the tops of the eggs. In some parts of our country, where incubators are operated at altitudes of several thousand feet, the temperatures may be run a degree higher than I have indicated. At these altitudes, where the air is usually very dry, the matter of extra moisture supply becomes a very important item in successful incubation.

J. H.—Please read answer to D. H. H. Yes, it would be very likely to cause trouble, if the heat took any such flights during the last twenty-four hours.

M. O.—According to your letter, you are feeding correctly, unless they are confined to small yards, in which case they must have green vegetable and animal food. Read the answer to E. T. in this issue. Keep the brood coops and brooder or brooders very clean. Bathe the eyes with boric acid, about a teaspoonful to a glass of water.

L. C.—Please read answer to B. C. and H. F. M. Your hens are on the point of breakdown, which is being caused by heavy and over-stimulating food.

M. J.—The dimensions of the trap nest for which you ask are as follows:

Construction of the New Cornell Trap Nests

The nest is 12 inches wide, 12 inches high, and 20 inches long, inside measurements. Light materials should be used as far as possible. Most poultrymen are likely to neglect cleaning the nests often if they are not light and easy to handle. In building these nests we use for corner posts, white pine ⅞x1¾ inches. The sides, front, rear and bottom pieces are ½ inch pine. The pieces on top are 5-16 inch or heavier. The door or trap is made of ⅞ or 1¾ inch pine. The screen over the opening in the door is what is known as 3x3 mesh galvanized wire cloth. The screen in the back is for ventilation. Galvanized wire cloth can be used for this, but a cheaper screen will answer the purpose if one wishes to use it. The trigger or trip is made from No. 7 wire. For making this, all that is necessary is a piece of wire about two feet long, a woodworker's bench vise, a pair of pliers and a hammer. From the middle of the wire measure four inches each way, place the wire in the vise and bend at right angles at the point marked. From these angles measure one-half inch toward the ends of the wires and bend against right angles. Measure again three-fourths inch towards the ends of the wire and bend at right angles in the opposite direction. From this last angle measure four inches towards the ends of the wire and bend the ends toward the center. The ends should be cut off so that they will measure about one and one-half inches from the last angle. The board with grooved ends is fitted on to the wire to prevent the hens from sitting on the wire. The eye screws which support the wire trip are put in and the wire is then sprung into place. Considerable care must be used in hanging the door or trap, as it must hang level if it is to work properly. The holes for the wire which support the door are bored one-half inch from the top and one-half inch from the front of the post. The galvanized iron on the lower edge of the door is to prevent the edge of the door from

Hens Lay While Moulting

Joe Martin of West Plains, Missouri, writes:

"I would not be without More Eggs If it cost $10.00 a package. It has hurried the moulting for me and all my hens are now laying full capacity."

This great discovery by Mr. Reefer hastens the moult and puts the hens in best possible condition. The use of Reefer's More Egg Tonic right now will repay 100 times in extra eggs. One out of five hens die during the moult (Cornell Bulletin No. 258). Be sure to keep up your hens' vitality with More Eggs Tonic. Don't wait.

Hens Moult Late—Still They Lay Eggs

"Dear Mr. Reefer:
From the 21st of November to the 7th of December my 36 hens have moulted and laid 200 eggs. Your More-Egg Tonic is fine and I will never be without it in my home.
Yours very truly, F. SHAW."

27 Eggs Instead of One

"I began feeding More-Egg Tonic to my flock of hens at a time when I was getting only one egg every day. This was probably due to moulting. Now I am getting 27, which I consider a wonderful record.
E. N. PALMER."

Make Fall Layers Out of Spring Chicks

Make Fall Layers Out of Spring Chickens

"Dear Mr. Reefer:
For the first time since I have been raising poultry I have been able to make my spring hatch lay eggs in the fall. Your More-Egg Tonic is responsible. I would never be without it. HARRY WOLFF."

160 Hens—1500 Eggs

"I have fed two boxes of More-Eggs to my hens and I think they have broken the egg record. I have 160 white Leghorn hens and in exactly 21 days I got 125 dozen eggs.
H. M. PATTON."

Banker Endorses More Eggs

"Sometime ago I got some of your More-Egg and it means MORE EGGS. I am now fully convinced of its utility. I have 14 pullets and 14 hens one year old and the first day in December they layed 11 dozen eggs.
H. F. POHLAND". President Citizens Bank, Ashland, Ore.

More Eggs Paid the Pastor

"I cannot express in words how much I have been benefitted by More-Egg. I have paid my debts, clothed the children in new dresses and that is not all. I paid my pastor his dues. I sold 42½ dozen eggs last week, set 4 dozen, ate some and had 1¼ dozen left.
MRS. LENA McBROOM".
Woodbury, Texas

Big Fat Broilers in 8 Weeks

"Dear Mr. Reefer:
I fed your More-Egg Tonic to my spring chicks. It seemed to work wonders. Ordinarily it has taken me from three to four months to fatten my chicks so I could sell them to the market for broilers. More-Egg is responsible. My chicks grew quicker, were in a very healthy condition and fat. Your More-Egg Tonic enabled me to sell my spring chicks as broilers in eight to ten weeks.

Ah Sam's Stray

By Shirley Cookman Hayes

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IT was a late afternoon of the California August when Old Sam, his stock of vegetables sold out, started home along the main tree-embowered street of the mountain village. He was comfortably reckoning up the probable value of his small store of gold-dust, the day's earnings tied up in his old buckskin bag, when he heard a running staccato of pistol shots from the group of malodorus red-ticketed shanties which composed the village Chinatown Prince questioned with a pair of attentive ears, continuing betimes his quiet, long-limbed stride. The pack-animal in the rear flung his head up sharply, listening. Old Sam spoke to him encouragingly, letting out the lead-rope and giving him a moment to reassure himself. He was young and nervous, but after planting his feet stiffly and giving one or two snorts, he consented to go on, while Sam chirruped to Prince, and marveled at the Chinese and their ways.

A tong war had been in progress for several months. More than one Chinese miner belonging to gangs working the diggings along the river had silently dropped out of sight. Similar reports kept coming in from most of the mountain towns strung along the ridge on both sides. The Chinese were killing one another without compunction, and the Sheriff and his deputies continued unsuccessfully their search for the murderers.

Queer they ain't never willin' to keep the peace, Sam thought. His own attitude toward life was different. Tonight he felt tired and rather lonely, but when he and Prince and the pack-animal had wound back and forth for an hour down the zigzag trail to the river and he could see his own house, like a big bird's nest in its lace-work of roses and climbing vines, perched on the bluff opposite, Old Sam's spirits rose. Over there was the peace of home,—a peace guarded by his two dogs.

When they reached the flat sand of the riverbed, he dismounted and tied the pack-animal's rope to the pommel of Prince's saddle.

"Go 'long!" he rumbled, giving Prince an affectionate slap on the flank. "I'm a-goin' down to the smoke-house for some bacon." The saddle-animal, used to confidences, obeyed, stepping carefully into the water, and Old Sam waited until he heard the wet click of horseshoes against the hidden stones of the river as the horses splashed across, following the ford; then he turned back into the steep trail up the bank. He was powerfully built, with a forceful agility that carried him quickly up the rocky slope towards his "kerridge." This was a tiny suspended box, moved by small wheels rolling on a cable high above the river. Tonight as he neared it, where it hung fastened to a young pine, the weather-beaten lines round his eyes contracted them to narrow slits. There was a shape in his "kerridge"—a shape something like a bundle of mountaineer's blankets set up on end. Old Sam, one hand on the rope, cautiously stepped into the oblong box, peering at the strange object which stirred uneasily under his gaze.

This time he saw its aspect more distinctly. It was that of a small Chinese girl about nine years old; a little girl with a pair of slanting, frightened black eyes in a small face.

"By gum!" he ejaculated. "Who on airth be you?"

There was no answer. Old Sam had had too many dealings with her countrymen to waste any more time in futile questioning. He sat down in the shaking little car, untied the rope, and began his hand-over-hand pull across the river. The bundle opposite continued to eye him solemnly. Half way across, when for a moment he held the box suspended while he rested his arms, he leaned, as usual, over the side and looked down to the pale glimmer of the water below.

The bundle made a move as though to approach. "Look out, honey," he warned. "Don't fall out."

The child spoke for the first time.

"I am no have 'fraid," she answered, very deliberately, and sat up straighter, holding to the sides with smooth little brown hands.

Arrived at the other side, she clambered out first and stood waiting, a queer-enough little figure in her trousers and brass-buttoned blue blouse. Sam secured the "kerridge" and, as he came towards her, she took one hesitating step and slipped one small hand into his big one.

"I am liking you," she announced, with halting spaces between the words, and placidly held onto his hand all the way up the trail to the smoke-house

Two collies were waiting at attention as they stepped up on the rough porch of his dwelling. They sniffed the new guest over with friendly curiosity and wagged their great plumes of tails in a tentative offering of fealty. She placed a timid hand on each. Sam lifted her upon the high porch bench and left her there with a collie on each side, her short, purple-trousered legs dangling contentedly.

As he cut great slices from his home-made bread and fried the bacon for supper, he wondered. The child must have wandered away from the camp of Chinese miners just below. He resolved to go that way and ask, the next morning.

When everything was ready he called to her. There was a gentle thud as she dropped from the bench, and then a light slap, slap of small Chinese shoes on his porch as she appeared in the doorway, accompanied by the dogs.

"What's your name?" he smiled.

"Ah Luen," she answered, and unexpectedly put to him a counter question, in careful syllables: "What am it yours?"

He was somewhat taken aback, but laughed deeply, tossing out of his eyes, as he did so, his heavy locks of iron-gray hair.

"I guess you c'n call me Sam, for short," he chuckled. "Come in now, honey, 'n get some supper."

She looked at him, her black eyes snapping for the first time with merriment.

"All light, Ah Sam; I come."

She became quite gay and talkative over the meal. The two dogs lay down near the door, watching expectantly, but too well trained to beg. She did her best to manipulate the three-pronged fork, strange to her Chinese hands; her host decided to whittle out for her a pair of chopsticks.

When they had finished and the dogs were fed, he returned to the kitchen. Ah Luen had preempted a small three-legged stool, and was gazing round with serious black eyes at the walls hung with pans and kettles, which reflected dull lights from the single small lamp on the shelf.

"What made you want to get into the kerridge, little one?" Old Sam began, rather at a loss.

She stared at him in silence.

"When I found you tonight, where was you a-goin'?"

There was a pause.

"I not am remembering," she answered, very slowly.

"Was you lost, 'in tryin' to get back to your father 'n mother?"

At the word "father" her face unaccountably darkened. "No; I not am want!" she announced, with surprising vigor of tone.

"For the land's sake! You ain't rememberin' where you was a-goin', or wantin' any father, at present writin! Still, I guess," he added, half to himself, "I'd better ask at the Chinese camp."

She caught the import of his last words.

"No, no; not not!" she begged, and straightway burst into a tempest of sobs interspersed with muttered Chinese words, her queer little figure doubled over and rocking back and forth on the three-legged stool.

Old Sam's heart melted at sight of her grief. He strode over and lifted her to his knee.

"There, there, honey," he soothed, "if I'd a' known you was a-goin' to take on so, I wouldn't 've bothered you with questions. Guess you're pretty tired, poor little soul. You just put your little head down there, on my shoulder 'n forget all about it."

She could not stop all at once, but with an evident desire to smother her cries, she buried her flat little brown nose into Old Sam's rough wool shirt, while her body shook. After a little the convulsive shaking of her sobs became less and less frequent; her body a drooping weight in his arms, unaccustomed to such tender burdens, and when he looked down at her face against his shoulder, he saw that the black-flower eyes had long since closed up for the night. Sam rose, tiptoeing across the creeking floor to the one spare room in the front, facing the river, and placed the child very softly in an empty bunk. After wrapping the blankets round her, he stood looking down at her a moment, his rugged face very tender, before he softly closed the door and went back to the kitchen fire.

He thought it probable that she might be the child of some Chinaman already fallen prey to the fighting tongs. As yet, however, he had observed no trace of any struggle on either side of the river near the house. Everything had been peace in the blue haze of mountain-dust; the trails undisturbed, except for the morning tracks of his own horses.

He resolved to give her time to become better acquainted and less afraid; perhaps she might then confide in him voluntarily. It might be several days before she could be transferred to her rightful owners. The thought brought a glow round his heart. He would, of course, in the end have to give her up, but how he wished he could keep her! It would be mighty fine to come home at sundown, after a long day's peddling of vegetables, and see her standing with the dogs on the porch. In fancy, he could already see her small trousered figure waiting for him, and hear her flute-like voice calling out the Chinese mountain-welcome: "Ho loo-oom—ah, Ah Ah Sam!" He could even imagine just the way the thin echoes would float and return from the mountain across the river. Having her there would make a real home out of the big bird's nest he loved. The collies were almost human, but a little girl was rather more so. Perhaps, too, she might not be unwilling to stay. It was evident she had already made friends of the collies, in whose estimate of character Ah Sam had immense faith, and besides the dogs there was the garden and the climbing roses, of which he was justly proud, for had he not carried the soil in basketfuls up the rocky trail all the way from the river?

"Well," he muttered at last with a sigh, knocking out the ashes from his pipe and rising to blow out the light, "I've got no right even thinkin' 'bout it. She's lost, that's plain, 'n what I've got to do's to find her father'n mother."

Before he left, the next morning, he gave the dogs stern orders to guard the house and Ah Luen. They understood and he saw them watching him seriously until the bend of the trail hid them from sight.

At the Chinese camp none of the miners could or would acknowledge having lost a little girl. Old Sam inquired cautiously, in a language incorporating a few words of real Chinese into its pidgin English.

"No savvy," was the same response in various shades of mockery from each yellow workman of the group. Sam was forced to continue on his rounds without finding the owners of his stray. He was hardly sorry. The scattered householders of the mountain mines gave him an even more cordial welcome that day, he thought, although they always appeared glad to see him coming. Today, his kindly, weather-beaten face was lighted with an inward satisfaction which they all noted as they bargained for turnips and carrots, or his fine white potatoes.

The days followed one another into weeks and the weeks into a month of unaccustomed happiness for Ah Sam, for the little girl persisted in the name. No one had come to claim her, and he began to rejoice comfortably in the thought. He had long ago given up attempts at questioning. Gay and confiding, in an ever increasing trustful comradeship, she would lapse into Chinese impenetrability the moment he tried to discover her origin. To make her feel more at home, Ah Sam called into service his small vocabulary of Chinese, augmented by an occasional new word she would shyly venture to teach him, breaking into irrepressible ripples of merriment over his awkward attempts at pronouncing it. They two had become great friends.

One bright Sunday morning they went down to the barn, hand in hand, the dogs following. Ah Sam began to hammer up a loose board or two, torn free by a storm. Ah Luen wandered over to Prince's stall and climbed up to look into the manger under the horse's very nose. All at once she began to shriek excitedly:

"Ah Sam, Ah Sam! Come, heap quick! Mieu got lil' mieu!" By the time he reached the stall, she was already flattening her small body over the manger rail, and desperately fishing for the kittens with the end of her long black queue.

"Jus' you wait a moment, little honey. You'll fall in 'n old Puss'll scratch you. Let me get there." She obediently slid down and stood waiting, her blouse held up to receive the kittens, while Old Sam carefully lifted out Tabby, who was purring triumphantly, opening and shutting her yellow eyes in a sleepy transport of satisfaction.

"How ol' lil' mieu?" she inquired, regarding the kittens with curious and delighted black eyes, as she and Ah Sam, with the two dogs, formed a returning procession to the house.

"'Bout two weeks, I guess. Be you a-goin' to teach them Chinese?" he queried, with assumed anxiety.

She gazed at him with serious eyes, unable to decide whether or not he meant to tease.

"Lil' mieu know Chinese, now," she answered, with half-offended dignity. "Big mieu know, all mieu know," she finished, positively.

Another three weeks went by. One night after supper she suddenly slipped down from her three-legged stool and trotted to the door.

"Look—see, Ah Sam," she said, mysteriously, opening it, and began a strange summons into the dusk in wierd, nasal-voweled Chinese, her flutey voice projecting its tones to float and carry. She paused; the echoes took it up; she repeated it. The echoes, like distant ghost-music, were still returning it, when old Tabby appeared, followed by her three kittens. Ah Luen broke off a small twig from a laurel branch in the wood-box and Tabby entered the doorway with a slow and languorous grace, seated herself in the middle of the kitchen floor and curled her long striped tail round her like a train. The kittens took up stations about her in a sort of semi-circle.

Ah Luen fixed her look with a queer intensity of expression on the kitten nearest the door, and pointed her wand. He returned the gaze as though fascinated, keeping his recently-opened blue eyes on hers, and emitted a little squeaky "mieu." She turned her gaze on the next, pointing the stick. He answered her look and recited his own lesson, perfectly learned. The wand passed on to the third kitten, whose thin little "mieu" was in ludicrous contrast to the deep contralto of his mother's "mia-au-ow," when it came her turn.

Old Sam clapped his hands in hearty delight. At the noise all three kittens scampered out of the open door, followed more leisurely by their mother.

"Well, I guess you was right 'bout the Chinese!" he said. "How long was you a-teachin' them?"

"I show him every day." Ah Luen's eyes sought the floor. "You like him?"

"Well, I should say so! I just 'bout guess they're the smartest little cats this side of the ridge!"

A shy smile crept up the corners of her mouth, but she continued to look down, rather overwhelmed with his praise.

"By gum! I come mighty near forgettin'! Your little cat-school 'most drove it out of my head!" He rose and from a corner of the kitchen took down a bulky newspaper bundle from the shelf.

"See here," he began, watching her exultantly over its top as he began to untie it on the kitchen table. There were three blouses and as many pairs of Chinese trousers, all of fresh blue gingham. He shook them out before her eyes, while she stood by solemnly watching him, unable at first to realize that they were meant for her. All at once she gave a quick gasp, burst into a rapturous babble of Chinese, and flung both arms round his neck.

"Oh, Ah Sam, dear!" she cried. "You a great deal good! I am stay here so very happy!"

"I guess we're both happy." He patted her smooth black head. "Look at this, too." He held up an oblong buckskin bag and made her feel the weight of its contents. "Seems I've made 'nough this season to get a man to help me do a good piece o' gold-washin' afore it gets too cold. Guess I'll go down tomorrow 'n see how the old riffles look."

She flashed at him a strange look half of fear, the smile fading from her face, which took on the inscrutable expression of the Oriental. He felt vaguely disappointed, stared at her a moment in silence and rose to go out to smoke his after-supper pipe on the porch overhanging the river. The brush and trees on the mountain opposite were purplish-green in the soft dusk. Below, where the canyon bent the river's course, the water was caught in eddies round the shoulders of big smooth stones whence it sent up a confused tinkling murmur of voices. From attentive listening Old Sam had figured out the whole human gamut. There were the cries and silver laughter of babies; women's talk; the roar of men's fury. Once in a long while the male voices stopped to listen to the children, or a woman's sweet pleading; but more often these were drowned as though frightened by the deadened bass thunder from the rapids below.

This evening the rugged charm of the mountain somehow failed to hold him; the river-voices he did not even hear. He was worried about Ah Luen and her strange attitude when he had mentioned his intention of remaining at home to work his river sand-bars. He had looked forward eagerly to it; it would put an end to having to leave her alone all day with only the dogs for company.

A horse's sharp squeal, and the dull sound of hoofs pounding against boards of the barn, roused him. Prince was expressing an ancient grudge against the pack-animal. Old Sam rose precipitately and strode off the porch, his one idea being to stop it before they knocked the barn to pieces.

Half trotting down the trail round the house he nearly ran over Ah Luen, just issuing from the kitchen door, her hands full of bread and cold meat. At the unexpected sight of him she started, dropped the food on the rocky ground and stood staring at him helplessly, trembling the while with evident fright.

"What's the matter, little one?" he joked. "Where be you a-goin' with all that bread? If it's for the dogs, you'd better put some gravy on it."

She was silent, and sank down shamefacedly on the kitchen steps, her eyes on the ground. He hurried on down to the trail to the barn, more puzzled than ever.

The next morning as he was pulling himself across the river in the "kerridge," ready to begin work on a river-bar, it occurred to him to take a look at a small empty shack close to the water on the opposite side, almost underneath his set of riffles where they stood high on thin, spidery trestles. Arrived at the other side, he tied up his movable bridge, shouldered his picks and shovels and descended the trail to the river, intending to leave the tools he did not need in the cabin for safe keeping. He walked up and opened the door, casually looking round.

The shack's one room, empty, spoke in half-a-dozen ways of having been recently occupied. There was a piece of Chinese matting stretched tightly across a wide board, and a faint odor, unmistakable to his nostrils, pervaded the place.

"Opium," he mused. "Queer I ain't seen you," he remarked to the residue of his uninvited tenant, and was about to close the door, when he noticed an object on the floor near the improvised bunk. He walked over and took up a piece of crust, crumbling it in his hand. He had made that bread, and more than that, it was still fresh.

Ah Luen and her bundle of food flashed across his mind. Had his Chinese tenant been forcing her to feed him during the long days of his absence? If so, how had the man managed to evade the dogs? The Chinaman's influence must have been a strong one to frighten Ah Luen into silence, Ah Luen, who now began her babbling, happy confidences at the least encouragement—Old Sam made a grimace as his thoughts brought up with a jerk. After all, he had never been able to persuade her to tell him whence she had hailed. His gentle inquiries had produced nothing better than unfathomable silence, or a storm of passionate sobs.

He went on about his preparations for the gold-washing, cleaning out the caked mud from between the riffles, and mounted to the big flume to turn on the water. Returning, he selected a promising piece of pebbly sand near the river and began to feed it in great shovelfuls into the open mouth of the washer. It was some time past noon when he ceased work and began slowly to mount the trail towards his "kerridge." He had crossed the river and was climbing the trail to the house when his eyes caught a quick-moving flash from the mountainside he had just left. The sun was glinting on the rifle-barrels of three black-clad Chinese, who were trotting down the trail, single-file, their wiry, shuffling bodies bent almost double. Old Sam paused, half-concealed as he was, behind the trunk of a cedar and waited until they had splashed through the ford and begun to climb a lower trail leading to a mountain town on his side, several miles above the river.

With the Chinese well out of sight, Ah Sam when close to the house gave the Chinese mountain-call for Ah Luen. The plaintive notes floated across the river-canyon and returned to him, thin and melancholy, from the mountain. The dogs heard, and came bounding out, but for the first time Ah Luen was not with them. The collies, usually self-contained, were whining restlessly, trotting back up the trail and returning to him—proof that something was wrong. Sam took the rest of the trail in leaps, forgetting any weight of years. The house was empty.

He hoped that she might be down in the raspberry patch, or in the stable, holding a conversation with Prince in Chinese. But she could not be found, and after an hour of anguished indecision, he saddled Prince and started up the trail in the track of the mysterious Chinese.

If some Chinaman, hiding from the guns of a fighting tong, had been waiting in the old shack to watch his chance and steal her, well—— He grasped the heavy old-fashioned revolver that hung at his belt, and urged Prince forward.

After a half-hour of steady climbing, he emerged from the narrow trail, walled on both sides by its thick hedge of manzanita, into a clear wagon-road which wound round and up through flattened hills covered with bear-brush, with here and there a scattered pine. Ahead of him, on the left, stood out a clump of thick bushes. As he approached it Prince's ears began to move in sudden alarmed interest. Sam had barely time to note the horse's warning when a dark-clad Chinaman broke out of the brush and fled across the road. He was followed almost instantly by three others in pursuit. There was the crack of a pistol; the first figure dropped; and the three, after turning in alarm evil yellow faces towards the man on horseback, slunk off silently into the brush of a ravine parallel with the road. It was the final tragic act of some highbinder quarrel.

Old Sam dismounted to examine the prostrate body. The man, lying with extended arms in the red dust of the mountain road, was already dead. As Sam bent over him, he heard from behind a muffled cry. He came up from his stooping posture. Ah Luen was stumbling towards him, her clothes dusty and torn; her face, covered with angry red scratches from the rough underbrush, was tracked with tear-stains.

"Ah Sam, Ah Sam!" she sobbed, with a stream of Chinese in which one word, whose meaning he strove to recall, kept recurring. "Come, hully up, Ah Sam, heap quick!" In an agony of fear, she splashed on through the dust and with one last bound of failing strength, fell into his arms, panting. Her own arms flung round his neck almost choked him from the violence of her embrace.

Old Sam's heart was full. Ah Luen was restored to him for a moment; nothing else mattered, though in fancy he saw the three about to rise out of the gulch to claim her. Involuntarily he tightened his arms about the child, pressing her head down on his shoulder to shut out the sight of the body. But she kept struggling to look, repeating, in a transport of horror:

"Hully, Ah Sam, hully up! I go 'long you now, now!" Then would follow the Chinese babble, with its same puzzling word, like a refrain.

All at once a light broke upon him.

"Honey," he began, very tenderly, "which one o' them did you say was your daddy?"

He felt her small body, pressed against him, begin to quiver.

"He lie down, now," she quavered. "Hully, Ah Sam! You wait, he get up!"

"No," he comforted, his heart smiting him while it rejoiced; "don't be skeered, honey, just you shut your eyes a minute."

A quick swing and she was seated upon Prince. Ah Sam turned the horse and held the stirrup for himself. But Prince, used to his practiced leap into the saddle, had, with his master still in mid-air, already pushed forward with long, satisfied strides down the mountain towards home.

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

W. P. M., Worland, Wyo.—In tempering steel the effect is to reduce somewhat the results of previous hardening. The method is to re-heat hardened steel to a temperature lower than red-hot and then cool suddenly. For tempering steel for use in coiled springs about 550 degrees Fahrenheit is the proper temperature to which the steel should be raised in burning charcoal or other special furnace arrangements. The steel is cooled by placing it in a tub of water or oil.

G. S., Indianola, Okla.—Copyright upon songs, stories, etc., which may be sold by the author are generally obtained by the firm doing the publishing, unless in certain cases where the author has the printing done at his own expense and plans to have title of the published product vest in himself. To copyright a song or story will cost you a fee of one dollar. For application forms and further particulars you should address the Register of Copyrights, Library of Congress, Washington, D. C.

A COMFORT LOVER, West Virginia.—As a young woman arriving alone in a strange city where you have no friends, you would do best to go directly to the branch of the Young Women's Christian Association in that city. You can secure accommodations and information there, or the secretary will direct you to investigated places where you can secure proper board and lodging. Do not accept the advice or direction of strangers when arriving at a large city railroad terminal, but secure your necessary addresses and aid from a police officer or other responsible attendant or official. Many large railroad stations have detailed representatives from the Travelers' Aid Society whose duty it is to look out for and help arriving strangers like yourself.

L. L. T., Cameron, Texas.—Any date may be placed upon a violin and we regret that we must tell you this is often done. A flourishing trade seems to be carried on in fraudulent "old violins" of which COMFORT readers seem often to fall victims. Of course there is the barest possibility that your instrument is a genuine Stainer and made in the year 1754, but we regard the possibility as very bare indeed. No one but an expert could pass upon your violin's value, although any music dealer or musician of common sense and intelligence should be able to judge if the instrument was actually made in the year stated.

MRS. A. C. H., Baltimore, Md.—The poem, "Curfew Shall Not Ring Tonight," was almost a fixture in old school readers and we remember it well. It is there you should search for it. We are keeping your address and if any kind COMFORT reader sends in the old verses we will forward them to you.

CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER, Mt. Vernon, Ill.—The origin of the phrase, "to be gyped," that is, to be cheated in a deal or purchase, is supposed to have arisen from the reputation of gypsies as horse dealers. These roadside dwellers, less frequent now, had ways of doctoring up injured or useless animals so that they might be traded off or sold to advantage—that is, to the advantage of the gypsy and not the buyer who was "gyped." The word would be regarded as slang.

T. M. S., Okla.—While we have no particular information injurious to the companies your letter mentions, we can state, as a general rule, that all oil stocks are uncertain and speculative. They are not a proper investment for a widow. Keep your savings nearer home and consult your local bank officials as to investments. Other COMFORT readers please take notice. Prospectus promises are easier to pay than dividends.

C. A. B., Edna, Ind.—See reply to L. L. T., Cameron, Texas, in this issue.

W. D. W., Knoxville, Tenn.—Genuine Strads are very scarce. All are considered to be known to experts who claim that there are but some thirty-odd of these rare violins now remaining in existence. But violins bearing spurious Strad inscriptions are many and we believe your instrument is one of these. No one but an expert could pass upon its true value and age. See reply to L. L. T., Cameron, Texas, in this issue.

MRS. A. W. D., Haskell, Okla.—Roses are one of the most difficult plants to keep free from insect pests. What you call "mold" is a collection of aphis or plant lice. Examination under a magnifying glass will prove this, we think. When the first leaves appear upon your bushes in the spring, begin spraying with a soapsuds solution. If this fails to help, try a spray made from one of the various nicotine commercial solutions which you can obtain from seedmen or hardware stores. Many fail to obtain results with sprays bcause they do not repeat often enough. And in spraying to control any pest, it is the early spray that catches the worm—or bug. After they are well established control is difficult.

MRS. C. P. G., Virginia.—We have never heard of the company you mention and if you have also failed to hear further from them we think you can consider that your share receipt is worthless. But it will have value if it teaches you to not trust savings to "developing companies" who are usually interested in developing the pockets of stock subscribers. We are always sorry to hear of any reader of COMFORT who has been thus victimized. Invest your money near at home where you can know something of the men and methods of the corporations whose shares you hold. It is always best to ask your local bank officials concerning any investment you may be tempted to make. They are interested in seeing you make money. Far off "developing companies" are often only interested in making money for themselves.

MRS. W. H. H., Arthur, Nev.—You should be able to obtain grafting wax from any store dealing in seed supplies or farm implements, or should be able to tell you where you might send to obtain it. We would not know the nearest dealer to your town who might have this wax for sale, although it is not a rare commodity.

MRS. S. E. M., Grey Rock, Wyo.—You are wrong in thinking there are more women in the U. S. than men. The census of 1920 gives the total male population as 53,900,431. The female, 51,810,180. (2) Nature has her own mysterious ways of balancing the proportions of boy and girl babies who are born, in this country and all over the world, so that over a term of years they nearly equalize. If in one year the percentage of female births is excessive, the next year will usually show a percentage of decrease. It has long been a matter of record that after disastrous wars, the afflicted countries who have suffered a large loss of man power are compensated by an excess of males in the birth rate. At the present time the males are in excess in this country by about three per cent. Despite many efforts, scientists have as yet been unable to establish any system of control whereby sex can be determined in advance.

MISS J. S., Texas.—Although beseeched in various ways at various times to take such action, Congress has not yet decreed any "National Flower" for Uncle Sam to wear in his buttonhole.

PATTY-JO, Missouri.—Cherokee means "upland field," and these Indians were upland dwellers. The Cherokees constituted the most important tribe of the eastern U. S. In some far past descent they are connected with their more northern neighbors, the Iroquois. The Cherokees formerly inhabited the mountainous sections of Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama and the Carolinas. In these places they had many well-built villages and raised corn, beans and pumpkins in the rich soils. It was De Soto who first mentions these Indians in 1540, and from that time on your aboriginal ancestors figure largely in the history of the Southern States. During the Revolution they sided with and aided the British, but in 1785 they concluded a treaty with the U. S. Becoming what we choose to term civilized, the Cherokees by 1820 were ready to adopt a constitution and called themselves the Cherokee Nation. Misfortune began to descend upon the tribe through the discovery of the white man's lure—gold—in their lands. Pressure was brought to bear for their removal. In spite of the opposition of almost all of the "Nation," as the tribe was then called, a treaty was made with a small faction. This bound the tribe to remove within three years beyond the Mississippi River. The Cherokees rather naturally chose to repudiate this minority-made document and in 1838 they were removed by force. Several thousands died on the march, but the gold left behind remained uninjured. Since then, by successive acts of Congress, the freedom of the surviving Cherokees has been curtailed until hardly a vestige stands. About 20,000 of the race remain today. In western North Carolina several thousand still dwell—the remnant of those Indians who fled to the mountains and escaped removal. (2) There are many musical Cherokee words of equally melodious meaning. Toccoa means "beautiful." Hiawassee is "pretty flower." Nacoochee signifies "evening star," and Chattahoochee, "flowered rock." These Indian names have been much used in the christening of towns in Georgia and other states that once formed the happy hunting ground of the now vanishing red men. We cannot tell you what "wonota" means. Possibly a Cherokee subscriber can.

MRS. J. L. J., North Carolina.—The present head of the new German Republic is Fredrich Ebert who holds the office of president. (2) The catastrophe known as the Charleston Earthquake occurred on August 31, 1886. The disturbance was felt from central Florida northward to southern New England and affected an area 800 miles wide by 1,000 north and south. We are glad you find COMFORT helpful.

Large Food Value of Peanuts

Peanuts are high in food value, says the United States Department of Agriculture, but there is no foundation for the recently circulated report that peanuts promote the growth of hair. Investigation carried on in the Bureau of Chemistry with regard to the chemical and nutritive properties of the proteins of the peanut have demonstrated that, aside from the oil, which is easily digested and which furnishes a large amount of fuel or energy, the shelled peanut contains about 20 per cent. of protein of a high nutritional quality. Peanut protein is rich in the amino acids which are lacking in the proteins of corn and grain, and for that reason peanuts are an excellent supplement to a cereal diet.

wearing off. This nest can be built in series if desired, and it can be put under the dropping boards or on the walls of the house. When the nests are placed on the wall, a sloping cover should be put above them to prevent the hens from roosting on the nests. To make it convenient for the hens to reach the nests, a board four inches wide should be placed along the front of the nests. Care must be taken that the board is not placed too high. The upper side of the board should be at least two inches below the opening into the nest, and a space of two and one-half inches left between the board and the front of the nest. For nesting material use planer shavings, sawdust or similar fine material. Long hay or straw may eventually get piled up in such a manner as to interfere with the action of the trigger. To remove the hen, simply turn the screw hook and swing the door outward; or, if you prefer, turn down the point of the trigger and swing the door backward toward the top of the nest, thus permitting the bird to come out that way. Of course, the nest may be set in a partition with a back door through which the hen may be removed. If the poultryman cannot attend to his trap nests except at noon and at evening, he may arrange rear doors like the front doors of the nests. The hens can thus, after laying, push their way through the rear doors into little yards of the width of the nests and several feet in length. Here litter and small grains may be scattered to keep the hens busy until they can be released.

W. C.—Feather pulling is a bad habit. Give the birds free range if you can. If not, feed small grain in deep litter, so that the birds are kept busy most of the time scratchng for their food. Nail up a piece of salt pork or bacon rind in the chicken house for the birds to pick at, and smear the feathers around the places where they have been picking with bitter aloes.

S. G.—The hens need lime and grit, probably. If they are on free range, dump a supply of coal ashes on the ground near the chicken house. If confined, put a pan in their yard, filled with ashes, air slaked lime or oyster shell, and another pan full of sharp grit.

V. N.—Nothing for thirty-six hours; then hard-boiled egg, chopped fine, shell and all, and sour milk to drink. Give only a pinch at a time, and feed at least five times a day for a week, and then you can go to chick feed and one mash a day, either egg or mixed grain, with a little animal meal added, and sour milk all the time.

Each article or object can be given only one name. Single words made up of two separate words or objects, such as teaspoon, teapot, or teatime will not count. Webster's International Dictionary will be the final authority. Where several synonyms are equally applicable to an object shown in the picture, a person submitting any one of such synonyms will be given credit for one word only.

5—The largest list of words which correctly name visible objects beginning with the letter "R" will receive first prize, and so on down the list of 105 prizes. They will judge the answers submitted and award the prizes at the end of the contest. All answers will receive full consideration, whether or not merchandise is purchased. At the close of the contest, when all lists have been graded, the list winning first prize and the names of the prize winners will be published, and a copy of such list and prize winners' names and addresses will be sent upon request to any participant who sends us a self-addressed, stamped envelope.

Egg Records Smashed by Hens Fed Vitamines

New Discovery of Science Makes It Easy for Every Poultry Raiser to Double His Profits.

EGG records are being smashed by common, ordinary hens that were not worth their feed a short time ago. A series of experiments, made with 90 hens, at an Indiana Experimental Station, increased the yearly average from 57 to 189 eggs per hen. This three-for-one increase was accomplished merely by giving feed enriched by properly blended Vitamines.

Listen to this: A California man who had raised poultry for 45 years had this experience; By giving his hens food containing the proper amount of vitamines he secured a 70% increase in only 20 days. Just think of that.

Science has proved that you MUST feed vitamines to your chickens in order to get all the eggs your hens can lay. Ordinary feeds contain so little of these vital elements that it is no wonder that the average hen lays less than half the eggs she ought to lay. But now Science has made it easy for you to supply your hens with these vitamines. Furthermore, you supply them in the exact proportions necessary to produce the largest number of eggs per hen.

How to Feed Vitamines

There are three of these vitamines and all three are needed. To get them all in the proper proportions which should at once increase the egg-laying powers of your hens use "Tablated Vitamines for Poultry." These wonderful tablets not only help produce more eggs but also help develop your pullets so that they reach the egg-laying period very early.

Make up your mind that you are going to get a yearly average of at least 189 eggs per hen. Try to make 200-egg layers of some of your hens. By using "Tablated Vitamines for Poultry" you keep your hens in prime condition and quickly give them egg-laying powers greater than you ever thought possible.

He laid his hand on Ralph's arm, and the young man felt it tremble with the emotion which thrilled him.

"Come with me," he said, in a low, earnest voice, "where we can be by ourselves, and I will talk this matter over with you. There has been a terrible mistake, and my two names have been the cause of it all. I loved Star Gladstone devotedly; I love her today. I have done her no wrong, as I will explain to you, and nothing would have kept me from her side if she had not hid herself from me. Come."

He linked his arm familiarly within Ralph's, and drew him from the room to a small antechamber leading from the hall, and shut the door, while the young man was dumb with astonishment at what he heard, and began to feel as if he had got himself into a very unpleasant predicament by his rashness.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

MUTUAL EXPLANATIONS.

"Have I made a mistake? Have I wronged you?" Ralph Meredith asked, when the door was shut, while he gazed blankly at his companion, and feeling convinced in his heart that no man could show the emotion which Lord Carrol manifested at the mention of Star, and wilfully betray her.

"If I were not confident that you had made a mistake," his lordship returned, drawing himself up with dignity, though he was still very pale and deeply agitated—"if I did not believe that you share in the misunderstanding which has been the cause of all Miss Gladstone's trouble and my own exceeding sorrow, I could not pass lightly over the disparaging imputation which you have cast upon me tonight. I am no traitor, Mr. Meredith. I have never willingly wronged Miss Gladstone, for I have loved her, and I do love her today, with a deathless love. My plurality of names, as I have told you before," he went on, with a wan smile, "has been the cause of it all; and if Star has unconsciously been made a victim on account of it, I also have suffered in no small degree. Sit down, Mr. Meredith, and let me tell you all about it;" and he motioned him to a chair.

"Not until I have apologized for my rash words to you, my lord," Ralph said, in a manly, straightforward way, and, advancing to him, convinced now of his honor, and that he had never intended Star even a thought of harm. "Miss Gladstone," he continued, "confided the story of her grief to me only a short time before I sailed for Europe, although she did not enter into particulars very minutely. I think she had not the slightest idea that I should ever meet you, but I had made up my mind at the time that if I ever did come in contact with 'Archibald Sherbrooke,' which was the only name by which she designated you, that I should make him answer for the wrong which I believed he had done her. I saw you today with a lady in the chapel of Henry the Seventh, at Westminster Abbey. I heard her call you by the name that I remembered only too well, and was convinced I had found Miss Gladstone's recreant knight. I resolved at once to remain in London beyond the time I had originally intended, look you up, and call you to account for what you had done. You were at the concert in the Albert Hall this evening, but I had no thought of meeting you when I came hither, at the invitation of my friend Alden. You can imagine, perhaps, something of the shock which I experienced when he introduced you as Lord Carrol. This will explain why I refused your hand, and why I addressed you in the way I did."

"I cannot blame you in the least, under the circumstances," Lord Carrol returned, smiling.

"Your words, however," Ralph went on, "regarding the young lady in question, convince me that you are entirely guiltless, and have been as great a sufferer from an unfortunate misunderstanding as herself. I trust you will accept my explanation, and also my hand with it," he concluded, extending his hand to the young peer.

Lord Carrol grasped and shook it warmly.

"I have no right to harbor any ill will toward you for espousing so gallantly the cause of one who is very dear to me," he said, cordially; "and perhaps, after all, this meeting, which at first promised to end in a stormy manner, may be the means of restoring happiness to two very unhappy people."

"I feel assured that such will be the case," Ralph answered, but there was a keen pain in his heart, notwithstanding.

He gave Lord Carrol a history of Star's life during the last year, telling him of her success as a young authoress, and of the happy change in her worldly circumstances as the acknowledged ward and heiress of Jacob Rosevelt, the millionaire. He spoke also of the admiration which her grace and beauty had excited during the past season at Newport.

"I am glad," Archibald Sherbrooke said, earnestly, and his lip trembled as he spoke,—"that her life has been made so much brighter during the past year, and I shall always be grateful to Mr. Rosevelt for his kindness; and yet I am almost selfish enough to wish that I could have been the one to raise her to a more congenial sphere. I shall go to the United States at once. I must seek her and set myself right with her as soon as possible. Will you be so good as to give me Mr. Rosevelt's address?"

"With pleasure," Ralph responded; but you will not find them in New York just at present for they, with my sister—who is a very intimate friend of Miss Gladstone's—are traveling in the far West, and will not return under three or four months."

Lord Carrol looked thoughtful and disappointed at this intelligence.

"I must wait, then," he said, with a sigh, "until their return. The time will seem very long, although I am greatly needed here just now, and it would be much to my own disadvantage were I to leave before my affairs are in a more settled state; but I should let no pecuniary consideration deter me from going to Star if I were sure I should find her. However, I must submit to the inevitable; and now, Mr. Meredith," he concluded, with a genial smile, "what can I do to make your stay in our city pleasant? I am at your disposal for any length of time."

"Thank you, my lord. My business will not permit my tarrying much longer just now; but I intend to return to London in the course of three or four months, and shall hope to meet you again then," Ralph answered.

"I shall most certainly see to it that we do meet again," Lord Carrol returned; "and now, if you have no engagement for tomorrow, will you do me the honor to dine with me?"

"It will give me great pleasure to do so. I have no other engagement," Mr. Meredith returned.

He was growing to admire Star Gladstone's handsome lover exceedingly, notwithstanding the fact that he was his own rival.

"Thanks. Now come with me and let me introduce you to my mother and sister, who are both her at Stamfield House; and, Mr. Meredith," the young lord added, grasping his hand again, and speaking with emotion, "I cannot be sufficiently grateful to you, for you have put new life and hope into my heart tonight."

CHAPTER XXXV.

MRS. RICHARDS' GREAT EXPECTATIONS.

The following day Mr. Meredith, according to his promise, went to dine with Lord Carrol at his mother's elegant mansion, near Belgrave Square.

After the meal was over, and the other guests comfortably disposed of, Archie took his friend up into the "sanctum," as he called it, for a smoke and quiet talk.

If Lord Carrol suspected anything of the feeling which Ralph had entertained for Star, he gave no sign, but confided to him, as they sat there together, more of his hopes and plans for the future, and spoke with much more of freedom regarding Star than he had done the day before.

When they had finished their cigars, Lord Carrol arose and said:

"Come inside, Mr. Meredith, and I will show you one of my treasures."

He went back into his "sanctum," followed by Ralph, and passing by all the beautiful paintings, drawings and engravings which hung upon the walls, he walked to an easel which stood in a corner, and, removing a cloth that covered it, stepped back for his friend to look.

Ralph Meredith gave one look, and then exclaimed, in unfeigned surprise:

"Star!"

"Yes, it is Star," Lord Carrol said, with a tender smile as he looked upon the portrait. "I am glad you recognize her, for I should be sorry if she had changed so much that you could not. This is a picture which I love, and which I keep for myself alone. It is very seldom that I show it to any one, and I have never told its history to any living being until I told it to you last night. As she stood there that morning in her modest beauty, severing that tress at my request, I began to love her with a love that will never die while I live. I have that little lock of gold here now, Mr. Meredith," he said, touching the diamond-studded locket which hung from his watch chain, "and untold wealth could not purchase it from me. Here is the cameo also which I gave her in exchange, and of which I told you, too, last night," and he held up his left hand, on the little finger of which gleamed the ring that Josephine Richards had made of it. "Ah, he added, with a sigh, "it is hard to think that she could believe me so false—so treacherous and cowardly, as to win her love and then cast it aside as of no value."

"Yet it was very natural for her to think so, under the circumstances," Ralph returned, thoughtfully.

"I suppose it is not strange; but, oh! if she would but have given me one minute, I could have convinced her of her mistake, and all the sorrow that has followed might have been avoided," sighed the young lord, as, with another fond glance at the picture, he covered it again and turned away.

"You will be more successful when you go to her again," Ralph said, cheerfully.

"Yes," Archie returned, with firmly-compressed lips, "Miss Gladstone will listen to me when I go to her again. It is but right that she should hear my justification, whether she receives it favorably or otherwise."

"I have no fear of the result," his guest returned, smiling; "for Miss Gladstone acknowledged to me that, in spite of her belief in your unworthiness, her affection for you remained the same."

A flush of joy shot over Lord Carrol's face at this.

"Did she tell you that?" he asked, eagerly. "Then I will doubt no more; and I have you to thank for bestowing such happiness upon me as I never expected to know again."

They spent half an hour longer looking at other pictures, then, seeking the fair Vivien's side, Ralph Meredith spent a most delightful evening, the memory of which clung to him for many a week afterward.

The next morning he left London for a three months' tour through Scotland, Ireland and the Continent.

* * * * * * *

Mrs. Richards sat in her handsome boudoir one morning a few weeks later, reading a newspaper.

Something had evidently gone wrong with her, for her face was overcast, an angry red glowed in her cheeks, and her eyes gleamed with a sullen fire.

The reason for this was the flat refusal, on the part of Mr. Richards, to accede to her immoderate demand for five hundred dollars, to purchase for herself and Josephine new dresses for the coming winter, and she had just returned to her room after the stormy interview.

"I cannot let you have a dollar," he had said, with a gravity almost amounting to sternness, "for I haven't it to spare."

"Not a dollar, George!" she retorted, with a scornful laugh. "Whoever heard of anything so absurd?"

"It is true, nevertheless," he answered, gloomily. "Two months ago I expected that today would find us all beggars."

"What do you mean?" his wife gasped.

"Just what I say; and but for the appearance of a friendly hand just when and where I least expected it, I should have been obliged to fail, overwhelmed with debt and disgrace, and everything we have—house, furniture, horses and carriages—would all have had to come under the hammer of the auctioneer."

"I cannot believe it," Mrs. Richards said, growing pale.

"That does not alter the fact, however," her husband replied, laconically.

"Why did you not tell me?"

"I did tell you. I kept writing to you when you were at Newport, Ellen, that I could not long endure such a drain upon my purse as you were subjecting it to, and that you must curtail your expenses; but you paid no heed to me, launching instead into greater extravagances."

"But I never dreamed that things were so serious as you represented," she said, a guilty flush mounting to her forehead, as she remembered

I am twenty-four years old, black hair and black eyes, five feet, four inches tall and weigh one hundred and thirty pounds. I have been married seven years, have no children but one of the best of husbands.

I hope some of the sisters will write to me.

MRS. GEORGE MANIS.

ARTHUR, NEBRASKA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

The many letters are so interesting and contain so many good ideas that I, for one, always enjoy reading them. May I try to return the many favors I have received by offering a few ideas to those who are interested in earning money at home?

I have saved clippings on this subject, but a neighbor gave me a new one the other day that may be as new to others. She has been raising sheep for several years, selling lambs and old stock for meat. But the new idea—she took some of the latest cut off wool, and after many washings, carefully carded it and offered it in three pound lots as filling for comfortables, at $1.00 per pound. She also tied the wool into cheesecloth for a dollar extra.

Another friend who wanted to make a gift for a little boy, that was just a little different, made a quilt for his crib, using pages from washable linen books, set together with alternate blocks of unbleached muslin. His little friends all wanted one like it and so far she has had all the orders she could fill.

How many boys and girls that live near the woods know that the pine needles sell for a good price? And baskets can be woven of so many, many different materials to be had just for the gathering, and sell readily to city folks, especially when filled with home-made confections, such as candies, cakes and apples. Or filled with dainty little ferns are a delight to those not privileged to be out in the woods.

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the sisters,

Yours very truly, MRS. JESSIE R. TILLINGHAST.

Mrs. Tillinghast.—Your suggestions are very good. Come again with more.—Ed.

STUDA, PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I note your request that I send the catarrh remedy mentioned in MAY COMFORT to you for publication. I would have sent it before but didn't get my Comfort until late and will thank you very much because I have so many letters I cannot answer all for some time. Their number is close to 900 now. Many request an immediate answer but that is out of the question. As many as 63 or 78 and once 86 in a day and that is more than "Oliver" and I can both answer. If you print it the writers will get their answer sooner than I can get to their letters. I will answer all that have come.

Now for the main part of my letter. At night and in the morning I washed throat and nose with warm salt water. But don't make the mistake of using it too strong at first as this only irritates instead of heal. Begin with weak solution and increase in strength then put a bit of mentholatum in each nostril.

At mealtime I ate a piece of plain vaseline about pea size until I became accustomed to the taste then increased to hickory nut size.

Plenty of fresh fruits and vegetables in season, fresh air day and night; summer and winter, Bedroom window always open. And lots of water, both hot and cold, outside and in.

Someone has said we need water "externally, internally and eternally." They were right.

That good friend salt water has a thousand uses. Watch and see how many things you can use it for. To stop falling hair is only one of them; to cure poison ivy rash is another.

This will give the friends a chance to start if they wish or wait for a more detailed explanation in my letter to them.

Many ask if they can return the favor. Nothing is expected. "Freely we have received; freely we give." Our duty is to help the poor "groaning creation" in whatever way we can.

I would like to hear from some brother who was a member of the "12th Aero Squadron" while over seas. I have learned that many of the brethren read the Sisters' Corner and thought perhaps someone of that outfit may be a reader. I think most of them were Western boys. Or if any of you know the address of some of them please send it to me.

Will tell you how to make a homemade shower bath then I will leave. After being accustomed to it one misses a shower when in the country where they do not happen to have running water in the house. Just take the little clothes sprinkler to be bought in any five- and ten-cent store and after removing the hard rubber pipe from a fountain syringe put the sprinkler on the hose and your shower is ready. Of course after you put the water in. It's no trouble to put together and take apart.

Good night. Love to you all.

MISS I. L. EMLEN.

EL PASO, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a subscriber of COMFORT for some time and have enjoyed reading it as well as the Sisters' Corner. I have found the sisters' letters particularly interesting, and this is the first time I have ever written.

Foreigners, what does Wild Rose think she is? Were her ancestors Indians? They are the only true Americans of which I know. I don't think the foreigner is worse than the Wild Rose. She seems to be from the Wild Mountains.

Foreigners, indeed! We are all foreigners, that is if we are from the Old World. Perhaps her ancestors are from the New World. Who knows?

I wonder if Wild Rose thinks that there are too many marriages between the Wild Roses and the Foreigners, especially among the working people and the middle classes. I hope she didn't marry a foreigner herself.

This is my opinion of our American girls marrying foreigners. What is yours?

A FOREIGN.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

I have found this successful in killing flies without using poison, so dangerous to use when there are children in the home. Fill a dish with syrup and leave where the most flies are and you will soon have more flies prisoner than would be killed by poison. Be sure the dish is full so as to give no resting place for the flies.—MISS LILLIAN STENSBY, Cheyenne, N. Dak.

Always put the sugar used in a pie in the center of the fruit, not at the top, as this makes the crust sodden.

When filling cake pans let the mixture come well to the sides of the pan, leaving a slight depression in the center. The cake will then be level when baked.

Cover the skin lightly with glycerine before applying a poultice and it will not adhere.—MRS. LIZZIE LAWLEY, West Frankfort, Ill.

Keep chips, cobs and splinters soaking in a small bucket of coal oil and you will have no trouble in starting the fire.—JEANNE, Bearden, Ark.

To remove iodine from fabrics: Wet the spots with gasolene and wet in suds as usual.

To boil cracked eggs: Add a little vinegar to the water. This will prevent the whites from boiling out.

For cleaning screen doors: Dip a stiff brush in kerosene and go over the door. It will look like new.

Put several layers of newspapers under the tablecloth and when liquids are spilled the moisture is absorbed by the paper and stains come out more readily.

For a floor oil, boil some used motor oil and when cool add a little turpentine. Polish with old woolen socks.

Make underwaists for the children out of empty sugar sacks. Put strong tabs on the sides for the supporters and when washing them starch them slightly and they will wash easier.

Checked gingham edged with colored or white rick-rack braid makes attractive curtains for the kitchen.

Pad your comforters with old blankets. They are warm and wash easily.

Use a little bluing in the water you use for window washing. It makes them clearer.—MRS. HARRIET B. SCHADE, Beaver Falls, Pa.

Remedies

If you have corns, quarter an onion and soak in strong vinegar until pickled. Bind fresh piece to corn for three nights and it will remove the soreness and the corn.

For boils, nail wounds or inflammation of any kind make a poultice by stirring buttermilk and flour to a very thick batter, cover cloth with this and bind to inflamed part. I have used a little paregoric in it for bone felons.—JEANNE, Bearden, Ark.

Mash common garden beets to a pulp and apply cold to blood poisoning which will quickly effect a cure. Also if blood poisoning should be drawn to a head in order to lance, there is no better remedy for this than common wormwood (Jerusalem oak) made into a tea with cornmeal added to form a thick paste. Apply a generous poultice of this warm, to affected part and replace when cold.—MRS. GLADYS EVERLY, Cassville, Missouri.

COTTON SEED SALVE FOR BURNS.—One pint of cotton seed parched real brown then beaten to a powder and fried out in lard or fresh butter. Then strain through a cloth and put away for use. Put on a burn and tie up so the air is excluded. It stops the pain almost instantly. I used it for my babies and am now using it for my grandchildren.—MRS. DORA V. RUSSELL, Rowden, Texas.

CHAFING.—I find that powdered bismuth will heal chafing on baby in a few hours. Sprinkle on cloth or powder puff, have all parts dry, and dust lightly.—MRS. H. GRISWOLD, Oakville, Wash.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

GIRLS, this extremely hot weather is slowly but surely melting me, and instead of resembling two nice fat, friendly parentheses "()" I'm beginning to look more like a very thin letter "l." Wouldn't it be an awful thing if I should lose the good nature that belongs to fat people? But if I do I won't be cross to the girls who write to me. If I must be disagreeable I'll pick on the person who rings my doorbell by mistake after I've gotten nicely to sleep, or the careless automobile driver who splashes my white dress with muddy water, or the well-meaning person who tells me what I want to do. There are others but no more capital "I's" in the linotype machine and I positively refuse to be indicated by a small "i"—unless it's a red one. Now for the letters:

PEARL, Montana.—Your letter didn't get the personal answer you requested for I knew if a certain young lady of Montana had made up her mind to become better acquainted with a certain young man, they were already the best of friends. Montana girls are quick workers, I'll bet. If I had answered personally I'd probably been conservative and told you to wait until he showed that he wanted to become better acquainted with you, but if he was worth knowing better he was worth going after, I suppose, and inviting him to join your Sunday School class was a good, moral beginning.

There was a pretty young girl of Montana
Who carried a Sunday School banner.
She brought new members to class,
That ambitious lass—
Only pretty girls can save souls in this manner.

I hope you weren't disappointed after knowing him better. It is much nicer to think we'd like certain people than to meet them and find we don't care for them at all.

JANE, La.—I haven't the slightest way of knowing whether he cares as much for you now as he did when he asked you to marry him. That's something you'll have to find out for yourself, only don't drift on two years longer before finding out.

RED-HEADED TEXAN.—There was nothing in your letter to cause him to feel hurt or offended. Forget him. He isn't worth winning. If he had been worth while don't you suppose his first wife would have hung onto him instead of divorcing him?

BAFFLED, Utah.—To be popular with "everyone" would be the most tiresome thing in the world. There's no set rule for being popular, and a girl's popularity depends more upon her good nature rather than her good looks. Look around you at the most popular girls you know and study the secret of their popularity. Nine times out of ten they are not the best looking ones or the best talkers. Chances are they are the kindest and jolliest and the best listeners. Try being popular with a few people at first and gradually increase the number if you still feel that you want to be popular with everyone.

NOBODY'S SWEETHEART, Ga.—See answer to Baffled, Utah. (2) I should think it would be all right to sign love songs though some of the present day songs are silly things.

MILDRED, La.—It is only natural that you should wish to be friends with all the boys and it would be unwise to confine yourself entirely to one. He is fair enough in promising to give up all other girls and if you were older and cared more for him I'd say he had the right idea, but at sixteen you shouldn't commit yourself to a promise you may not feel like keeping later on. Maybe he has known so many girls that he is glad to give them all up, but he shouldn't object because you want to know a few more boys. That's the trouble with men, they sow a wonderful crop of thick, wild oats and then begrudge a woman one little weak wild oat.

S. B., Ind.—It has been proven that tobacco is injurious to the health. Lots of smart men smoke cigarettes but I contend that they were smart men first and cigarette smokers later. If your sweetheart didn't have will power enough to stop smoking he wouldn't have made much of a husband. On the whole, you are better off at school. A good education is much better than a poor husband.

LOVESICK, N. C.—If I were thirty and very much in love with a youth of twenty-three I suppose I'd be fool enough to marry him, provided he cared as much for me but that doesn't mean that I'm advising you to do it. It all depends upon yourselves. I'd about as soon be made unhappy by a young man as an older one.

BLONDIE, Mich.—If there isn't a teacher of dancing in your community go to a girl friend, or boy, and ask her or him to give you lessons, always, of course, with the permission of your mother. But don't take dancing seriously for a while yet for you'll need all your energies for your studies. I do like to do this work, truly.

BLUE EYES, Ind.—The boy who drank moonshine because you refused him must certainly love you. Greater love hath no man than he who drinketh hooch—or else he's a plain durn fool. Either way, you'd better forgive him, seeing as how he has repented and joined the church. You wouldn't be showing a very Christian spirit if you didn't. I've found out why so many Christians have such a beautiful, shining Christian spirit all the time—they use it only on Sunday. For week days they have an old, uncharitable, faded out spirit that they use. Yes'm, somebody's dog bit me.

CHARLEMAGNE, La.—Of all the cuckoo letters, yours was the cuckooest. Indeed I won't pray that your parents allow you to have a beau. I've got more important things to pray about. And you write so nicely, too! One would really think you had brains.

MRS. G. W., Texas.—If I could truthfully give you any encouragement I'd be very glad to do so, but the short-story road is a hard one to travel. If you ever wrote to an "Edator" that you were the mother of "to" children and that you were sending him a "tipe" written story—he'd throw a fit, most likely. I don't want to hurt your feelings but I'm sure you do lots of things much better than you spell. Look around you and see what there is need of and what you can do well and easily and do it. If it is cooking, make good things and charge a good price, rather than sell something not so good at a lower price.

BLUE EYES, Mo.—It may be that he is careless rather than stingy. Why not talk to him (don't write it in a letter) and tell him how you feel—that knowing he thought of you meant more than the money value of any present he could ever give you. Tell it in a nice way so as not to hurt his feelings. He is probably just careless but that's a bad quality for a husband to have.

FRENCHIE.—If I "kinda" liked a nice boy and my mother didn't want me to go with him, I'd say to myself, "Mother knows best," and I wouldn't go with him. That's what I would do and that's what you had better do.

ADA, Ga.—Goodness me, Ada, if your father won't buy you any clothes I should think you'd want to stay home. You are liable to be arrested if you don't. Seriously, I am sorry you do not have a happier life but think how much worse you would feel if it were your mother instead of your father who was unkind to you. Tell your girl friends why you can't visit them and I think you'll find them willing to visit you, and your mother, for you should include her in such pleasures as come your way. Really, she is more to be pitied than you are for she's known your father much longer than you have. Just because he is unkind doesn't mean that all men are, but enough are so that a girl should not marry hastily. Did you every try being very nice to your father, sort of kidding him into thinking he is a wonderful father, and all that sort of thing? It might be worth trying. Perhaps he feels that you care more for your mother than you do for him and his unkindness may be a form of jealousy. Be very nice to him and see what happens. Ask him to take you and your mother to "preachings" and "singings" and tell him he is the best bass singer in the community. Men love to be complimented, just as much as women.

BROWN-EYED JANE, Texas.—Find out why your father objects to the young man. Maybe you'll want to stay single then. If his objection isn't serious, marry him, but wait a year or two just to be sure.

DISTRESSED, Ill.—If you haven't backbone enough to stop caring for him when his actions prove that he doesn't care for you, then I can't give you any of mine. In fact, my backbone is in constant use.

GERTRUDE, Texas.—I don't know much about divorces but it seems it should have been an easy matter for him to have gotten copies of his divorce papers to have shown you. There would be less unhappiness if all girls would take the precaution you did. If he cared very much for you he would come back.

BESSIE, Colo.—Ask your teacher about the different grades.

Be good and have a good time.

COUSIN MARION.

The Old Clothes Problem of the Rich

By Frances L. Garside.

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"WHAT," I asked of a multi-millionaire's wife, "do you do with your old clothes?"

It was a question apparently without point, for wives of multi-millionaires never have old clothes. But it was a question that every woman, consciously or unconsciously, asks when she reads of the priceless gowns worn by the wealthy.

"What do I do with my old clothes?" she replied; "I do not have what are really old clothes, but I dispose of all that I no longer care for in various ways.

"We are denied one avenue open to those who do not spend so much on dresses; that of giving to our maids. For instance, I have a pale blue velvet evening dress that I have appeared in several times this season. Suppose I gave it to my scullery maid. Can you imagine her trailing down to light the fires in the morning wearing that gown? Or, can you picture the pantry girl in a white silk trimmed with jet beads? Yet I have both dresses right now that I would give to these girls and give gladly, if they could make use of them.

"But as they can't, I will donate them to some Jumble-In sale. A Jumble-In sale is a way of disposing of cast-off garments that attracts many donations from the wealthy and those who follow the stage for a profession. These clothes are bought by second-hand dealers, and what they bring is turned over to some worthy charity.

"I do not doubt that often, in the hands of some clever seamstress they appear looking prettier than when new. I recall on one occasion an old rose satin that I wore a few times. It was a gorgeous affair, but I did not like it, and I donated it to a Jumble-In. It was a garment I had bought in Paris, and I had never seen the exact shade in any store in this country, and you know shopping is my pastime.

"A few weeks after I had sold it I saw it worn by a young girl at a dance. I inquired her name, and found that she had arrived only the day before from Chicago. I grew interested, sought her acquaintance, and remarked to her that I had never seen such a beautiful shade and texture before. She very ingenuously told me that her mother bought it of a second-hand dealer in Chicago, and made it over for her. Perhaps it was her freshness, her youth, her beauty; I do not know what, but the dress looked prettier than when I had worn it. She added that it cost her mother seventy-five dollars. I refrained from saying that she got a bargain, for it had cost me over ten times that amount. Growing more interested, I inquired at the Jumble-In, and found that it had been sold to the second-hand man for thirty dollars, so he made a big profit on it.

"On another occasion, I sold a white satin trimmed with a peculiar pattern of beaded lace. I originated the pattern, and had it made to order so that I could not be mistaken when, after selling the dress direct to a second-hand dealer I saw it on one of my best friends. She sat in the box next to mine one night at Grand Opera. I asked her where she got her handsome gown, and she replied that she bought it in London.

"Do you know that I admired her for her economy when I saw that she had it on, but my admiration was lost when she made that reply. Not that I blame her, for I might have evaded the truth under similar circumstances.

"I have four children; their clothes go direct to a church society that makes a business of collecting cast-off clothing and making it over for the poor. As I dress my children very plainly, there is nothing incongruous in one of their gowns falling to a child living in a tenement. I think you will find, if you investigate, that all the wealthy dress their children plainly. It is the middle class who seek to make little fashion figures of the children with an over-abundance of embroideries and fussing and feathers. Of course, it is not pertinent to the subject, but we also have our children live simpler. My children—the oldest is seven—never have meat or cakes. Oatmeal, milk, vegetables and fruits comprise their diet, and my boy, who is the oldest, never saw a buckwheat cake till he went home last fall with his governess. Her nephews, all younger than my son, have them every morning, soaked with butter and syrup. My boy also tasted his first sausage there, and came home feeling that we had never fed him well."

Her private secretary took me to the third floor of the house and into a large room that seemed at first to be hung with ghosts, row upon row of them, perhaps a hundred all told. I found that every ghost was one of Madam's gowns wrapped in soft white silk as a protection. Another room was devoted to her furs, the latest addition costing fifty thousand dollars, and from there I was escorted to a room lined with glass shelves, and on every shelf there rested a hat, all that season's, and every hat the perfection in taste and representing what would be the average wage earner's monthly salary. There was another room devoted to shoes, and the disposal of these articles proved as interesting as that of the dresses, for every shoe is given away.

"Madam," said the secretary, "has a very narrow foot and a very high instep. It was part of my work three years ago to compile a list of women in moderate circumstances whose feet were like hers. There are seventy-three on the list, and it includes women in all the eastern states. Every month I send shoes to them, and as it is not advisable to send one woman a dress shoe this month, and a dress shoe next, when a street shoe is needed, I keep books on them.

"Madam is very generous. I have been with her nine years and in all that time I have never known her to turn down an appeal for aid. I know there are thousands of women who envy her her handsome clothes. I know whereof I speak when I say her clothes are a task to her, and that she would be happier if she had only a few garments. She feels that she has to appear at her best; her husband demands it, but she dislikes the whole proceeding so much that I have known her to beg her husband not to insist on more new dresses for her, and on several occasions she has taken goods to her dressmaker, and then, losing interest, has forgotten they are there.

"It is not a big heart, nor a big mind, that can find contentment in a new feather or a piece of lace. 'It is handsome,' said Madam one day when we spread out for her inspection a dress costing several thousand dollars, and which her husband had ordered from Paris; 'It is handsome, but it is not satisfying. Fine clothes never are.'"

Complete Crochet Outfit Given

THIS offer is for the woman and girl who "loves her crocheting" and insists upon having the best of everything to work with. In this outfit we give you any desired quantity of Dexter Cordonnette "Silko" crochet and tatting cotton, and three of the highest grade crochet needles There is no better crochet and tatting cotton than Dexter "Silko"—a fact already known to thousands of our women readers. It is made of the best Sea Island cotton with a twist that makes it lie flat, is highly mercerized and actually improves with washing. It is smooth to the fingers and will not kink. With Dexter "Silko," crocheting is more easily done—and the finished pieces are far more beautiful and useful than if made with cheaper grade cotton. Dexter "Silko" for crocheting comes in all the popular colors—white, ecru, pink, rose pink, light blue, delph blue, king blue, sapphire and sea green, and in sizes 3, 10, 30, 50 and 70. The tatting cotton comes in the same colors and of the size always used for this work.

The three steel crochet needles are the finest made, 5 inches long, nickel plated, perfectly formed and balanced, with flattened finger hold, and a nickel cap that slips on over the end, protecting it when not in use. "Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

MRS. E. M. W., West Union, Ill.—To a certain extent the acceptance of any written invitation is governed by the form in which the invitation was made—whether informal or formal, by whom sent, etc. Your inquiry does not quite give this information, but we suggest that a note like the following should be reasonably correct enough to answer your purposes in replying to the organization which has asked you to become a member: "I appreciate your letter inviting me to membership in your Club. I regard the invitation as an honor and I take great pleasure in accepting it. Very sincerely." You should see that this note bears superscription and address of the secretary, committee or club official from whom the invitation came.

A MISSOURI GIRL.—If this boy dines at your house at your invitation or that of your parents, it is certainly pleasant to believe that he would be most pleased to sit next to you. We suggest that he sit at your mother's right and that you occupy the next seat.

MRS. A. A. S., Watertown, Wisc.—Surely you would not want to wear a Canton crepe or other dress of such type on a trip by train. A plainly tailored suit of light-weight tweed or other mixed goods that will not show soil is the proper frock for traveling purposes. English homespuns make suitable goods for the purpose you wish.

TEXAS MAID.—In any ordinary street costume it would be perfectly correct for you to wear your hat while staying a day at this hotel. If you came down to dinner at night, planning to go to the theater, for instance, and were wearing any dress or semi-dress frock, it would be better to leave your hat in your room. In the morning you may come to breakfast dressed in the way in which you plan to take your train after the meal and so you would, of course, be wearing some close-fitting hat suitable for traveling.

A. A. B., Alpha, Wash.—It is rather a hard task to compare the difficulties offered in learning either vocal or instrumental music. Generally stated, we think it would require more time and application for you to become a good organist or pianist than it would to cultivate your voice. You must remember that in such a comparison as you suggest the question of native talent enters. One may become a fairly good player on either the piano or organ by constant application and practice, but without a voice of good range and quality to build upon, no amount of vocal culture can give results. Consider this and inventory your gifts and ability and act accordingly.

J. A., Connerville, Okla.—You would not wear a hat with your white satin wedding gown. Whether you wear a veil or not is a matter of choice. Most brides find a veil an attractive and conventional addition. We do not agree with your fiance concerning pink satin. White or ivory is the more suitable color and you will find it more becoming. (2) Your blue serge, plainly tailored, will be sensible and correct for you to wear as a going-away gown.

NELL, Georgia.—Unless this Christmas gift you mention was rather valuable, we do not think you need feel compelled to return it to this young man with whom you have broken friendship. You say that you gave him a present at the same time. (2) You could not be justly angry if this boy was unexpectedly compelled to leave you after arranging to escort you home. He was undoubtedly as sorry as you were concerning the occurrence. If he tells you this, it is sufficient apology and you should accept it accordingly.

BLUE EYES, Alexandria, Mo.—When this boy is introduced to you it is sufficient to offer your hand with a nod, a smile and a "how do you do." No set phrases are needed and conversation may follow as it may.

RUTH OF WILLOWBROOK.—COMFORT'S League of Cousins was organized to be one Big and Happy Family by Uncle Charlie and it is both proper and friendly for letters to be exchanged by members of the League. (2) Do you quite mean what you say when you ask regarding games you wish to play on Sunday afternoons? Walks, music, veranda talks and light refreshments we think would be the best Sabbath ways of entertaining your young friends.

B. E., Lake City, Fla.—It is a natural right of censorship which a mother has over the correspondence of a young girl of sixteen. The best solution of your difficulty is to see that the boys who write you letters are the sort whose missives might be read and enjoyed by your family as well as yourself. A girl of sixteen should not receive "love letters" or correspond with any boy or young man to whom her parents object. (2) You would not rise when a boy was introduced to you, although you would if you wished to show respect in the case of the introduction of an older man.

BILLY, Kansas.—Exercise is good to reduce weight but diet is better. And both together are best. Continue your exercise and begin to cut all starches and sweets from your meals. Eat plenty of green vegetables, acid fruits, lean meats and toast, and let these form the bulk of your food. Avoid fat meats, milk and cream, and all the cake, candy, ice cream, etc., which are consumed in rather plentiful quantities by most of the girls we know—and if they are fat girls they can never be thinner when these too-nourishing sweet things are eaten. (2) It must be some unusual nerve sensitiveness of the skin that continues your "goose flesh" into warm weather and after careful treatment. Perhaps it is not "goose flesh" but something more difficult to handle which affects your arms. Why not let a physician look at the trouble and prescribe treatment?

B. J. S., Spokane, Wash.—If this young man is not your escort and boards the street car after you have entered, he would not be expected to pay your fare. However, there is nothing wrong in his paying this small sum for you and the matter would not be worth conversation or insistence upon your part. Say "thank you," and let it go at that. If he were escorting you, however, he would be expected to pay this fare and it would be incorrect for him not to do so. (2) Surely you may "keep company" with this young man who has proved himself so much of a gentleman in so many ways. Your mother's chaperonage is careful and correct and the gossip of your neighbors can be safely ignored. Gossip is never "right," but we regret to say there is always plenty of it, particularly when love, courtship or marriage can be imagined and discussed by the gossipers.

LEOTA, Texas.—When your boy caller says he "must go," if you are willing that his call should cease you can rise and say, "It's too bad you have to go so soon," or something else which is pleasant to speed the parting guest. And if you really wish him to remain longer, say so, although most of the boy callers we hear about are the ones who stay too long. Boys who say they "must go" are much easier to deal with than those who show no tendency whatever toward departure even though the clock keeps striking every thirty and sixty minutes. (2) To have those we like like us is not always easy and neither friendship nor love can be chosen in this way. But if a boy likes you a little the best way to have him like you much is to be sure you keep on being just the same girl he has learned to care for a bit. Do not change unless you want him to change too.

B. W., Oilla, Texas.—A girl of fifteen should wear her hair in simple schoolgirl fashion and in a manner in accordance with the styles in vogue for girls of her age in the section in which she lives. Do not try to be "grown-up" too soon or to adopt any fashion of dress or appearance which will make you unduly conspicuous.

MRS. G. A. B., Collinville, Ala.—The length of time to wear mourning is governed by the relationship to the person lost and mourned. This you do not state. As a general rule, we say that mourning is worn for a much shorter period than in past years. For instance, a widow would satisfy convention by wearing black for twelve months.

M. E. B., North Carolina.—The solution of your invitation problem is to ask your guests to your combination picnic and party by telephone. This will enable you to explain clearly and informally the interesting length of pleasure which you have mapped out for your lucky young guests. You would find it hard to do this by letters of invitation and some misunderstandings might arise. Yes; you may tell intimate girl friends that they may bring along certain boys whom you do not happen to know.

that all her lavishness had been to outshine Star. "I never thought you were really embarrassed, or I would not have asked for so much."

"Well, then," he answered, in a gentler tone, "show your consideration for me now, for you and Josephine will have to wear your old clothes this winter. My trouble has been tided over for the present through the kindness of a friend, but it will require great care and calculation on my part to keep my head aboveboard even now. I shall have to begin cautiously, or I shall be back again in the slough of despond."

"But I do not see how we can get along without some new things," began Mrs. Richards, selfishly.

"You must; that is all there is about it," returned her husband, positively. "If you can't go into society and wear what you have, then you must stay at home this winter; and I do not think it would do you any harm for once, either."

Mrs. Richards flushed angrily. When she saw her husband in this mood, she knew there was no turning him, and she would be obliged to submit to his edict.

"I'm sure I do not see what can have happened to make you so penurious all of a sudden?" she said, sullenly.

"Penurious! Oh, Ellen!"

He looked at her yearningly for a moment.

"My dear," he went on, after a moment, "why cannot you comfort me a little—give me a little sympathy in my trouble? My burden has been very hard to bear alone, and the worst of it has been that I was obliged to refuse your requests. You know that I am not penurious—that I never denied you anything that I could possibly grant you. Ellen, I wish you could be a little more kind to me than you have been of late."

"I do not know anything about business matters; I could give you very little advice or comfort in that way," she replied, coldly; and then she left him feeling very miserable, and in anything but a comfortable frame of mind herself, and not a little startled to know that they had been so near the brink of ruin as he had represented.

She returned to her own room, picking up the morning paper, which lay upon the hall table, on her way. Sitting down, she ran her eye carelessly over its columns, while her mind was busy planning some way to get along without her accustomed full purse, and "keep up appearances."

Suddenly her glance was transfixed by a paragraph which sent sharp, prickling pains throughout her body, and every nerve quivered with excitement as she read:

"The heirs, or nearest of kin of Sir Charles Thornton, late of Halowell Park, Devonshire, England, will find it to their advantage to communicate at once with Compton & Bailey, No. 54 Lincoln's-inn-fields, London."

Just below this advertisement was a notice of the sudden death of the young baronet from diphtheria.

Mrs. Richards sat like one overcome by some violent shock for a few moments after reading this account. Then, springing to her feet, and taking the paper with her, she went back in hot haste to her husband, her cheeks crimson, her eyes glowing with agitation.

"If what I suspect should prove to be true, the dream of my life will be realized. Sir George and Lady Richards would sound very well, indeed," she murmured, as she went.

Her husband looked up as she entered, and she was startled as she noticed how pale and careworn his face had become; but she was too eager to communicate her news to pay much heed to it.

"George," she said, eagerly, "read this!"

She laid the paper before him as she spoke, and pointed to the paragraph which had excited her so.

"Well, I have read it, but I do not understand it; I do not know anything about Sir Charles Thornton," he returned, indifferently.

"What are you thinking of, George Richards?" cried his wife, impatiently. "My mother was half-sister to Sir Charles Thornton's mother. Sir Charles had no family; there are no other relatives to be found on either side, it seems, or his lawyers would not have advertised thus, and I believe that I am 'the nearest of kin.'"

"Nonsense, Ellen, don't get such a wild idea as that into your head, for you will surely be disappointed," Mr. Richards answered, skeptically.

"I don't know about that. But one thing I have long known, and that is that the Thornton branch of the family is nearly, if not quite, extinct. It is evident that no heirs are to be found in England, or Compton & Bailey would not have advertised in the United States papers," she returned, feeling more and more sure in her own mind that her first impressions had not been at fault.

"That is a good argument, truly," Mr. Richards said, with sudden interest, and then began to question his wife, and to examine more closely into the matter.

The result was that the next steamer bore a long letter to Compton & Bailey, No. 54 Lincoln's-inn-fields, stating Mrs. Richards' relationship to Sir Charles Thornton, of Halowell Park, Devonshire, together with proofs of what they asserted.

A month passed, and they had begun to think they had been nourishing a chimera, when, one day, there came an answer from Compton & Bailey, saying that they had faithfully studied the chronological tables of both sides of the Thornton family, and had arrived at the conclusion that Mrs. Richards was undoubtedly the nearest of kin to the late Sir Charles.

They stated that they had been advertising for a long time in English papers, and no one had presented any claim. They had then concluded to publish a similar notice in the American papers, and as it had met with no other response, they would undoubtedly decide the matter in favor of her.

However, they suggested that she come to London at once, as they could conclude better what to do after a personal interview.

"If it should prove a 'wild-goose chase,' as I fear it will, I can ill afford the expense of the trip," Mr. Richards said, when considering the question.

But his wife was all enthusiasm, as well as very sanguine regarding the result, and it was at length decided that they should sail as soon as practicable, and preparations were at once begun for the voyage.

Removing Extra Teats

ADDITIONAL or supernumerary teats often grow from the rear of the udder or back teats of the cow and cause a lot of trouble at milking time. In some instances they are large and close to the normal teats so that two may be milked as one. Such teats are sometimes united to the normal one and if the web of tissues connecting them is quite thin it may be snipped through with scissors when the animal is dry It is best in all cases to examine the udders of the young, growing heifers before they are bred and remove by operation any extra teats that will be sure to prove troublesome. As a rule, not more than two have to be removed, but cases have been met with where a heifer had five supernumerary teats. Some of these teats connect with little milk secreting glands and yield some milk which is a nuisance at milking time It is not only necessary to amputate such a teat but also to obliterate the secreting gland. This is done by cauterizing it with nitrate of silver or with a red-hot knitting needle or veterinarian's thermo-cautery, after removal of the teat.

The method of amputating an extra teat is as follows: Restrain the cow. Cleanse and disinfect the udder and teats. Have an attendant pull upon the normal teat to stretch it and also on the extra one. Then snip off the extra teat with sterilized curved scissors, as close to the base as possible and making the smallest possible wound. The wound is then to be swabbed with tincture of iodine. If an opening is seen where the teat was removed that should be well cauterized by burning or inserting a small pointed stick of caustic and twisting it round a few times to cauterize the lining membrane and obliterate the duct. Where an extra teat has been yielding milk the veterinarian has to dissect out the secreting gland, after amputating the teat. When a veterinarian cannot be employed the teats may be got rid of, when the heifer is quite young, by ligating the base of each very tightly with a fine cord.

SCRATCHES.—My mare suffers with scratches, her ankles swell and the affected part discharges pus. Could you give me a good remedy? R. J. D.

A.—The term "scratches" is applied to a sore and chapped condition of the skin of the back part of a horse's legs between the heels and fetlock joint. There is no marked discharge. If there is a foul-smelling discharge in the case in question, the disease is grease or grease heel instead of scratches. One has always to make sure that farcy, the skin form of glanders, is not present, as that disease is not only incurable and contagious in horses and mules but communicable and fatal to man. Have the mare examined by a qualified veterinarian. If it is a case of scratches, poultice the parts for two or three days with hot flaxseed meal and bran; then wash clean and twice daily apply freely a mixture of one part each of spirits of camphor and compound tincture of benzoin, two parts of flowers of sulphur and eight parts of unsalted lard. Do not repeat the washing. Write again, giving full particulars if it does not prove to be a case of simple scratches.

LICE ON CAT.—Please tell me what is the matter with my cat and what to do for him. He has something on him that looks like chicken mites. They are small and a yellow looking color. He has scratched and bit himself so much that the hair is off on some parts of his body. MRS. H. F.

A.—Lice or fleas no doubt infest the cat. Clip off the hair and then rub in a 1-to-500 solution of chinosol, or wrap the cat for 10 minutes in a towel on which spirits of camphor have been freely sprinkled. The vermin will then migrate to the towel which should then be plunged into boiling water. Repeat the treatment as often as is seen to be necessary. Provide the cat with a new clean bed. Flowers of sulphur sprinkled in the end helps to keep down lice and fleas. It may be added that some of the vermin can also be got rid of by use of a fine-toothed comb.

ENTERITIS.—Please tell me what ailed my horse. He was taken suddenly ill one morning with something like colic. He would sit up like a dog and then lie down again. He breathed hard and groaned continually. At the last his breath had a bad odor, and he seemed to smother to death, dying about ten that night. C. A. K.

A.—Stoppage of the small intestine by feed, a calculus (stone), gut-tie or hernia of the bowel, cause inflammation (enteritis) and death. A post-mortem examination should have been made to determine the exact condition present. Pint doses of raw linseed oil and dram doses of fluid extract of nux vomica should have been given at intervals of three or four hours. Gut-tie and hernia cannot, however, be remedied by giving drugs.

URINARY DIFFICULTY.—I have a puppy that urinates in her sleep every time she goes to sleep. I have also noticed her when she was standing on her hind legs with her front paws on the window-sill. Little white flat worms have passed from her. She seems to tire easily and is out of doors when she cares to be. MRS. E. P. C.

A.—Worms are the probable cause of the weakness described. Give her 15 drops of syrup of iodide of iron in a little water twice daily for two or three consecutive days a week. Increase the dose if it seems to be necessary. Stronger worm medicine may irritate the bladder. Let the dog live outdoors and have one small meal a day. Do not feed sweets, potatoes or corn meal in any form. Keep the bowels active.

FITS.—I wish you would give me some idea what ailed my dog. Three or four months ago she had running fits. She would be out playing and, all at once, a fit would strike her, and she would turn around and around as though she were trying to catch her tail, bawling and howling at the same time, then running under or into the house. She would come out all right, but seemed nervous and excited. She had six of these spells in three weeks. MRS. W. O. C.

A.—An irritant may cause such fits but in most cases indigestion or worms induce the trouble. Treatment should consist in withholding feed for 24 hours and then giving the dog, for every 25 pounds of body weight, one dram of fluid extract of male shield fern and 20 grains of powdered areca nut in one tablespoonful of simple syrup. Repeat the dose in four or five days. Burn the dropping. At time of fit give the dog 20 grains of bromide of potash in a little water and repeat the dose in 20 minutes, if seen to be necessary.

DEPRAVED APPETITE.—Our milk cows want to eat everything within their reach—harness, horse blanket, ropes, cloth, in fact anything they can chew. We have them in a corral all the time, feeding them plenty of hay and they have salt. Can anything be done to break them of the habit? M. C.

A.—The cows crave ingredients of a complete or balanced ration not present in the hay ration. If you can allow them free range on grass, that may suffice. Usually it is necessary to feed bran, oilmeal and grain. Bicarbonate of soda dissolved in the drinking water or bonemeal mixed in the feed daily may help. Start with a tablespoonful of either and increase the dose gradually, if that is found necessary.

FISTULA.—Can you tell me what to do for a fistula on the shoulder of a horse? Several have seen it, but do not know how to treat it. MRS. J. C. H.

A.—You should have described the condition present. If you mean that pus is discharging from sinuses (pipes) in the withers at the top of the shoulders, each pipe and pocket should be laid open to secure free drainage for pus and at the same time dead or diseased cartilage or other tissue should be cut out. Then swab the wound with tincture of iodine and pack the cavity with a rope of teased oakum saturated with a mixture of equal parts of turpentine and raw linseed oil. Renew the packing daily. If you cannot have this done, then use a proprietary fistula cure according to instructions given by the manufacturer. You can buy it at a drug store.

WARTS ON TEATS.—I have a Gurnsey cow that has warts on two right side quarters. They grow out long and get hard and dry. I pull them off when they get long but they grow back again. I tried lard and linseed oil, but nothing I try will do them any good and when they grow out long annoy the cow and she kicks. Can you tell me something that will cure or help them? T. D. C.

A.—Snip off the long-necked warts with scissors, a few at a time, and then apply tincture of iodine. Masses of small warts may be got rid of by immersing the teats for five minutes or so night and morning in water containing all the bicarbonate of soda it will dissolve when hot. Then dry the parts and in the evening apply a thick paste of cold-pressed castor oil, salt and sulphur.

STIFF NECK.—I have an eight-year-old mule that holds head and neck nearly straight out from shoulders and will hardly put his head to the ground to eat when he has the harness on. He walks as if he were sore. What is the trouble and remedy? MRS. I. C.

A.—If the stiffness described has come on recently we suspect that it is due to tetanus (lockjaw), although that disease does not always lock the jaws. If tetanus is present the "haw" or membrana nictitans from the inner corners of the eyes will protrude part way over the eyeballs as a pink mass when the mule raises his head. Treatment with tetanus antitoxin has to be given by a qualified veterinarian in this disease and he may also inject a solution of carbolic acid and glycerine into the muscles. Poll evil might also cause stiffness or it might be due to rheumatism. Give full particulars if you write again and cannot employ a veterinarian.

LUMP ON JAW.—My Jersey heifer has a hard lump, about the size of a turkey egg, on her throat, between the two jaw bones. When I first noticed it she would begin slobbering when she tried to eat. It doesn't seem to bother her any, although the knot is there and sometimes it swells up as large as a quart cup. Is it safe to use her milk and what can I do for her? D. A.

A.—If you have not examined the mouth that should be done at once as such a lump or enlarged gland may be caused by a cyst under the tongue which should be opened to liberate its fluid contents. Actinomycosis of the tongue ("wooden tongue") may also cause such a condition. The swelling should, however, always suggest the necessity of having the tuberculin test applied by a veterinarian as tuberculosis often causes such enlargements and is not only contagious and incurable but makes the milk dangerous for use by man or animals. We should not advise using the milk unless the heifer has been tested and proved free from tuberculosis. Until a qualified veterinarian can be employed to apply the test, paint the lumps with tincture of iodine every other day. Write again if we can help.

FLEAS.—Please tell me what remedy will rid my dog of fleas. E. M. S.

A.—Tub the dog in a warm 1-to-100 solution of coal tar dip, which you can buy at a drug store, or follow instructions given by the manufacturer. Repeat the treatment when seen to be necessary. When bathing cannot be done, dust pyrethrum powder on the infested parts of the body. Sprinkle flowers of sulphur in the bed.

"Ship Drives East"

AUTHOR UNKNOWN.

One ship drives east, and another west
With the self-same winds that blow;
'Tis the set of the sails
And not the gales
Which decide the way to go.

Like the winds of the sea are the ways of fate
As we voyage along through life;
'Tis the will of the soul
That decides its goal,
And not the calm or the strife.

A Love Song to Nature

I love thy streams that gently flow,
Thy rosy sunset splendor,
Thy evening skies that softly glow,
Thy golden moonbeams tender.
Thy waving grass, thy whispering trees,
Thy happy birds that twitter,
I love thy soft and balmy breeze,
Thy twinkling stars that glitter.

I love thy cool and shady dales,
Thy mighty, towering mountains,
Thy noble hills, thy peaceful vales,
Thy sparkling, foaming fountains.
Thy summer's heat and winter's cold,
Thy bleak and stormy weather,
When sheep come bleating to the fold,
From off thy downy heather.

I love thy raindrops, falling light,
In sweet, refreshing showers,
Thy fairy snowflakes soft and white,
Upon thy trees and bowers.
I love thy flowers along the way—
Thy brightly blooming flowers,
That breathing fragrance all the day,
Make glad the fleeting hours.

I love thy night that closing down,
Shuts out the daylight splendor,
And guarding, lets not sight nor sound
Come through my open window.
And when the day comes back again,
I love its morning beauty;
Dear Nature may thy sweetness win
My life for love and duty.

Where the Flag Is Full of Stars

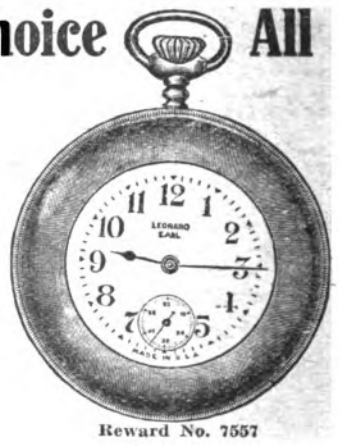
BY DR. HENRY VAN DYKE.

'Tis fine to see the Old World and travel up and down
Among the famous places and cities of renown,
To admire the crumbly castles and the statues of the Kings,
But now I think I've had enough of antiquated things.

Chorus

So it's home again, and home again, America for me!
My heart is turning home again, and there I long to be,
In the land of youth and freedom beyond the ocean bars,
Where the air is full of sunlight and the flag is full of stars.

Oh, London is a man's town, there's power in the air;
And Paris is a woman's town, with flowers in her hair;
And it's sweet to dream in Venice, and it's great to study Rome,
But when it comes to living, there is no place like home.



I like the German firwoods, in green battalions drilled;
I like the gardens of Versailles with flashing fountains filled,
But, oh, to take your hand, my dear, and ramble for a day
In the friendly Western woodland, where nature has her way.

I know that Europe's wonderful, yet something seems to lack;
The past is too much with her, and the people looking back,
But the glory of the present is to make the future free,
We love our land for what she is, and what she is to be.

Last Chorus

Oh, it's home again, and home again, America for me!
I want a ship that's westward bound to plow the rolling sea,
To the blessed Land of Room Enough beyond the ocean bars,
Where the air is full of sunlight and the flag is full of stars.

MRS. G. R., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that an administrator of a ...t's estate can be compelled to file a final acc... ...thin three years from the time of his appoint... ...nless his time for such an accounting has been ...ued by the court; we think you should serve a d... ...d for an accounting upon the administrator of t... ...state you mention, and if he refuses to account you should bring a proceeding against him in the court from which he received his appointment to compel him to do so.

Y. J., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, but leaving a surviving widow and brothers and sisters as his only heirs at law and next of kin, the widow, after payment of debts and expenses, would receive all of the community property and all of his separate personal property and one-half of his separate real estate absolutely.

MRS. H. A. M., Florida.—Under the laws of Georgia, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, after payment of debts and expenses, his surviving widow is entitled to a child's part of his estate, unless the shares exceed five, in which case the wife takes one-fifth and the children or descendants of children share the balance equally per capita as to children, per stirpes as to descendants of children, but should the wife choose to take dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, she would be barred of her absolute interest in such real estate; we think any of the children can compel the partition of the real estate, or the sale of the same and a division of the proceeds of sale in the proper partition action brought for the purpose.

MRS. V. F., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, and leaving a surviving widow and other kindred, the surviving widow, in addition to her exemption, is entitled to receive the real or personal estate or both to the aggregate value of five thousand dollars, and, if such estate exceeds in value the sum of five thousand dollars, such surviving widow shall be entitled to the sum of five thousand dollars absolutely to be chosen by her from real or personal estate or both and in addition thereto shall be entitled to one-half part of the remaining real and personal estate.

F. E. S., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, his surviving widow, after payment of debts and expenses, would be entitled to receive the whole of the personal estate and one-half of the real estate, the balance of the real estate going to descedants' heirs, depending upon who is left; we think his estate would include any property left him by an ancestor in which he had an absolute vested right at the time of his death, even though such property had not been divided at the time of his death.

MRS. A. H. B., Louisiana.—We do not think you can now recover the property awarded your ancestor for his services in the Revolutionary War.

MRS. F. L., Kansas.—Under the laws of Maryland, we are of the opinion that adverse possession gives title to real estate after a period of twenty years.

MRS. W. M., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that any married person may devise one-half of his or her property to other persons than the husband or wife.

MRS. J. W. J., California.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property, both real and personal, of either husband or wife, owned before marriage, and all acquired afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, with the rents issues and profits thereof, is separate property, and may be sold, conveyed, mortgaged or assigned without the consent of the other spouse; but that all property acquired after marriage, except in the manner stated above, is community property, and that upon the death of the husband the wife succeeds to one-half of the community property, after payment of debts and the expenses of administration. We think that upon the death of a married man the court of your state having jurisdiction of his estate may, upon petition therefor, set apart to the use of the surviving widow, or to the minor children of the decedent, all property exempt from execution, including the homestead selected, designated and recorded, provided such homestead was selected from the common property, or if such homestead is selected from the separate property of the decedent, provided such decedent joined in the selection thereof. Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a widow and two or more children, the widow would receive one-third of his separate estate, but that her share of the separate property can be reduced by will.

F. E. S., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a parent cannot be compelled to support children who are able to support themselves.

MRS. H. A., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, his surviving widow would receive the whole estate after payment of debts and expenses. (2) We can form no opinion as to the disposition of your mother's estate in case of her intestacy without knowledge of her place of residence.

MRS. C. H., Mississippi.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, his property, after payment of debts and expenses, would all go to his surviving widow and children, the widow taking a child's part of the estate.

MRS. M. N. S., Montana.—In order to impress a lien for the amount of your claim against the property sold by your debtor, we think it will be necessary for you to substantiate by the proper evidence that the property was sold for the purpose of avoiding the payment of your claim and that the purchaser thereof had such knowledge at the time of making the purchase.

MRS. J. K., Oregon.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, his widow would be entitled to receive dower of a one-half interest for life in his real estate and to one-half of the personal estate, absolutely, after payment of debts and expenses, the balance of the estate going in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share. (2) We think the surviving widow is entitled to be appointed administratrix of the estate unless the court finds some good reason why she should not be appointed. (3) We do not think the dispute between the decedent and his daughter during his lifetime would affect her inheritance rights in his estate, unless he left a will reducing her share therein.

G. S. G., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, such of his real estate as was acquired by him by onerous title and all of his personal property, after payment of debts and expenses, would go to his surviving widow absolutely; but that her share of such of the real estate as came to him by descent, devise or deed of gift from an ancestor would be limited to a life estate, and that both real and personal property coming to him from a former deceased wife would go to the children of such former deceased wife.

W. E. G., Michigan.—Under the laws of Indiana, we are of the opinion that children may be disinherited by will, provided the will is legally drawn and executed, and provided the testator possessed testamentary capacity at the time same was executed, and provided no undue influence was exercised upon him in connection therewith.

G. O. B., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and three children by a former marriage as his only heirs at law and next of kin, his widow, in addition to certain small allowances, and after payment of debts and expenses, would receive one-third of the real and personal estate, the balance going in equal shares to his children; we do not think the widow's child by a former marriage would receive any interest in his estate, unless some provision was made for such child by will, and except, of course, such child will in turn receive a share from the mother's estate, unless cut off by will.

W. G.—Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that males and females attain majority at twenty-one, but a married person over eighteen is considered of age as to contracts, property rights, and liabilities, and capacity to sue and be sued.

MRS. H. S., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, his widow, after payment of debts and expenses, and in addition to certain small allowances, and homestead rights, if any, would receive one-half of the estate, the balance going to his parents, brothers and sisters or their descendants, depending upon who is left; if none such, the widow would receive the whole estate.

MRS. H. E. B., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a surviving widow is entitled to a share of her husband's estate which cannot be diminished by will, but that there is no other restriction as to a man's right to dispose of his property by will in any manner he may see fit, except that the court will make certain small allowances from his estate to his children under seven years of age; we think that in order to make a valid will the testator must possess testamentary mental capacity, the will must be legally drawn and executed and must express the testator's true intent, and that the testator at the time of making the will must not be under the undue influence of any other person, or persons.

A. K., Pennsylvania.—We think you should make a complaint to your local or state board of health against the owner of the property who pipes his sewerage in the open stream running through your village, and that, if the board of health delays action in the matter, it may be necessary for you to commence an action against this property owner to compel him to abate a nuisance.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address, The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. A. P. W., Whitesville, R. I.—One of the best remedies for goiter is iodine in some form. Take ten drops of a saturated solution of iodide of potassium, well diluted, after meals. Also avoid excitement of all kinds.

MISS E. C., Weldon, Ark.—For his lumbago have your husband take ten-grain tablets of salicylate of sodium, well diluted, after meals. Also iron the hip with a hot iron. Apply the iron to several thicknesses of flannel wrung out of mustard water.

MRS. D. M., South Point, Ohio.—For lameness and soreness of your back, which is muscular, have your back ironed with a hot flatiron. First apply to the back several thicknesses of flannel wrung out of mustard water then apply the iron as indicated. For the bladder trouble have the bladder washed out with permanganate of potassium—a teaspoonful of saturated solution of the potassium to a pint of hot water. Also take after meals, a five-grain tablet of urotropin.

MRS. C. C., Utica, Kansas.—There is no cure for cancer. Operation in some cases will effect a cure. Serum has been tried but without avail. Radium is now used with success in some cases.

MRS. J. J., Stillwater, Okla.—For your hay fever take a teaspoonful of pertussin after meals. You will not have tuberculosis in any case.

MISS H. M., Minot, N. Dak.—You have nervous dyspepsia. Take a five-grain pill of asafœtida after meals. Avoid sweets of all kinds.

MRS. V. W. L., Nashville, Tenn.—Your weight is not excessive. If you want to reduce, try living, on the alternate days, on one quart of skimmed milk in divided doses. On the other days avoid starchy foods of all kinds.

MRS. D. A. B., Indianapolis, Ind.—Your husband's trouble is bleeding piles. Have them operated on at once.

MRS. W. R., Elkton, Mich.—Take a five-grain tablet of asafœtida after meals. You have a nervous heart action and this remedy will help you.

MRS. M. K., Hamptonville, N. C.—For the eruption on your face, steam the face daily and apply lotio alba, which lotion you can obtain at any good druggist's.

MRS. G. H. H., Wingate, N. C.—For your throat trouble gargle the throat with Dobell's solution. Take Basham's mixture in tablespoonful doses, as a tonic, after meals, to build you up. You are run down.

MRS. C. O., Hastings, Mich.—Your child has a form of rickets. Have him take codliver oil in teaspoonful doses after meals.

MR. H. C. A., Lone Oak, Texas.—You might try, for the neuralgia above the eye, a tablespoonful of Warburg's tincture, well diluted, after meals. Apply, locally, also a solution of equal parts of chloral hydrate and camphor. Rub this solution well into the painful part. Mixing these drugs makes a solution without the addition of any diluent. As the sight of that eye seems to be failing you may have a disease of the eyes known as glaucoma; if so, you should consult an eye specialist at once as delay is dangerous and complete loss of sight may supervene if this is the case. One of the symptoms of glaucoma is seeing "colored rings" around a lamp in a subdued light.

MRS. J. B. D., Duane, Okla.—Probably you have a chronic bronchitis. Better have the sputum examined and find out the exact condition. In the meantime you might take some good emulsion of codliver oil.

MRS. P. Q., Tennsville, Mich.—You should have the urine examined at once, as the swelling looks like an acute Bright's disease. If so, you should have active treatment by your local doctor to anticipate trouble later on. You can wear the corset as usual, and take exercise in the open; but have the kidney condition looked into at once.

MRS. D. H. L., Pennsboro, West Va.—"Pinworms" are best cured by an enema of white oak bark, or normal saline solution. Piles, if troublesome, must be operated on to effect a permanent cure.

MRS. F. H. K., Smithville, Texas.—You will have to keep a diaper on the baby for the present and wait until she is older to correct the bed-wetting. Two eggs are too many for a child of the age mentioned. Even one should not be given daily.

MRS. L. B. W., Caddon, Colo.—You may have been torn during confinement and need the parts restored to normal again by operation. Your headaches may be due to the need of proper correcting lenses. Have your eyes examined for glasses.

MISS L. D., Roanoke, Va.—Take, for the stomach trouble, a compound bicarbonate of soda tablet after meals. The leg swelling may be due to some kidney disease. Better have your local doctor look into the matter for you. You may, in the meantime, bandage the legs during the day and remove the bandage at night.

MRS. S. M. R., Odon, Ind.—For your anemic condition take a tablespoonful of Basham's mixture, well diluted, after meals.

MRS. F. W., Fairbank, Iowa.—The trouble may be chronic malaria. Have your husband take a tablespoonful of Warburg's tincture after meals, well diluted. Also have him bathe the entire body in a strong solution of sage tea, before retiring.

MRS. M. M. C., Los Angeles, Calif.—There is nothing authentic that will cure the appetite for liquor. Have the man quit the drug and take a 1-60 gr. tablet of strychnia sulph., after meals, as a substitute and for the nervous system.

MRS. M. C., EDSON, Alta., Canada.—If the gallstones are small enough to get through the common duct they will pass into the intestines and pass out in the feces. If, however, they remain in the pelvis of the duct they must be removed surgically in every case.

MISS M. D. A., Naples, Ky.—The pain in the chest is probably due to an intercostal neuralgia. Take a teaspoonful of Warburg's tincture, well diluted, after meals.

MRS. R. C., Middleton, Ga.—Have the boy take a prolonged nap in the afternoon and give him a very sparing meal at night. If he takes a good nap in the afternoon he will not sleep so soundly and the reflexes will not be so numbed that he will not awake when he desires to urinate.

MR. J. B. S., So. Richmond, Va.—The blood pressure can be helped if your father will avoid sweets and pastries of all kinds, drink plenty of water, and take, after meals, ten drops of a saturated solution of iodide of potassium, well diluted. Of course, his case should be watched by some good physician and changes made in his diet and medicine from time to time.

Wrist Watch

Reward No. 75210

For Men And Boys

For A Club Of Only Ten

THE Wrist Watch is no longer considered effeminate or a "fad." Men and boys in all walks of life now wear them. The millions of American soldiers who went to France—from general down to dough-boy—wore them. It is a practical, common-sense method of carrying a watch.

The watch shown here is the "Leonard"—designed especially for farmers, lumbermen surveyors, miners, campers, hunters, fishermen, etc. It is 6 size, fitted with high-grade American movement, stem wind and pendant set in strong, dust-proof, silver-nickel case with a thick, heavy crystal that cannot easily be broken.

The strap is made of goat skin, of good width, very tough yet pliable and easy on the wrist. It fastens with a nickel-plated buckle which does not come in contact with the skin. This strap may be adjusted to fit the wrist of a small boy or a full-grown man.

This also makes a splendid wrist watch for the women and girls on the farm. It is just what they need when engaged in outdoor work and to wear on motoring trips and on all occasions where it would not be advisable to wear a more expensive watch.

Remember—this watch is fully guaranteed to keep good time. If it fails to do so or proves defective in any way within one year we will either repair or exchange it free of charge. It is yours free on the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For ten one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this fine Wrist Watch exactly as described free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 75210.

business so long that they have forgotten such beautiful and happy places as Loveland exist, and their eyes have grown so red and sore from the smoke of the Hateburg money mills and grudge factories that they would not be able to find their way to Loveland unless some guide, a little child, for instance, took them by the hand and led them all the way. But the saddest thing is that they would not want to start, would not believe how beautiful Loveland is, Mary, and would be quite content to stay in Hateburg for the rest of their smoky days.

Mary, you say you don't like history, but some day when you have the mud cleaned all off your boots and your lessons all done, sit down and write us a History of Loveland. If you have lived there for seven years you ought to know a lot about it. This will be a history everybody will be glad to study.

I don't wonder you have never been to Estes Park, Mary. There is no park, no matter how famed its scenery, that could tempt me out of Loveland if I lived in such a happy place at the lucky age of sweet sixteen.

CAMDEN, R. R. 5, SOUTH CAROLINA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Why do I never see any letters from this state? Surely there can be none better than our South Carolina. I have been reading with interest the cousins' letters in COMFORT ever since I was a boy. Now that hasn't been long; in fact I'm a boy yet. I'm only thirty-eight and hail from the old Palmetto State. I am one of Uncle Sam's boys—a rural mail carrier driving a flivver every day over twenty-five miles of country road to carry to the homes of rural people the news of the busy world as well as many packages of merchandise and the hundreds of letters which, in great part, are messages of love and friendship.

I have on my route about 675 people and they are all my friends. It is interesting to study them and their lives day after day as I pass by. It is interesting to watch the correspondence of new acquaintances; to watch it, often, as it develops into friendship, then into love, and to see them later link their lives together and, with love as a foundation, begin to build that highest and holiest earthly institution called home.

I am ten miles east of the historic old town of Camden. Many people from the Northern States spend their winters here. We are in the sand-hill section separating the Piedmont, or hill country, from the coastal plain. This is the land of cotton and corn, the home of the long-leaved pine and good old Southern hospitality. Our winters are mild and our summers filled with bright, sunshiny days, silvery moonlight nights and a panorama of wild flowers and song birds. So you see I have much to make for happiness; but there is one thing I have not told you: I have just bushels of love for a little miss of five summers, with blue eyes and dark, curly brown hair. Because her mother is dead she is living with her grandparents nearly two hundred miles away. So you see I have something to make me lonely, too; and that is why I am looking forward to getting lots of good friendly letters from the cousins and will promise to answer as many as I can—for my work on the route only requires three hours of my time each day and I have plenty to spare.

Your nephew, ARTHUR H. ARNOLD.

You write in the vein of a poet, Arthur, and while many people could not make a Pegasus out of a flivver or find poetry in driving every day over the same twenty-five miles of road, you have had vision enough to look beyond the bare facts of your job and discover its human elements. And in doing this you have found, of course, new interest and happiness. To be able to say that the 675 people along your route are all your friends means that you have been a friend yourself to the 675 of 'em—which is a good record as everyone who has adventured in friendship will know.

It is too bad that you who have brought so many lovers together must now be separated so far from your own tiny sweetheart. We can be lonely in being away from somebody we love, Arthur, but think of the utter loneliness of those who have nobody to love! Better a two-hundred-mile sweetheart than none at all, and I know you are wise enough to agree.

You'll gets loads of "good friendly letters," Arthur, you may be sure of that—more than even you ever delivered in one day's ride of your Cupid-flivver. Our Big Family is a friendly one if ever there was one, and curing loneliness and delivering cheer is something we accomplish by mail sacks and wagon loads. Arthur, those 675 friends of yours are going to be increased considerable in the next few months. Wait and see.

INDIAN SPRINGS, TENNESSEE.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

As I am not at school today I will write to you for my first time. We take COMFORT and think it just fine.

I am in the seventh grade at school. My teacher says I am doing fine. I joined the Girls' Canning Club the other day and hope to make a success.

I will describe myself: I am a girl thirteen years old, fair complexion, and have light curly hair and blue eyes. We live on a thirty-two acre farm. It is rocky, too; but I would rather live here than in Kingsport or in any other of your towns. Wouldn't you?

I have four sisters and one brother and I am the oldest of them all. Well, I will close. Give my love to all, but keep a big lot for yourself.

Your niece, RUTH MCCONNELL.

You flatter me, Ruth, when you suggest that I am the owner of Kingsport and other Tennessee towns—even if you do say that you would rather live in Injun Springs than in Lishaville, Uncleton, or any such other towns with which you might credit me as owner. Ruth, although it may disappoint you—and I know it does me—I have to confess that I do not own a square foot of Sullivan County—not even a space large enough to furnish pasturage for a Leghorn yearling critter. If I ever do buy a town I'll let you know, and then you can try living in it and see if it suits as well as Injun Springs.

I don't see why in the world you Tennessee girls have formed this Girls' Canning Club, Ruth. I think the nice, fresh garden variety of girl is far more tasty and better flavored than any preserved product—no matter how successfully the canning may be done and the seasoning put in. And, anyway, Cousin Jack Wilcox and Cousin Gus Trick have tried their best to "can" the girls and find it's hard to do. Just leave the Tennessee girls alone, Ruth, my dear. Let them ripen well and be picked fresh—or left to wither on the bush according to time, seasons and suitors. There is nothing worse than a girl who is "well-preserved."

MARSHALL, NORTH CAROLINA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I am just a little dried-up—I mean a big fourteen-year-old, red-cheeked, healthy girl (but it isn't paint that makes the red cheeks). I live in a part of North Carolina where grapes, peaches, apples, cherries and all good eating are common things.

Now I don't want to be changing the subject so quick, but I want to ask Uncle Lisha and all of you if you like to go to parties? I do. I am going to give a lawn party next Friday evening and I am extending a cordial invitation to all of you who would like to be present.

Say! How many of you girls ever put on a pair of riding pants or overalls and go 'possum hunting with your brothers? I have several times, but it was in the night-time, of course.

Carl, I can sympathize with you and Ted about your curls, for I wore my hair down in curls for a long time until everybody began calling me "Curls," and then my hair went up on my head and it stays there, too, unless I decide I want to see my curls again.

All right, Isabel, you think you can beat me making fudge, but you just send Uncle Lisha a box of yours and when he comes to my party on Friday evening I'll give him a box of mine—then he can award the prize to the one who has the best candy.

Uncle Lisha, did you like to go to school when you was a little girl—I mean a little boy? I have gone to a nine months school since I was six years old. I have been going to a high school for two or three years and will take the tenth grade next year.

Most girls like boys best, but here's one who wouldn't give a cent a thousand for them. But Ted, I would like to have you here to teach me to ride a "wild western" pony. I can ride a horse well and I think you would find me an apt pupil.

If I don't stop I will have writer's cramp. I just must close by saying I will accept all letters I receive with a "kind word and a pleasant smile"—and I will promise to answer all I can.

If any of you wish to know who you are corresponding with, just clear out your brain cells and place in your mind the picture of a girl five feet tall, a medium fair complexion, a fluff of dark brown hair (sometimes curly), a pair of dark brown eyes, a small nose with a few little brown freckles spotted on it—and you have the picture.

I know I will have to come to a close as this is my last sheet of paper, so I will say,

Au revoir. GEORGIA HELEN RECTOR.

Georgia, I certainly will be at your party Friday night if I can arrange things so I can get away on the Owl Express of the Seaboard Line tomorrow evening. You need not meet me at the station; I'll have a local flivver bring me up and drop me off at the first house where I smell chocolate fudge being cooked. I do like parties, especially when they are given by a hostess who, like you, has the proper ideas regarding "good eating." I am strong for good eats, Georgia, and to prove it I always eat good. So please see that they serve my strawberry ice cream with a soup ladle when you see me edging up to the table for the fourth time. I remember going to a New England lawn party where all they served was lemon ice cream and Uneeda biscuit. And some of the guests were so famished they ate up all the paper lanterns and I found a candle end in my vest pocket when I got home. But I know this won't happen at your party, Georgia, and the fudge will be as delicious (I don't dare say more delicious) as the dry goods box full that Isabel sent me by freight from Michigan.

G. Helen, you offer a rather low bid for boys. Some of 'em aren't worth much, that's sure; but yet a cent a thousand will hardly buy damaged seconds, badly raveled and tobacco stained. Perhaps two or three years from now, if your cheeks stay just as red and your hair as curly, you may decide to raise your offer a little—say to a cent apiece. Or perhaps you won't have to pay that much. Yes, Georgia, I'm willing to bet my second best pair of suspenders (the pair with the safety-pin in the right shoulder) you will have all you want offered you for nothing—and F. O. B. Marshall, N. C., too.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for August

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Mrs. J. M. Perkins, Deer Park, R. R. 2, Wash. This poor woman has three children, the oldest four years of age, and will soon have a fourth mouth to feed. She is unable to work because of a late operation. Clothing will help, but cash will help more. Lafayette Swanson, Boomer, R. R. 2, N. C. Helpless as a baby for the past twenty years, with a devoted and failing wife as the only aid. Asks that cheer and comfort be sent him for his birthday of August 4th. Moriah Ledwell, Lassiter, N. C. This is a woman of fifty, afflicted with fits, who is supported by a half-sister who is unable to give her complete care. Clothing or money will be helpful joys to this struggling household. Mrs. James A. Whipkey, Jamestown, O. With a husband almost blind and unable to work, this mother has to fight to support herself and two children of nine and seven years and a baby of seven months. A well-recommended and most worthy case. Fulton R. Lowe, Sheppards, R. R. 1, Box 33, Va. Bedridden for 37 years and dependent on the outside world for aid. This man's condition is pitiful in the extreme. Miss Emma Adolf, Sandusky, R. R. 4, Mich. Unable to walk because of a spinal injury, this shut-in asks for letters of sympathy and cheer to aid in passing lonely hours. Mrs. Martha Clark, Spring Hill, R. R. 1, Box 92, Tenn. A widow of 69 years who has been for ten years afflicted with rheumatism. She asks for money to aid in buying necessary medicine, and also for books or magazines to cheer her shut-in hours. Mrs. Hollie Honeycutt, Stanfield, R. R. 2, Box 141, N. C., care of Mrs. G. Travis Burris. An old lady of 79, blind and helpless. Asks any help, particularly money and clothing. An appeal like this should open all hearts.

The best of summers, the most bountiful of harvests, cannot bless those who are shut away from the sunlight and unable to work to earn their own bread. The help for these shadowed souls and broken bodies can only come from those free from the burdens of sickness and poverty. If any measure of happiness, of surcease from pain is to be granted the sufferers whose appeals appear for our League's consideration, it must come from a picturing in mind of the sad conditions outlined—and then by glad and free giving of the much-needed help.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Missing Relatives and Friends

For the convenience of its subscribers, COMFORT reopens the "Missing Relatives' and Friends' column.

To the readers of COMFORT is extended the privilege of inserting three-line notices in this column if they will secure only one new yearly subscriber to COMFORT at 50c. If you wish to find a missing relative or friend you can insert a three-line notice containing not over 22 words in this column by securing only one new subscription at 50c. If a longer notice is required send one 50c subscription for each additional seven words.

Three Wheel Chairs in July

649 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The three July wheel chairs go to Mrs. M. A. Hazel, R. F. D. 4, Warsaw, Mo.,

ALVERLINE LOGAN ENJOYING HER WHEEL CHAIR.

116; Mrs. Annie E. Wright, Anadarko, Okla., 98; Lillian Atchley, Delta, Colo., 84. The figures following their respective names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Mrs. M. A. Hazel, age 69, has suffered from rheumatism the past four years, and for more than a year has been helpless from the effects of the disease. She is a widow and lives mostly with her son who is also a cripple.

Mrs. Annie E. Wright, age 76, has been crippled the past six months due to a broken leg and dislocated hip which have not only disabled her but cause her great suffering. She is a widow living with and dependent on her son. Mrs. F. F. Davis and Miss Emma A. Robright, her two friends who procured the subscriptions for her, were desirous of obtaining the chair as soon as possible because, as they write me, "the weather is very warm for an invalid in bed."

Lillian Atchley, age 17, has suffered from rheumatism and Bright's disease since 1919, which have reduced her to the state of a chronic invalid unable to walk and almost helpless. The chair will in part relieve this unfortunate girl's suffering and be a great help to her mother, who obtained the subscriptions, in caring for her.

It is now vacation season for those fortunate enough to have the means and and leisure to spare for a holiday, and most people manage to get at least a few days off for a change of scene and recreation. But there is no vacation for the crippled shut-ins; so don't forget this month to do something to help our Wheel-Chair Club to make the sad lot of these unfortunates more endurable.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P S. For the information of our many new subscribers, let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Well Satisfied with Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

Reginald, La.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

After so long a time I have had my picture taken and I am sending it to you in the hope that you will print it in COMFORT to show how I enjoy the wheel chair you were so kind to send me. I am well satisfied with it, and I thank you and all others for their kindness in helping me to get it. I am

Yours truly,
Alverline Logan.

Much Pleased with His COMFORT Wheel Chair

Whitney, R. 2, Texas.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I am sending you a snap shot of Jack Simmons enjoying his wheel chair. The chair arrived in good condition and he is so pleased with it he says "it is the grandest chair in the world." He wishes me to thank you and all the good friends who helped to get it for him.

Sincerely your friend,
(Mrs.) Parrie Hullett.

Valuable Advice

"A cat sits on my fence every night and makes the night hideous with his infernal row. Now I don't want to have any bother with my neighbor, but this nuisance has gone far enough, and I want you to advise me what to do."

The young lawyer looked as solemn as an owl and answered not a word.

"I have a right to shoot that cat, haven't I?"

"I would hardly say that," replied the young lawyer. "The cat does not belong to you, as I understand."

"No, but the fence does."

"Ah!" exclaimed the light of the law, "then I think you have a perfect right to tear down the fence!"—London Ideas.

With All Other Prospects Bright and Promising, Strikes, only, Are Barring the Road to Prosperity.

IT was less than a year ago that the country was facing with dismay an alarmingly large unemployment of labor caused by general industrial and business depression attendant on readjustment of conditions that had been dislocated and demoralized by war. Although it is now known that the reports, which at that time variously estimated the number of idle laborers wanting work at from two to five millions, were grossly exaggerated, the situation was sufficiently grave to warrant the President's action in calling a conference of prominent business men and labor representatives to devise means of relief. Of the several plans that were suggested none was practicable, and after much discussion and deliberation the conference finally adjourned without having accomplished anything except to make it apparent that the trouble was due to causes whose operation could not be commanded at will, not even by the magic wand of legislation, and therefore must be bided until it should work itself clear through the action and reaction of natural processes.

But even while the conference debated (that was early last winter) conditions began to improve through normal development. Business was reviving on a sound basis and in a perfectly healthy manner, unaided by any extraneous boosting or artificial restorative the stimulating effect of which at best is but temporary and always followed by a depressing reaction. As explained in our April issue, it was the bettered condition and brighter prospects of the agricultural interests that gave the general business of the country its upward start last winter, for about half our population lives by farming which is the back-bone of our national prosperity. The general business situation had been so far clarified that this upward movement continued, broadening to every line of industry as it progressed, until by midsummer, instead of millions of idle men seeking a job, employers were advertising for help. There was, and at the present writing still is, every indication that the coming autumn will usher in an era of great national prosperity, except only for the cruelly destructive barriers raised by the striking union coal miners and railroad shopmen and by the threatened strike of the railroad maintenance-of-way men—obstructions which, unless immediately leveled, will not only paralyze commerce and industry, throwing millions out of employment, but also cause a food-and-fuel famine awful beyond imagination in its consequences.

Among the many factors in the combination which gives assurance of good times, provided only that the railroad and coal mine strikes be ended speedily and right, the following are significant: harvest prospects are reported good; our foreign commerce is growing, our imports in June having exceeded in value those of May by eight million dollars, while our exports in June overran those of May by twenty-seven million dollars, and the notable feature of it is that the exports gained nineteen million more than the imports; growth of business activity is reflected in bank figures which show that in June money used in business outside of New York increased nearly six hundred million dollars over May; increased activity in the dry goods market is reported for June; automobile production increased eleven per cent in June, while in auto-trucks the production exceeded that of May by 2,100 machines; the weekly increase in the freight-car loadings through the spring and summer up to July, when the shop-men's strike crippled the railroads, is undeniable proof of the general improvement in business up to that time.

Public Has Rights and Interests at Stake Which Must Be Protected

The present situation in which the people are harrassed by two strikes, each of which is an appalling national menace, makes it painfully evident that in labor conflicts of this class the public has vital interests at stake which give it the right to demand protection through governmental intervention to bring about a settlement not only speedily but on such terms as shall do justice to the community at large which directly or indirectly, visibly or invisibly, in various forms and ways has to pay all the expenses of operating the railroads and coal mines and profits to the owners, too.

Urgent as is the need for an immediate ending of these two strikes in order to avoid the impending calamity of a food-and-fuel famine, even more important and transcending all other considerations is the necessity that they be ended right, by which is meant: not by any sacrifice of sound principles, nor by a concession of the just rights or proper interests of the public, nor by a temporary compromise that would leave the door open for a future tye-up of the country's industries and transportation service by a railroad or coal miners' strike, but by an exercise of governmental authority in such manner and to such extent as to end these two strikes on terms equitable to all concerned and also to effectually prevent a future recurrence of such peril.

Strikes and threats of strikes by railroad employees and coal miners have grown to be public nuisances which the American people will not and can not tolerate. Public sentiment is rightfully demanding legislation to compel laborers in these occupations to settle their wage and other controversies with their employers by some means that will not freeze or starve the people. With intent to abolish railroad labor strikes Congress, in 1920, created the Railroad Labor Board and gave it full authority as a special court to decide all questions and disputes as to wages, hours of labor and working rules and regulations affecting railroad employees, but did not confer on the Board or on any other department of Government any power to enforce the Board's decisions. Because of this one weak spot, the neglect to invest the Government with the requisite power to compel obedience to the decisions and orders of the Board, the law has failed of its purpose of safeguarding the country against the calamity of a railroad strike.

Government Needs Power to Enforce Railroad Labor Board's Decisions

Now that this fatal defect is apparent Congress should immediately rectify the deficiency by prescribing penalties for disobedience and by authorizing the President to exercise such power as may be necessary to enforce the judgments of the Railroad Labor Board. Otherwise the Government may as well save expense and avoid further humiliation by abolishing this Board whose decisions are contemptuously disregarded and whose authority is defied with impunity.

The present attempt of the striking railroad shopmen to tie up the railroads is a strike, not against the railroads, but against the Government, the law and the people, and amounts to a rebellious effort to nullify the recent decision of the Railroad Labor Board reducing the shopmen's pay by cutting off a part of the wage increase awarded them by the same Board more than two years ago. They are trying to force the nation and the Government to yield submissively to their will under threat of inflicting a food-and-fuel famine on the people, and in furtherance of their policy of frightfulness this strike has been attended in many places by outrageous acts of violence against persons and property, including the ditching of locomotives, attempts to wreck trains, assaults and the infliction of bodily injuries on fellow workmen who refused to join them in the strike or took the jobs that they had quit, and on railroad officials. In some places their riotous lawlessness has been such as to require the pacifying services of the National Guard.

We have not space at this time to discuss the merits of the Railroad Labor Board's decision against which the strike is aimed. But it should be borne in mind that this Board is composed of nine members, of whom three represent the railroad interests, three are railroad labor men, and the other three are prominent citizens chosen to represent the rights and interests of the public which ultimately has to pay the railway wage bill in the form of freight and passenger rates. The decision was objected to by the three labor members, but was approved by the other six including the three disinterested and unprejudiced representatives of the public.

In fact the railroads are subject to governmental control to such an extent that they have little if any voice or power in the matter which is the cause of the strike, for the wages that they must pay are determined, not by their own managers but by the Railroad Labor Board, while the freight and passenger rates that they may collect are fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission which, of course, has to take into consideration the wage cost. The several raises of railroad wages have necessarily been followed by compensatory raises of transportation charges resulting in the present high freight and passenger rates. Following the Railroad Labor Board's reduction of trainmen's wages last year the Interstate Commission ordered a corresponding reduction in transportation rates which, nevertheless are still excessively high and burdensome to the public. The Railroad Labor Board claims that, compared with wages paid for like work in other employments, and considering the decline in the cost of living, the cut which it recently made in the wages of the railroad shopmen, clerks and maintenance-of-way men is fair to them and no more than justice to the public requires. No man or body of men should be permitted to decide his or their own case, especially when the controversy involves such dire consequences to the community.

The Coal Strike Problem

By virtue of the authority conferred by the interstate commerce clause of the U. S. Constitution Congress unquestionably has the power to regulate (as it does effectually through the Interstate Commerce Commission) the transportation charges and operation of the railroads, and to prevent railroad labor strikes, which it has attempted, though ineffectually, through the Railroad Labor Board. This defect can and should be remedied, as previously explained. But the application of governmental control to prevent strikes in the coal mines and consequent calamity of a nation-wide fuel shortage presents a more difficult problem. However it is believed that "in order to promote the general welfare", which is specified in the preamble of the Constitution as one of the purposes of the powers conferred on the Government, Congress has the power to establish such regulation of coal mining as to insure an uninterrupted supply of fuel requisite to the "general welfare."

But this does not imply necessity or justification for the Government to take over the ownership or assume direct management of the railroads or coal mines as proposed by Socialist and Communist propagandists. The demoralizing influence of politics and the inefficiency, wastefulness and graft characteristic of governmental conduct of business were so prominent in the Government's administration of the railroad, express, telegraph and telephone lines during the war as not to invite a repetition of that experiment. Private ownership is far more efficient and economical, but a certain degree of governmental regulation of big business is necessary to check abuses on the part of owners or workers or both (neither is free from fault) by which the public is made to suffer. And above all, the resort to lawless acts and threats as a means of aiding or promoting the interests of a strike must be promptly and severely dealt with.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

JOSEPHINE'S AMBITION.

MRS. Richards' vision of magnificence bade fair to be realized; for, upon arriving in London in November, she and her family were most courteously received by the firm of Compton & Bailey, who assured her that her credentials and proofs of her relationship to Sir Charles were incontestable.

"I do not see, madam, anything to prevent you from taking possession of the property," Mr. Compton said, in his most affable tones. "Your identity is proved beyond a question as to the cousin or half-cousin of Sir Charles, and, so far as we have been able to learn, you are the only living relative. Lord William Thornton—Sir Charles' father—had a younger brother, but he left his home years ago to go as a missionary to the heathen, and has never been heard of since; so it is reasonable to suppose that he also is dead, and, as he was unmarried, of course left no issue. It will take a month or so to get things in order for you, and if at the end of that time everything remains as it is now, you can then take possession of your estate, and I am very happy to offer my congratulations upon your good fortune."

Mrs. Richards' face glowed with pride and happiness; Josephine was jubilant, while Mr. Richards was too astonished to be able to really appreciate this sudden turning of fortune's wheel in their favor.

The rent roll of Halowell Park was fifty thousand pounds or more per annum; then there was a fine residence in London, and a seaside resort at Cowes.

It was, indeed, a fortune, coming just at that time of need, calculated to turn one's head, so to speak.

"It is too good to be true," Mr. Richards said, with a doubtful shake of the head. "Ellen, we don't deserve any such good fortune," he added, remorsefully, as his mind went back to their treatment of Mr. Rosevelt and Star.

"Nonsense, George!" she retorted, scornfully. "We deserve whatever we can get, and I mean to enjoy this windfall to the utmost. I reckon that jade will find it hard work to outshine us after this, and Uncle Jacob's grand airs won't trouble me in the least in the future. I shall go down to Halowell Park this week, see for myself what kind of a place it is, and what repairs and improvements are needed on the estate," she concluded, ready to spend money with her accustomed energy and lavishness.

Accordingly, in a few days they repaired thither, and were charmed with the grand old place.

On their return to London they visited the late Sir Charles' town house, and found that in keeping with the estate in Devonshire, and surely their prospects appeared to be as bright as they or any one could wish.

One evening Mr. Compton, the lawyer, who was one of the first among his profession in the city, invited them to his mansion to meet some of his friends, and they were introduced to a number of people who frequented the highest circles in the great city.

Among others, they met Lady Sherbrooke and her charming daughter, Vivien, and who, they were not long in discovering, greatly to their joy, were the mother and sister of Lord Carrol.

Mrs. Richards was exultant over this piece of good luck, as she deemed it, and tried to make herself very agreeable to her ladyship, while Josephine sought to ingratiate herself with the younger lady.

"I had the pleasure of meeting your son, Lord Carrol, when he was in America," Mrs. Richards remarked, during her conversation with the young lord's mother.

"Indeed!" she said, looking interested at once, for her children were an all-absorbing topic at any time with her.

"Yes; we first met him at Long Branch, a fashionable watering place, and he afterward favored us with a visit of a few days at our country seat, in Yonkers."

Mrs. Richards was determined to make the most out of the advantages she had enjoyed.

"Ah, yes, I believe he has told me something about it," the lady responded, while she thought that if such were the case she must arrange in some way to return the compliment thus paid to her idolized son.

If they were successors to Sir Charles Thornton, they would occupy no mean position in the social world, she reasoned, and it would be no more than right to cultivate their acquaintance, while she could but acknowledge that Mrs. Richards was quite a superior appearing woman, and Josephine possessed beauty of a very brilliant type.

The half hour that she spent conversing with Mrs. Richards only served to strengthen the good opinion she had at first formed, and before they left Mr. Compton's she had arranged with them to spend a portion of the following week at their estate in Cheshire.

This was more than Mrs. Richards had expected, but she plumed herself upon her tact in managing things so cleverly, and looked forward to the visit with no small amount of interest.

The next day, through Lady Sherbrooke's influence, she received cards for a grand reception at Lady Tukesbury's, who resided in a palatial mansion in Piccadilly, and she felt assured that they were now fully launched upon a brilliant career.

Of course they accepted the invitation, she appearing in black velvet, point lace and diamonds, while Josephine was resplendent in rich white silk and scarlet verbenas.

"Who is she? Where did she come from?" was whispered on all sides.

"An American. Ah! that accounts for her brilliant style of beauty, then. Inherit Sir Charles Thornton estates, do they? In that case they will be quite an acquisition to society," were the opinions expressed and the conclusions arrived at by people who were careful in such matters; and then seekers for introductions—and seekers for fortunes—pressed forward for an introduction to the beautiful young heiress.

But not withstanding Josephine enjoyed herself, and felt no small degree of pride at receiving these attentions from lords and baronets, she found herself looking everywhere for one familiar form, one dark, handsome face, which she had never forgotten, and which she knew she should recognize anywhere and under any circumstances.

"Mamma, I wonder if Lord Carrol is here?" she whispered, when once during the evening they happened to be together.

"I don't know; I will ask Lady Sherbrooke if I have an opportunity," she replied.

She managed to get near her ladyship soon after, and asked:

"Is your son out of town, Lady Sherbrooke?"

"No; he is not out of town. He had another engagement tonight, but he said he would drop in in season to take us home," Lord Carrol's mother returned. "Ah! there he is now," she added, as she saw him approaching, and her face lighted with both pride and pleasure.

He appeared to be greatly surprised to find Mrs. Richards there, but greeted her politely, although she felt the restraint in his manner which he could not quite conceal.

She beckoned to Josephine, who was not far distant, and presented her, with a feeling of pride in her brilliant beauty that she did not try to hide.

He shook hands with her, though his face flushed as he remembered the awkward position in which she had placed him at Yonkers by misrepresenting the motive of his visit there.

"You did not come to see us again before leaving America, after all," she said, in tones of playful reproach, when they had exchanged greetings.

"No; my time was so fully occupied that I found it impossible to make any calls," he returned, a shade of sadness coming into his fine eyes as he thought of how his time had been employed and the unhappiness it had caused him.

"You received my little package, I perceive," Josephine said, glancing at the cameo upon his hand, and with a flush rising to her cheeks.

"Yes; did you not receive my acknowledgment of it?" he asked, in surprise.

"No; I have never heard anything from you," she answered, with downcast eyes.

"But I wrote, thanking you. You must have thought me lacking in courtesy," Lord Carrol said, regretfully.

"No—but—Lord Carrol, there has been a misunderstanding about that jewel from the first. I really do not know what you believe regarding it, for your note was somewhat ambiguous, and I trust you will allow me to explain more fully to you some time how I happened to have it," Josephine replied, with an appealing glance at him from her brilliant dark eyes.

He bowed somewhat coldly in return. He could not forget that his darling had said that she stole it from her—that one little treasure which she had prized more than anything else in the world, and there could be no excuse for, no explanation of, an act so cowardly and cruel, he thought.

"I little thought that day at Long Branch, when Mrs. Richards was telling me that you were relatives of Sir Charles Thornton, that you would eventually become his heirs," Lord Carrol remarked.

"Mamma thought of it, however, although she did not really expect anything of the kind. Do you remember her asking you if Sir Charles had any family?"

"Yes."

"Well, she knew that there were very few relatives, and she did wonder then who would inherit the estates if he should die childless. But it seems like some romantic tale to me. I can scarcely realize it even yet."

"I should judge," he said, smiling, "if I could form any opinion from the court which I saw you holding as I entered, that you would be considered quite an acquisition in London circles."

He did not say that he should consider her such, and a thrill of pain shot through her heart at his indifference; but she appeared to take it as a personal compliment from him, and answered, with a shy look:

"Thank you; I find it very pleasant to be here, at all events."

Her tone, her glance, and the emphasis which she threw into that last sentence, would have turned half the heads in that room, but they did not move him in the least.

He was constantly thinking of a fair, sweet face, framed in gold; of azure eyes, with white lids and long, curling lashes, and smiling coral lips, with the gleam of small white teeth between; of his bright, beautiful Star—the light of his life.

Josephine kept him at her side for half an hour or more, and then she was obliged to release him, and fulfill an engagement to dance.

But her heart was full of passionate longing to win his love; he had never appeared so grand and manly to her before; and as she stood before her glass that night, after her return from Lady Tukesbury's reception, and removed the flowers from her hair and bosom, she said, while she set her small white teeth resolutely together:

"I will move heaven and earth to win him; I will bend all my energies to become Lady Carrol. A whole year has passed and he has not married; there was not even any one present tonight to whom he paid particular attention, and it cannot be possible that he is still grieving for that milk-and-water beauty, Star Gladstone. No; I have the field clear to myself, and I swear I will yet be Countess of Carrol."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE MOCK MARRIAGE.

When Lady Sherbrooke informed her son that she had invited Mr. Richards and his family to spend the following week with them at their country residence, and to help them make merry with a number of their friends, his face clouded instantly, and she saw that he was not pleased with the arrangement.

"Have I done anything wrong, Archie?" she asked, much disturbed. "I thought you would be pleased. They spoke of your spending several days with them when you were in America, and I supposed you would be glad to return the civility."

His lips had curled slightly when she mentioned that they had told of his visit to Yonkers, He thought they should have preferred to keep it to themselves, rather than boast of it in order to get a return, under the circumstances.

But he said nothing of this, and answered, as brightly as he could:

"No, mother, dear; you have done nothing wrong, and I will try and make myself as agreeable as possible to your guests. But I must confess that neither Mrs. nor Miss Richards is agreeable to me."

"Why, Archie?"

"I would prefer to say nothing just now, since they are coming to visit us. Perhaps some time I can tell you why," he answered, thoughtfully.

"I am sorry," Lady Sherbrooke returned, regretfully, while she studied her son's face wistfully. "I wish I had known of this in season to have avoided anything so extremely unpleasant. But they were so profuse in their praises of you that I supposed of course that you reciprocated their friendliness."

"Never mind," he said, lightly; "a week will not be very long. No doubt Miss Richards—who, I admit, is a very brilliant girl—will be a great addition to your party, and I would not have any little whim of mine mar it for the world."

"Archie, did you ever——" began his mother, with a startled, rueful glance at him, as it suddenly came to her that there might be a more serious reason for this than she had dreamed.

But he interrupted her with a laugh.

"No, mother; I never did," he said, with an amused gleam in his eyes. "And now ask me nothing more at present, please; but when your guests are all gone, I have a little story for your ear, and shall want a share of sympathy and counsel from your wise head and great heart."

Cheshire House, situated about a dozen miles out from London, was filled to overflowing during the following week, and everybody appeared to anticipate a season of intense enjoyment.

The hospitable hostess and her lovely daughter, assisted by Lord Carrol, spared no effort to make it a memorable one; and when, right in the midst of it all, Ralph Meredith came by special invitation, one, at least, of that merry number, felt that everything was complete, and nothing more to be wished for.

The last night of their stay there had been set apart for a great time.

The evening was to be spent in games, private theatricals and masquerade until twelve o'clock, after which hour they were to "trip the light fantastic toe" as long as they liked.

Vivien Sherbrooke and Josephine Richards were declared by each and all to be the belles of the evening, notwithstanding they were entirely different in the style of their beauty.

There could not be much doubt regarding Josephine's sentiments toward his lordship, for, as they stood for a few moments together beneath an arch of evergreen which had been erected at one end of the hall, her face was raised to his, as she listened to what he was saying, with a tender, almost rapt expression, and her eyes were humid with the love which filled her heart for him.

He thought that she had never appeared to so much advantage as now. During all her stay at Cheshire House she had been more kind and gentle, more womanly than he had ever seen her before; and now he lingered by her side, realizing how very beautiful she was, and feeling almost as if he had wronged her in the past by judging her so harshly, and his manner involuntarily became more gracious and friendly toward her.

She saw it, and it made her heart bound with a wild hope, and she became so radiant, so fascinating and bewildering, that he wondered if he had indeed been nourishing an unjust prejudice against her.

Lady Sherbrooke saw them standing there, apparently oblivious of everything and everybody else, and an anxious look shot into her face, for she had studied Miss Richards during her unguarded moments the past week, reading her character like an open book with her womanly intuition, and she knew that she would never make a good man happy.

Suddenly one merry sprite appeared to be possessed by a novel idea of some kind, and went flitting about the room, whispering, laughing and making signs at the pair under the evergreen arch.

The company, who were mostly young people, appeared to join in with her proposals, whatever they were, and at length she danced gayly up to Lord Carrol and Josephine, saying, eagerly:

"Archie"—she had known him all her life, and being intimate in the family, felt privileged to address him thus—"Archie, we have been arranging such capital fun, and we want you to agree to help us in it."

"Certainly I will assist you. You know you are to do exactly as you like tonight, and get all the enjoyment you can out of this occasion."

"Oh, you are perfectly delightful! Isn't he, Miss Richards?" returned the merry girl, with a glance at Josephine, and the look which that young lady shot at him, half startled but wholly admiring, together with the flush which leaped into her cheeks, answered the question better than any words could have done.

"Well, granted that I am all that," Lord Carrol said, laughing, "what next?"

"We are going to have a mock marriage—everybody has agreed that it will be something new under the sun, and we're just in the mood for a wedding or any event equally exciting. It is almost on the stroke of twelve, and it will be just the thing to wind up with before we begin our dancing."

"Don't you think it will seem like trifling with a serious subject?" Lord Carrol asked, rather gravely.

"Oh, no. Of course we do not mean anything wrong; it is only for a little fun, and we do so want a bride to lead off in the dance," replied the thoughtless girl.

"Well," the young man returned, lightly, "anything you like, only do not let the ceremony be too tedious, for I am ready for my dance, and I believe I shall ask you to be my first partner, Minnie. But who are you going to have for victims?" he concluded, unsuspicious of the trap he was walking into.

"Oh, you're to be the groom, and Miss Richards the bride. She is the only one in the room who is dressed all in white, as a bride should be, and this green arch is just the place for the ceremony to be performed."

Lord Carrol felt anything but comfortable over this arrangement. He glanced at Josephine to see how she would take it. But she stood with downcast eyes, looking the picture of lovely confusion, a beautiful color in her face, while he noticed that the hand which held her fan trembled visibly.

Lord Henderson said he would play parson and "pronounce the banns," the merry child rattled on, "and he is so portly he will make a first-rate one. Now, Archie, you and Miss Richards go into the anteroom yonder, so as to come in like a real bridal party. Wait, there is that lovely lace shawl of Lady Orton's; she will lend it, I know, for a veil, and it will be just the thing. Now don't stand there like a pair of bashful lovers, for it's only play, you know," she added, saucily.

"Well, Miss Richards, Miss Shelton intends to have everything her own way, and I do not see but what we shall be obliged to help her carry out her plans," Lord Carrol said, trying to speak lightly, and to make the best of a very—to him—disagreeable situation.

"You certainly do resemble a bride in your dress," he added, "more than any one else in the room, and, if agreeable to you, we will assist at the little piece of folly just to please the children."

If he could but have known of the tumult that was raging within her at the mere mention of such a ceremony in connection with him, he would not have called it that—it would have been sacrilege!

She was trembling like a leaf, and she knew that that marriage service, though but the meaningless freak of a wild girl, would seem as solemn to her as if he were really to make her his wife.

He offered her his arm, and they retired to the anteroom together, and Lord Carrol could not help perceiving the strange thrill which pervaded the girl's whole frame as her hand came in contact with his arm.

But they were not left long alone, for Miss Shelton soon came tripping in with an exquisite point lace shawl hanging over her arm.

"Everybody is on the qui vive," she said, breathlessly, "and we must not keep them waiting. Sit down, Miss Richards, on this divan, and let me pin this shawl on your head; it will make a lovely bridal veil. There, Lord Carrol, don't she charming?" she asked, after she had dexterously arranged it in graceful folds. "Doesn't she look like a real bride?"

"I think your efforts have been eminently successful to make her appear like one," he answered, smiling; and certainly Josephine was as lovely as it was possible for any one to be.

Lord Carrol felt very uneasy, but he offered his arm to Josephine again, and her hand fell upon it, white and soft as a snowflake.

They passed out into the great ballroom and paused under the green arch, while murmurs of surprise and admiration greeted them from every side, for the addition of the lace shawl to Josephine's already charming toilet had greatly enhanced her appearance.

Two or three young girls, led by Minnie Shelton, advanced and took their station by her side to act as bridesmaids, and then Lord Henderson, clad in a long white robe improvised for the occasion, came forward and read the marriage service.

When the ring was called for, the gay girl who had planned all this reached behind the bride and tucked one into Lord Carrol's hand.

He was strangely impressed, a feeling of awe, a chill, creeping over him as he felt it and thought of its significance. But he took it and put it on the finger of the mock bride, repeating "with this ring I wed thee, and all my goods endow thee," feeling as if he were going through a mock ry almost too horrible to endure.

Josephine, too, trembled visibly, while the hand that he held was as cold as ice.

She would have given the world to have been able to control herself, for she feared that the company would suspect something of the truth in her heart, but she could not.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

IN order to use more letters than usual, shorter ones have been selected and these have been cut down to even shorter lengths. This gives a greater number of readers the opportunity of joining in the conversation as no one sister would wish to monopolize the conversation were we to meet in person, a short letter in this instance does as well as a longer one. Forgive me if I make your letters sound like telegrams.—Ed.

A young sister, Edna Warren, of Shepherdsville, Ky., sends in the poem that is printed below. It's worth reading and thinking over.

If with pleasure you are viewing any work a man is doing,
If you like it or you love him, tell him now;
Don't withhold your approbation 'til the parson makes oration,
And he lies with lilies o'er his brow.
For no matter how you shout it, he won't really care about it,
He won't know how many teardrops you have shed;
If you think some praise is due him,
Now's the time to slip it to him,
For he cannot read his tombstone when he's dead.

More than fame and more than money is the comment, kind and sunny,
And the hearty, warm approval of a friend;
For it gives to life a savor and it makes you, stronger, braver,
And it gives you heart and spirit to the end.
If he earns your praise, bestow it;
If you like him, let him know it;
Let the words of true encouragement be said.
Do not wait 'til life is over and he's underneath the clover,
For he cannot read his tombstone when he's dead.

CONESUS, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:
I am the mother of five children, three boys and two girls, so you see why I enjoy the sisters' letters.
We came from Washington the first of the year. While we were living in the West we bought our flour in cloth sacks and when these sacks were washed and bleached I made many pretty and useful things from them. Six sacks, joined together with rickrack braid made a good table-cloth for everyday use. A friend of mine had a pretty luncheon set and apron to match made of the sacks. The luncheon cloth had a teapot, tip and saucer embroidered in bright colors in each corner, and the six napkins had a cup and saucer embroidered in one corner. The apron was embroidered with the same design. She also had pillow slips made of the unbleached muslin, with the hems of pink gingham and a rose of the pink put on with the short-and-long stitch in white embroidery thread.
I had a lovely pink primrose but small flies got in the roots. I put a small amount of wood ashes around the plant and it not only killed the flies but made it much stronger.
Love to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters.

MRS. FLOYD WESTER.

Mrs. Wester.—Your letter came almost not getting printed this month. I was strongly in favor of saying it until later, to be printed with some other Christmas suggestions I have been accumulating from time to time. If anyone has any ideas for homemade Christmas gifts, now is the time to send them in. Don't put it off any longer.—Ed.

INDIANA.

DEAR COMFORT READERS:
Do not censure the "steps" too much. Their life isn't an easy one. I know whereof I speak. A woman entering the home in the capacity of stepmother with outsiders talking to the children, has lots of thorns in her path. I have three steps and one of my own and now husband and I have another sweet boy. We get along better than some families that are not so mixed up. My own youngster lives mostly with my parents but the children here write to him and talk about the good times we will have when brother comes to see us. My stepdaughter is twelve and small for her age. She helps me with the work and I am trying to teach her all that a good girl should be and know. She is also learning to do all kinds of housework, but not all at once. Instead of saying "Do this," or "You must do that," I say, "Which would you rather do," or "Would you like to try this today?" She almost invariably takes the choice of some new work, thereby learning one more thing. She hates to wash dishes and if possible I always help her. Her little brother, five years old, can dry the dishes and pick things up from the floor. He enjoys helping me and when I was sick he said to me, "If I don't help you, you might die like my other mamma." When I bake cookies or bread he always bakes too. I tell him if his hands are clean he can help me. You should see him fly for the wash basin.
The worst trouble is outside talk. Their grandmother talks to others and in a roundabout way it gets to the children, that I make them work too hard, that they won't grow, etc. Their father does not allow them to visit her but they hear it. Why won't people mind their own business when others are trying to do the best they can?
To the Mother of Two Children, I'd say, if you are willing to give and take you can be as happy with another man but I would not advise you to marry a man that has children. There is too much strife and contention, and it require a lot of patience to get along, especially if he happens to be of a jealous disposition. My husband and I had an understanding about the children before we were married. When one corrects the other keeps still and they almost always come to me when in trouble rather than go to him and I have most of the correcting to do.
May I come again?

B. W.

SEVIERVILLE, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:
I find it nice to get COMFORT and turn to the Sisters' Corner with its many helpful letters. Those who do not take COMFORT do not realize what they are losing in life.
I am an ex-soldier's wife, twenty-eight years old. Am five feet, two inches tall and weigh 160 pounds. I have light hair and a fair complexion. I live on a farm and have a real good husband.
I have a son twenty months old who shows an ungovernable temper and is stubborn. He seems to understand almost everything I say to him but he doesn't talk much. He is obedient at times and at other times it is almost impossible to do anything with him. He will get fighting mad and throw something into the fire or break it. Can anyone help me?
Wishing you happiness and prosperity,
Your COMFORT Sister, MRS. LEVATON OGLE.

MT. OLIVE, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:
Descriptions seem to be in order so I will give you a brief picture of myself. I am nineteen years old and have been married two years. Have blue eyes, dark brown curly hair and am about five and one-half feet tall. My baby girl is four and one-half months old and weighs eighteen pounds and has one little tooth. Don't you think that is doing well?
I have read several articles on Better Kitchens but I never read one that appealed to me as much as Clara Huntington's article in the March number. My husband and I are planning on building our house this fall if we have good luck, and I intend having my kitchen fixed up that way as I know the value of a cozy, warm kitchen on cold winter days.
I want to pass on to you a little advice that has helped me. Do you, when making a cake, ever pay any attention to the terms, "folding," "beating" and "stirring?" And have you ever thought how wrong stirring and putting together will cause a cake to be heavy and soggy? "Creaming" is another term which means to measure out the sugar and butter (or shortening) and cream it together; a good way to do this is to take the back of a spoon and mash the sugar and butter together until well mixed and creamy. Then add required number of eggs and beat. When the flour is put in it must be "stirred" which is a rotary movement, to prevent destroying the air cells caused by beating, then the whites of the eggs must be beaten to a stiff froth and folded in with a gentle motion of taking the batter in the spoon and folding over and over until the whites of the eggs cannot be seen. If you will follow this plan of putting a cake together you will be rewarded with a light, fluffy cake.
Love to all.

G. H. K.

MALVERN, IOWA.

HELLO EVERYBODY:
I have read lots of discussions on children but have not read anything as to whether it is best to rear one child alone. I would like to have this discussed in this corner. I have one child, a little girl, three years old. I was married young. I enjoy keeping my house clean, making garden and best of all, raising chickens. I love to work out of doors. I make my spending money from chickens.
I am going to get some dotted muslin and make curtains and bedspread to match, trimmed with linen lace. They will be nice and not expensive.
We moved again this spring. We have a six-room house and a good place to raise chickens. This makes our second year of farming. We moved six times in three years so I'm getting to be an old hand at the game. If any of the sisters need help, just call on me.
With love and best wishes,

JEFF.

Jeff.—Yes, and why not give us the benefit of your experiences in moving. You must be more or less of an authority on the subject by this time and able to find the things you need when you want them instead of being obliged to wait patiently until they turn up of their own free will. That's been my experience in moving. I always say, "I hope this will be the last time."—Ed.

NORCATUR, KANS.

DEAR COMFORT FAMILY:
The top o' the morning to yez. I thought if I started early I might get in so here I am at 7 A. M. Some family we have. Mrs. Wilkinson's middle name must be Patience, else how can she watch over such a bunch.
Country Reader, if you enjoy using a saw and hammer as much as I do I don't wonder you lathe. I truly wish I were a carpenter.
Daisy Whiteman, I agree with you about the movies. There are pictures, to be sure, that are all wrong. Others are all right and that is the kind the children and I go to occasionally. If there happens to be some part that doesn't seem just right, just be thankful it's no worse.
I am wondering why so many think it just the thing for Molly-Joe to marry. Hasn't the dear girl had enough trouble for a while? Here's wishing her good luck in whatever she attempts.
Sarah, no wonder you are delighted with the promised visit of your mother. What a glad time it was for me when my dear mother was coming. The very softest bed, the easiest chair and the very best "eats" I could fix up were all for her. After her visit was over how lonely I was.
To the sister who asked how to make plants bloom through the winter I would say give them lots of love (did I hear someone laugh?), and plenty of water and sunshine. I have many blooming now. Primroses are great winter bloomers.
Two widths of unbleached muslin put together with a three-inch border around it makes a very neat and durable everyday table-cloth. I prefer dyeing some of the muslin for the border as one is more apt to get a good bright, fast color that way.
Two flour sacks, dyed some bright color and made into a dress for a child is pretty and wears like gingham. If it is finished with some design of the now popular applique in contrasting color it looks real nifty.
I take delight in making pretty somethings out of nothing. Maybe it is because I have always had to.

WHISTLING RUFUS.

BLACK RIVER, MICH.

DEAR SISTERS:
I didn't knock but walked right in. I hope you will ask me to take a chair among you. I think COMFORT is like a nice warm fire on a raw, chilly day. There's something about COMFORT that I cannot describe, something friendly, but all of you know what I mean. Every letter is like meeting a new person.
I have been married six years and have two lovable children, one four years and the other two months, both girls.
Now let me give you a few helps in return for the many I have gotten from you.
If you have plenty of wheat and only a little money, try browning the wheat and crushing it slightly and using it as a substitute for coffee. It makes a delicious and healthful drink. If desired, a little real coffee can be put in with the wheat when nearly browned and grind or crush all together. Keep it in an airtight can.
If butter is too hard to serve do not melt it but fill a bowl with boiling water and let it remain in it until the bowl is thoroughly heated through. Pour the water out and turn the hot bowl over the butter. This will soften it but none will be wasted.
I hope to hear from some of the sisters as I am alone much of the time.
Good luck to all.

MRS. CLARENCE DECKETT.

Mrs. Deckett.—You said the nicest thing ever about COMFORT when you likened it to a warm fire on a cold day. Thank you.—Ed.

RIVERDALE, MICH.

DEAR FRIENDS:
I have been a reader of COMFORT for six years. It surely is deserving of its name. I read the Cubby Bear stories to my children at bedtime. How many mothers have your children take afternoon naps? I have a boy of six and a girl of four and I don't believe they have missed half-a-dozen naps since they were born. It is a rest to the mother and children learn to look forward to it.
How many of you enjoy out-of-door life? I do and help my husband on the farm sometimes.
I am five feet, four inches tall and weigh 160 pounds. Have brown hair and eyes. My motto is, "Do as you wish to be done by," and you will have scores of friends if you follow this rule.

MRS. O. F. MACK.

TENNESSEE.

HOWDY FOLKS:
Just thought I'd drop in to see what you were doing and to hear the news. I know most of you for I'm an old reader. If Mrs. W. turns me out I can pat myself on the back for having nerve enough to try anyway and I always try to be a good loser as well as a good winner.
How many of you girls are troubled with a stubborn temper? I know you don't like to admit it but I'm going to 'fess up that I am and that it purty nigh gets the best of me sometimes. When I get real angry I repeat this poem and it helps me cool off:

"Keep a watch on your words, my darlings,
For words are wonderful things;
They are sweet like the bees' fresh honey;
Like the bees, they have terrible stings.
They can bless like the warm, glad sunshine
And brighten a lonely life,
They can cut in the strife of anger
Like a cruel two-edged knife.

"Keep them back if they are cold and cruel,
Under bar and lock and seal;
For, the wounds they make, my darlings,
Are always slow to heal.
May peace guard your lips forever,
From the time of your early youth,
May the words that you daily utter
Be the beautiful words of truth."

How many try to see something good or beautiful in everyone you meet? I think there are good traits in almost everyone if we would only take the trouble to look for them. When we see one of our companions fall by the wayside, let's stop and try to give him a lift. Give him a kind word and a smile and encourage him to do better. That's better than going to some of your friends and telling them what you saw and heard. You don't know how much this help means unless you have had the bitter experience of having fallen by the wayside. I want to say here that I once was almost friendless, through a great mistake I was led to make by one whom I thought was my best friend. A kind word and a smile was worth dollars to me and if it had not been for the loving kindness and friendly advice of some of my good Christian friends I shudder at the thought of what I might have been today. I am striving to move onward and upward instead of sinking lower. As Emerson says, "I find the great thing in the world is not so much where we stand as in the direction we are moving."

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

Fall Pickling

FOR a long time I have thought of every COMFORT Sister as possessing a large and particularly active sweet tooth, judging by the cake, pie and pudding recipes that were sent me. I used to wonder if you didn't have an occasional beef stew or boiled dinner and have a haunting suspicion that I said something like that to you. My humble apologies, and my thanks for the pickle, marmalade and catsup recipes below. Most any of the pickles would "go" well with the Spanish beef, in center illustration, and any left-over marmalade could be used as filling for the tarts, though the apricot filling that is given is very good.—Ed.

EGGPLANT BAKED WITH TOMATO.—Slice and peel one eggplant and let it stand in strongly salted water 20 minutes. Pile the slices, cover with an inverted plate and on top place a weight to press out the water. This process makes the eggplant much finer in flavor and texture. Butter a baking dish, place a layer of eggplant, then a layer of sliced ripe tomatoes, and top with grated cheese, bits of butter, a little salt and pepper. Judgment is necessary in the matter of seasoning, it depending on the salt already in cheese and eggplant, and the "bite" of the cheese. Repeat layers until all is used, then sprinkle with fine cracker-crumbs and bake until tender. The dish should be covered the first 20 minutes.

SPANISH BEEF AND SPINACH.—Dice meat left from another meal. Add one onion, salt, pepper, paprika, green peppers, parsley, celery seed, garlic and savory. Simmer this concoction in a little meat stock. Form into balls, surrounding it with cooked spinach and slices of beets.—MARY HARROD NORTHEND, Salem, Mass.

FRUIT BUTTERS.—Sound fruit, though small and imperfect, may be used for butters. Prepare it carefully, discarding the poor parts. Cut fruit such as pears, apples and quinces in pieces. Add water barely to cover for hard fruits and as little as possible for juicy fruits, such as grapes. Cook very slowly until soft. Rub through a sieve to remove skins, seeds and cores. Reheat the pulp to evaporate the water until it is thick. A double boiler may be used or the kettle set in a pail of water to prevent burning. If cooked by direct heat, constant stirring is necessary. Add spices, ground cinnamon and clove if desired. Pour while hot into sterilized jars, adjust rubbers and covers. Place jars in a boiler of water and let remain twenty minutes, timing the sterilizing from the time the water boils over the jars. Then lower the clamp to seal and invert. Grape or apple syrup may be added to the pulp when boiled down, giving a richer product. The blended flavors are often an improvement and less sugar need be added later.—United States Food Administration.

SPANISH BEEF AND SPINACH.

MIXED PICKLE.—Two quarts string beans, two quarts lima beans, two quarts sugar corn, two quarts tiny onions, two quarts tiny cucumbers, two quarts cabbage, cut fine, two quarts green tomatoes, two bunches celery, one head of cauliflower, one dozen sweet red peppers, all cut fine, two and one-half pounds of sugar, one-quarter pound mustard seed, one-eighth pound celery seed, three tablespoons salt, one ounce tumeric and vingear to cover. Cook string beans and lima beans in salt water until tender, drain and add to other mixture. Cook all twenty minutes then seal in airtight jars. —MRS. A. WILLIG, Glenarm, Md.

PLUM SHORTCAKE.—Sift together two cups of sifted flour, two tablespoons of sugar, three-fourths teaspoon of salt, and two teaspoons of baking powder. Work in two tablespoons of butter. Beat one egg very light and mix in one-half cup of sweet milk, and add this to the dry mixture. Beat hard. Without kneading, spread the dough evenly in a greased round tin Bake in a quick oven until brown. Split, and butter generously, and cover with plums previously prepared as follows: Remove the stones by cutting open lengthwise at one side. Drop into a boiling heavy syrup and simmer until the skins are tender. Remove the plums which should retain their shape, boil down the juice, add a little butter, grated orange peel and a pinch of cinnamon, and pour over the shortcake when cool.

INDIA RELISH.—One gallon green tomatoes, four large onions, three red peppers, three green peppers. Chop all fine and mix with large handful of salt. Let stand over night. In morning drain well. Add three cups brown sugar, one tablespoon each of black pepper, cloves and allspice, three tablespoons of mustard seed, two tablespoons of celery seed, two pints good vinegar (more if too dry). Cook about half an hour, being careful it doesn't scorch. Seal in jars or bottles.

APRICOT TARTS.—Make puff pastry and roll thin. For the bottom crust cut the pastry whole, but for the rings cut out the center to within half an inch of the edge. Between rings, moisten with a little cold water. Bake in a very hot oven.

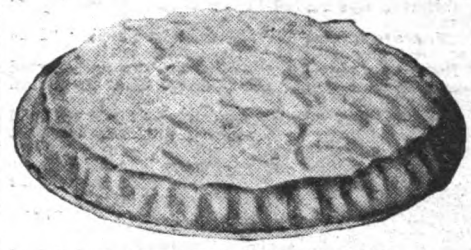
FILLING.—Soak apricots in cold water about one hour, or until the skins will easily slip off. Cover with fresh cold water and soak over night. Cook hard about fifteen minutes, then put through a colander. Sweeten to taste. Take about two cups of the mashed apricots, bring to a boil, and add one level tablespoon of butter mixed with one tablespoon of corn-starch. Cook five minutes and then pour the mixture over two well-beaten egg yolks. Beat, return to fire and cook two minutes. When cold, fill pastry shells.



PEPPER HASH.—One dozen red peppers, one dozen green peppers, three large onions. Chop all very fine. Cover with boiling water and let stand ten minutes. Drain well. Cover again and let come to a boil. Set aside ten minutes and drain well again. Add three tablespoons salt, one pint vinegar, one cup of sugar and cook fifteen minutes. Put in jars and seal.

CARROT PICKLES.—Select carrots of uniform size, to fit into jars. Cook until tender and let cool. Prepare a liquid as follows: One cup sugar, two tablespoons mixed spices, and one quart of vinegar. Boil five minutes. Pack the carrots in sterilized jars, pour the boiling liquid over them until jar is full, clamp on the lid, loosely, and boil fifteen minutes. Put on fresh rubbers and tighten lids.—MRS. WALTER LAMAN, Delphos, O.

PICKLED PEACHES.—One gallon of peaches (with seeds), one cup of sugar, one-half cup of vinegar, and one-half cup of water. Put sugar, water and vinegar in pan with one teaspoon cloves and two teaspoons of cinnamon and let boil a few minutes; then add peaches and let cook until tender. Remove with fork and put into jars. Let syrup boil a while longer then pour over fruit and seal.—MRS. H. MOYER, Lesterville, Mo.

TO PICKLE SMALL ONIONS.—(Requested.) Select onions about as large around as a half dollar. Peel and boil slowly until soft but not mushy. Boil together vinegar, sugar, salt and spices, enough of the latter added to vinegar to suit taste. Some prefer very sour pickles. If vinegar is too strong, weaken with water. Drain water off onions, pack into jars, pour boiling vinegar mixture over them and seal. String or wax beans can be pickled in the same way. Choose beans that are from three to four inches in length, clean as for table use but do not break into smaller pieces. Cook until tender, and then cover with boiling vinegar mixture and seal.

ONE-CRUST APPLE PIE WITH CREAM.—Line a deep pie plate with pastry and shape the edge the same as for custard pie. Fill with early tart apples sliced fairly thin and over the top put three-fourths cup of sugar that has been mixed with two level teaspoons of flour.

ONE-CRUST APPLE PIE WITH CREAM.

Season with a little cinnamon and nutmeg, and dot with bits of butter. Place in a hot oven for ten minutes, then reduce the heat and bake 50 minutes. Let cool, and just before serving spread with whipped cream. Peach pie is made the same way, omitting the spice and using orange juice and a little water.

TO CAN STRING OR WAX BEANS.—The easiest and most certain way that I have found of canning string beans is as follows: Pick new, tender beans, string and break into halves. Put to cook in cold water over steady fire. Bring to boil, as soon as water begins to boil add to it one and one-half cup of vinegar to every gallon of beans in kettle. Boil for fifteen minutes; can in steaming, airtight jars and they will be sure to keep. When ready to use on table, pour off all juice, cook for twenty minutes in water to which a little soda has been added then finish cooking in clear water (have it hot when beans are cut into it) and season as desired.—BROADWAY ROSE, Maryland.

APRICOT MARMALADE.—Take equal parts of apricots and grated pineapple and add enough sugar to sweeten. Boil until thick.—MRS. OLON MAKADANZ, Ocheltree, Kansas.

The Winning Gamble

JUST for a moment Bonnie hesitated, then slowly she extended her hand.

"I accept your proposition," she said hoarsely. "When shall it be?"

"Nothing like the present for doing things," answered the man. "What do you say to right now?"

"The sooner the better," answered Bonnie carelessly. "I'm ready."

Justin pressed a button near at hand, and almost immediately James appeared.

"This young lady and I are to be married right away, James," he said pleasantly. "You will arrange the matter for us."

James' mouth flew open in astonishment, but a motion from Justin caused him to remain silent.

"You," he said, turning to Bonnie, "will please step into the adjoining room and make yourself comfortable until I call you."

When she was gone James hastily crossed the floor to Justin's side.

"I hope you are doing nothing foolish, Justin Hall," he said slowly.

"So do I," Justin answered, "but you see, that little fortune of Uncle John's will come in handy for us, and she won't bother us with her presence long."

"Oh, I see," said James with a smile, "sort of a buy, is it?"

"I wouldn't call it that," answered Justin quickly, "but we've agreed to get married and separate immediately."

"Will you change your dressing-gown for the occasion?" asked James.

"Certainly I will," retorted Justin. "A man doesn't get married often; he should look his best under any circumstances. Here, give me a shave and fix me up like a real groom."

In the next room Bonnie stood at the window that overlooked the flower bed on which Justin Hall was gazing when she entered his room, but instead of flowers, Bonnie was mentally visualizing her wedding as it would have been with Lawrence Trabue. All the Lathrop women who had preceded her had been married on the big veranda at Elmwood; in no instance had the rule been broken—she it was who was setting a new example for the rare old name. The name Bonnie Lathrop, she plainly visualized on the front page of a newspaper, wedded to Justin Hall, the noted gambler—the thought maddened her—then remembering the invalid at Elmwood, she crossed the room to a quaint little mirror and began making herself as attractive as possible.

When this was done she walked about the room until she was summoned to appear before Justin Hall.

With firm step she answered his summons and slowly advanced towards the man she was to marry. Her heart beat with excitement when her eyes fell upon Justin arrayed in a black velvet dressing-gown and snowy collar; he looked quite different from the man she had first beheld; in fact, he was extremely handsome—she wished with all her heart he wasn't the noted Gambler of the South.

"Come, little one," said Justin tenderly, "the minister will be here presently. "I just wanted to know whether or not you would be married under your own name."

Bonnie drew herself up proudly.

"I am a Lathrop," she said softly, "its women were never known to do anything shady."

Justin heaved a sigh of relief; he much preferred to be married to Bonnie Lathrop under her own name.

Presently the minister, followed by James and the gardener, entered the room, and Bonnie almost smiled in spite of herself at the ludicrous situation.

"We will be married by the ring ceremony, Rev. White," Justin said as he took from his pocket a slender golden circle and held it up for Bonnie's inspection.

"It was my mother's," he whispered, as Bonnie bowed her head over it. "Will you wear it?"

Bonnie nodded her head in the affirmative, and immediately the ceremony began. When it was over, the minister gave them his blessing and departed, and no sooner than the door had closed upon him, Justin presented Bonnie with a check for forty thousand dollars made payable to the bearer.

"You are indeed very kind," Bonnie stammered when she saw it, "and I am a most grateful girl."

"Don't bother about that," answered Justin, "just remember had it not been for you I would have lost that fortune, and I'd gambled on getting it, too."

"I'm glad, after all," responded Bonnie, "that it wasn't altogether generosity on your part that caused you to make that proposition to me."

"Well, you see, a gambler will gamble on anything," answered Justin, "and so far in life I've never lost a deal."

"You—you wouldn't gamble on me, would you?" Bonnie asked presently.

"I'm not so sure that I wouldn't," Justin declared as his eyes rested on the lovely face before him. "Just suppose," he went on joyously, "that I'd wager ten thousand dollars that I'd win your heart for my very own within five years."

"I'd say that you would know what it felt like to be a loser," answered Bonnie icily.

"You would?" laughed Justin. "Well, I'd like to know the feeling—what say you—how much shall we bet?"

"Since you'd have to pay the bet any way," answered Bonnie indignantly, "why not just keep it in the first place and gamble with yourself?"

"Good idea," chuckled the man. Reaching for a piece of paper on a nearby table, he hastily scribbled a few lines across it and handed it to Bonnie.

"Put that away," he said jokingly, "and keep it for your fifth anniversary, if I'm not with you."

"Thanks," said Bonnie. "I shall enjoy it."

"Don't be too sure," Justin responded. "You know Dr. West could be mistaken."

Bonnie looked down at the eager face before her, and the anguish in her own melted into a friendly smile.

"So far as that is concerned," she said softly, "I hope he is, for a man who would do what you have done today deserves a second chance—now I must be going."

Justin caught her slender hand in his and for an instant he gazed lovingly at the ring on her third finger. Bonnie, too, gazed at the circle, though to her it was a band of mockery. Suddenly their eyes met.

"When will you and your father be leaving?" the man asked eagerly.

"Immediately," answered Bonnie. "I should say within a few days at most."

"And I shall see you no more?" asked Justin slowly.

"No," responded Bonnie, "this is good by—for——ever——"

"Forever is a long time," Justin answered with a merry twinkle in his eye, "but taking it for granted that it is good by, I wonder if you'd mind kissing me just once."

Bonnie drew back perceptibly, but something in the eyes of the man seemed to hold her fascinated. He looked so thin and frail, so helpless and lonely. Bonnie's heart ached for him.

"You have been very kind to me," she said gently. "I think I wouldn't mind one kiss from you."

Stooping down, she allowed the man the coveted caress, then immediately she started towards the door.

At the entrance she turned back, and after one long, lingering look, she smiled.

Bonnie's smile sent the hot blood rushing through Justin's heart as nothing else had done since he had been hurt.

"Just add an additional five hundred to that last bet of mine," he called boyishly as Bonnie passed through the door.

When the girl had gone, Justin rang for his man, James.

"Old man," he said, when James entered the room, "you have been the best friend and secretary any man ever had—and now——"

"What now?" interrupted James laughingly. "Shall I steal back the bride you have let go?"

"No," answered Justin, "I wouldn't want her—that way. What I want you to do is to go to the court house and set a seal of silence on the clerk's lips. No matter what his price is, James," continued Justin as he laid a signed check in his secretary's hand, "buy it."

"Then we will mail the certificate of the marriage to your attorney," said James.

Justin picked up the certificate and eyed it carefully. The thing he held in his hand presented to his attorney would bring a small fortune which otherwise would go to a children's hospital; it would announce to the world his marriage with Bonnie Lathrop also, and she had wished her marriage might be kept a secret. For certain reasons of his own, he, too, preferred the marriage to be kept a secret.

"This, James," he said thoughtfully, "will go to the young lady."

"You mean you'll lose the money?" asked James in astonishment.

Justin nodded. "What does a few thousand dollars mean," he said falteringly, "to a man who already possesses plenty of money—and only six months of life?"

"But, Justin," said his old friend, "don't you think that's a very foolish act?"

"Perhaps," answered Justin, "but, James, for once in my life I'm foolish; I had as well admit to you now as well as later that it was love at first sight, and when I saw a chance of getting her I—I took it, that's all. You will deliver the certificate to her, won't you?"

"Yes, old Top," answered James laughingly, "I'll do anything in the world for you." And picking up his hat, he started on the first requested errand.

When he was alone again Justin picked up the certificate; with the name of Bonnie Lathrop came a mental vision of the beautiful young woman whom he had just married.

He remembered the slight pressure of her hands on his, the tears in her eyes and the gentle caress she had given him. Suddenly he looked down at the useless legs, and a peculiar expression came over his face. Then, straightening up in his chair, he began an exercise with his arms; with a bit of pride he noticed the muscles in them, also the chest expansion he was able to make. Then again his eyes traveled down his body to his useless legs; desperately he tried to move them but to no avail.

"There!" he exclaimed, suddenly giving his knee a sound blow, "you've got to move—you've got to learn to feel again—there's a reason for it—do you understand! Six months to live, eh? Well, we'll see! Anyway, I've got somebody to leave my fortune to, that's some consolation."

* * * * * *

Flushed with excitement over the thing she had done, yet beaming with joy over the money in her possession, Bonnie Lathrop brought her car to a standstill before the old home for which she had sold herself. To her surprise, she found Lawrence Trabue waiting for her on the steps.

Bonnie gave him one freezing glance and would have passed on, but he blocked her progress.

"I have reconsidered, Bonnie," he said earnestly, "and have come to tell you that I will assume your obligations and marry you."

"Perhaps you've decided that the plantation coupled with my social position is worth it," answered Bonnie icily.

"Anyway, I know you need money," answered Trabue, "and I've come to offer it to you."

Bonnie's lips curled in scorn at the man before her.

"You are mistaken," she said haughtily; "I do not need money—nor you—good morning."

Before Lawrence could answer, she had darted past him and swung the massive door to behind her.

For an instant Lawrence stood as one stunned by a heavy blow, then smiling cynically he went slowly down the steps.

"Just one of her little tempers," he said sneeringly. "She'll come 'round all right when time for the mortgage to foreclose comes due."

Colonel Lathrop, to the distress of his nurse, was becoming very restless, when Bonnie came bounding into the room. Dropping down beside her father, she gave him a loving caress.

"I was worried over your long absence, Bonnie," he said wearily.

Bonnie laid a silencing finger on his lips.

"You mustn't worry about me, Daddy dear," she said sweetly, "I am the one in this family to do the worrying now. What you want to do is to rest and grow strong so we can go on a long, pleasant journey—and you, Nurse, may slip out for a bit of sunshine."

"Tell me, Dear," said the old man as soon as the nurse had disappeared from the room, "what has happened? How did you raise the money?"

"Who said I had raised any money?" asked the girl smilingly.

"Your expression, my dear," answered the old man, "gives you away."

"Then, if you must know," answered Bonnie hesitatingly, "where I have been I would say that I had been to my safety vault in the bank, and have credited the savings of a lifetime to a checking account."

Bonnie was a truthful lassie and it hurt her to tell a falsehood, but the one being in the world that she loved above everything else was ill, and any sacrifice, any falsehood was permissible in her sight for his sake.

"You had more than you thought, Bonnie?" the old man questioned eagerly.

"Much more," answered Bonnie cheerfully, as she displayed to her father the little bank-book on which appeared the figures of her deposit.

The astonished expression on her father's face when he saw the amount accredited to her frightened the girl for a moment, then the old man smiled happily.

"I knew I had been generous with you, Bonnie," he said feebly, "but I never suspected you had saved that amount from your allowance."

"Money speaks for itself," said Bonnie with a sigh of relief, "and now that you have nothing to worry over," continued the girl, "just when can I depend on you having strength enough to travel?"

"With money enough to meet our obligations," exclaimed the old man gleefully, "I will soon be well again."

The next few days Bonnie veritably lived in the old library, unearthing and paying bills. First on the list she had written a check to Kerrin Realty Co. that would clear the estate of mortgage; then one by one she cleared the slate, and when the last bill was accounted for she realized she had a balance of ten thousand dollars to her credit.

This, she surmised, would take care of her father for some time to come; of what might happen after that was gone she refused to think.

Believing that Bonnie's thriftiness had saved them from utter ruin, Colonel Lathrop's health improved rapidly—so rapidly that at the end of ten days Dr. West pronounced him able to travel.

Like a gay butterfly Bonnie flitted about the old house, setting it in order for her departure. The thing she had done to obtain money for her father's sake had not oppressed her in the least, though time and again as she busied herself about the house, the wistful face of Justin Hall had come to keep her company.

Nothing was changed about the old home. Old Dorothy would have entire charge of things while she was away, as she had always done; there was only one thing left to do, and that was pruning the rose hedge; this Bonnie decided to do herself. With a pair of pruning shears she set to work, but scarcely had she begun when she saw a big car slowing down in the main road. Instantly she recognized the driver of the machine as Justin Hall's secretary.

Her blood seemed to freeze in her veins as she watched him approach. His polite bow, however, assured her that she had nothing to fear.

"I have been driving here for ten days," James Adams explained as he reached her side, "trying to catch a glimpse of you alone in order to give you this." Thrusting a package into Bonnie's hand, he quickly retraced his steps and moved rapidly away.

Bonnie watched him disappear 'round the bend in the road, then turned her attention to the package. Opening it, she found it to be her marriage certificate accompanied by a note.

"Wife of Mine:" the letter ran, "The enclosed will prove beyond all doubt your claim to my property in case of my death while you are away, and during your absence your own account will be secretly accredited from month to month, by a man with lots of money and only six months of life."

A thoughtful expression came over Bonnie's face as she stood looking at the document in her hands, then thrusting it back into the envelope, she made her way to the house.

In the library she paused, then crossing the room she opened the secret panel in the wall which revealed a hidden safe. She put the certificate in, then took it out and gazed fixedly upon it.

Just as Justin Hall had caught a vision of her when he read her name, the girl got a mental vision of the man when she beheld his name on the certificate that made them man and wife.

Clearly she called to mind the comfortable rooms of Justin Hall, the artistic arrangement of the furniture, the book-lined walls, the little flower garden upon which he had gazed with such wistful eyes. Surely, thought the girl, there must be something good in a man who loved the beautiful things in life as his surroundings showed him to, even though he were a gambler.

There should be some way, too, by which she could show her appreciation of the kindness he had shown her. Her eyes wandered about the rooms in which she now sat so contentedly; the books she loved, the grand piano, the rich carpets, the pictures on the walls were hers through the generosity of Justin Hall.

Suddenly the thought dawned upon her that she was a Lathrop and no woman of the race had ever been known to accept a kindness without returning kindness. It was up to her—she must in some way show her appreciation of what he had done.

Folding the certificate and the note which accompanied it together, she smilingly hid them in the folds of her gown, then turning to her desk, she picked up a piece of paper on which she hastily scribbled a few lines.

"I'se jes' been lokin' fer youse, Miss Bonnie," interrupted old Dorothy from the doorway, "to find out fo' ce'tain whether I is or is not to be de boss 'round here while you and Marse Will'm is away."

Bonnie eyed the woman with a mischievous twinkle in her eyes.

"I'm leaving things in your hands, Aunt Dorothy, but remember, you must rule with love and kindness instead of force."

Old Dorothy made a movement displaying the muscles of her strong arms and the activity of her feet, then she grinned broadly.

"Don't yous worry, Honey," she said, coming a bit closer to the girl, "your Aunt Dorothy will rule dis roost one way or 'tother."

Bonnie smiled at the old negress, then looking up into her face earnestly, she said:

"If—if a gentleman and his secretary should come for a visit in this house while we are away, Aunt Dorothy, won't you promise me that you will do everything you can to make their visit pleasant?"

Old Dorothy scratched her head reflectively, then she grinned broadly at the eager face of the girl.

"Yes, Miss Bonnie," responded Dorothy, "but youse ain't 'spectin' nobody, is you?"

"Not particularly," Bonnie answered, "but in case they should come, you will make them comfortable."

Old Dorothy promised to do her best, and went away wondering what sort of notion Miss Bonnie had up her sleeve.

The next day amid tears and laughter from a few friends and the old servants, the Lathrops left home, and in the afternoon of the same day Justin Hall received a short note that caused him considerable pleasure, especially the last few lines which ran:

"In case you desire a change of location you will find a welcome for yourself and secretary at Elmwood.

"Gratefully yours, BONNIE."

Surrounded by luxury and comfort in a cosy little cottage overlooking the sea, Colonel Lathrop and his daughter lived in perfect contentment. Each day Bonnie could see an improvement in her father's condition, and 'ere long they were seen on the beach together, he in his comfortable rolling chair, with Bonnie beside him. His old acquaintances sprung up and new ones followed; the cottage became a rendezvous for young people. Never had the beautiful Southern girl received so much attention; morning, noon and night she was pursued by admirers, but to all their devotion she paid not the slightest attention—her one thought in life was the comfort of her beloved father.

* * * * * *

Old Dorothy was putting the finishing touches to the front veranda one hot spring morning when the "honk-honk" of an automobile at the steps startled her. At one glance she saw the car contained a couple of gentlemen, but her heart immediately went out to the one on the back seat, his wistful face appealed to her motherly old soul.

"Good morning," said the man at the wheel as he lifted his cap, to which Aunt Dorothy courtesied in her best fashion.

"Did Miss Lathrop leave any word concerning the coming of a couple of visitors in her absence?" asked the man politely.

"Yas, sir," responded Dorothy quickly, "is you him?"

"I'm one of them," responded the man laughingly, "and the one on the rear seat is the other."

"Get right out and come in," said old Dorothy in true Southern style, "while I go fotch a few chairs."

While she was gone James Adams got out of the car, hastily lifted a folded roller chair from the back compartment and bodily brought forth Justin Hall from the back seat and deposited him therein.

"Fo' de lan' sakes!" exclaimed old Dorothy when she returned and saw the invalid, "is everybody crippled?"

"Oh, no," laughed Justin, "I'm just down for a little while, Aunt—Aunt——"

"Aunt Dorothy," supplied the old negress, "dat's my name—and yours——?"

"Mine," said the man, "is Justin Hall, and my secretary, Mr. Adams."

"Come in an' welcome," said old Dorothy, leading the way.

But Justin begged that he might be allowed to rest on the beautiful porch while James made ready his room.

* * * * * *

Happiness ruled supreme, seemingly, in the cottage by the sea; Bonnie was the center of attraction wherever she happened to be. Her popularity pleased the old Colonel immensely; he liked to see his daughter sought as she was, but sometimes he wondered at her indifference towards the many suitors who came wooing her.

Calling her to his side one lovely sunny morning, he asked her frankly if she had never given matrimony a serious thought.

Bonnie winced at the question, then smiled up at her father.

"I hardly think I have, Daddy dear, though I think it might be interesting."

"There's never been a spinster in the Lathrop family," the old man reminded her.

"True enough," answered the girl, "but no Lathrop woman ever had such a wonderful excuse for remaining single as your daughter has."

Colonel Lathrop patted Bonnie's hand affectionately, but the serious expression still remained on his face.

"I can't help but wish you were settled, Bonnie," he said slowly, "I would feel better satisfied at leaving you."

"Leaving me?" exclaimed Bonnie in a frightened tone of voice as she hastily scanned his face. "You mustn't think of such a thing."

"I don't often," Colonel Lathrop admitted, "but sometimes I feel that I would be happier were you safely married. You know women can wait too long to decide this question."

"But I," laughed Bonnie, "am still young enough to be sought—just watch me."

"Watch 'em seek me, Daddy," she chuckled as she gave him a parting kiss and went running down the white beach.

In his rolling chair at the corner of the porch the old man watched her make her way along the wave-washed shore. Scarcely had she reached the bottom step leading from the cabin until she was joined by a group of admiring friends.

"Young enough," chuckled the old man, "to still be sought—perhaps so—but, anyway, I wish she were safely married."

Nevertheless, with a sigh of relief, he picked up a new magazine and began reading.

* * * * * *

In the Lathrop home with his faithful secretary's assistance, Justin Hall felt very comfortable, and his kindness among the servants soon won for him a place in their hearts forever. In his rolling chair he made the rounds of the house, bobbing up at the most unexpected places and taking his scolding from Aunt Dorothy like a spoiled child, for getting into places he couldn't get out of.

From the house he learned the way to the orchard and the meadow, and it was while making this tour of inspection one day that a great inspiration came to him.

In his imagination the old storm-swept orchard suddenly became a mass of white blossoms; the hillsides became the loafing grounds of thoroughbred sheep, hogs and cattle; the barren fields were suddenly converted into fields of cotton.

Stern reality brought him out of his dreams, but the spark was there, and as the day passed he talked it over with James.

"No doubt it would be a paying proposition," said James Adams when Justin laid bare his plans, "but it would mean a considerable investment."

"If it would make her happier," said Justin.

"Her——" muttered James indignantly, "she can do all that after you are dead."

"But I'm liable to live ever so long, James, now that I have something worth living for."

"Have it your own way," answered the old friend. "Whatever you do I am with you in it."

To think with Justin Hall was to act, and before another night came he had called in Hankins, the overseer of the plantation, and had a heart-to-heart talk with him, which resulted in the promise of Hankins to reconstruct the old place to its former beauty and value. But Justin didn't stop at that; he also extracted a promise of secrecy from Hankins as to where the money came from for the work.

The work of bringing the old plantation back to its former state so thrilled the overseer that he would have agreed to anything, and immediately he got busy.

Each day from his rolling chair beneath some great tree about the place, Justin watched the transformation take place; but Justin's eyes were not the only ones that watched the restoration of the old Lathrop plantation. Lawrence Trabue also saw what was taking place, and vainly did he try to make friends with Justin.

"Anybody would think you owned this place," Lawrence remarked sneeringly one morning as he listened to Justin give Hankins orders concerning the orchard trees.

"It's just my way of showing my appreciation for the courtesy extended me for the use of the house in their absence," Justin answered pleasantly.

"Some courtesy, I must say," retorted Trabue, "and unusual."

"Maybe it is unusual," laughed Justin, "but rather fortunate for me."

"Ah, come off your perch," called Trabue rudely, "you can't put anything over me—the Lathrops are under obligations to you some way or else they'd never have consented to have a man of your reputation in the house."

"My reputation in the South isn't anything to be proud of, answered Justin, "except, of course, every man who gambles hasn't the distinction of being a winner in all cases, as I have."

"Go 'long with your gambling, Sonny," said Trabue mockingly, "but don't ever let your thoughts revert to the mistress of this estate."

Justin felt the blood in his veins turn hot and his fists clinched unconsciously.

Trabue, noticing the action, laughed fiendishly and walked away.

"If my legs would hold me up," Justin called after him, "I'd have more than the reputation of a mere gambler in the Southland."

"But they won't hold," retorted Trabue as he crawled into his car and moved off.

Trabue's taunt left Justin angry through and through. Presently he threw back the light rug from over his lap and looked in disgust at his splendid but useless legs; again he struck his knee a sound blow and a queer expression came over his face, then a cry that brought James running from the veranda to his side.

"What's happened, Justin?" his secretary asked anxiously.

Justin laid a hand on his friend.

"I'm afraid to say it, James," he said slowly, "but I—I've got feeling in my legs."

Thrilled with excitement, Justin begged his friend to pinch him, and a whoop of joy went up from his lips when he realized that he actually could feel.

"Pack up, James," he exclaimed happily, "we are going to New York in the morning."

* * * * * *

Through a letter from Hankins, Bonnie learned that the old place was undergoing a change; that the cotton crop was wonderful, and there would be a good dividend after all expenses were paid. This pleased Colonel Lathrop and his daughter immensely, but it was a line from old Dorothy that set Bonnie's brain awhirl with excitement, for at the end of a badly scribbled letter she found this postscript:

"Mars Justin done gone to New York to get his laigs to walking, and ef he do he's gwine to be de walkinest man in dis world."

Bonnie felt hot and cold by turns; to think of Justin Hall, the gambler she had married, being well and strong was something she hadn't bargained for.

Leaving her father on the porch of their cottage, Bonnie went for a walk on the beach. Seating herself upon a boulder along the shore, she threw back the folds of her gown a little golden circle. For the first time since it had been in her possession she discover there was an inscription on the inside. Carefully, painfully she raised upon the letter until she could read them clearly.

"Thine Forever," she read slowly—that was

Jelly making, add the sugar hot because the juice has to remain over the heat that much longer if sugar is added cold. Heat the sugar in the oven, stirring frequently. The best quality of jelly is obtained when all the cooking-down process is done before adding sugar. Jelly that has to be recooked is always a little leathery and cloudy.

When a little of the yellow of an egg breaks into the white, pick it out with a piece of the egg-shell as it readily clings to the white which adheres to the shell.

In steaming, better results are obtained if the water under the food is kept low, because a little water gives a bigger "head" of steam and the food cooks in less time. Care must be taken that the kettle does not boil dry.

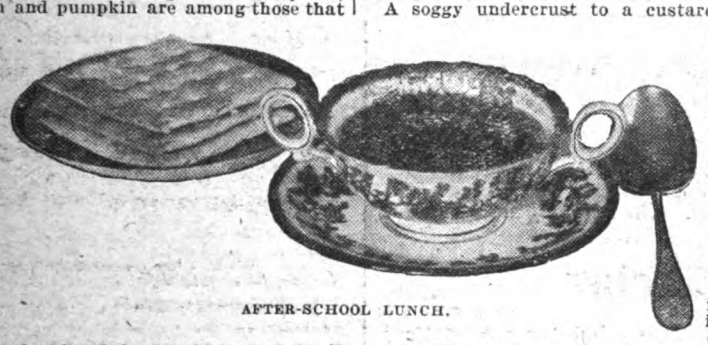
Add a slice of lemon to the water in which the celery, parsley or other salad greens are being kept and see how much better they keep.

Never wash the cut sides of meat. If it seems necessary, either scrape or wipe.

Bacon rind or a boiled ham bone and rind make a good flavoring for pea or bean soup.

Spread a little butter over the top of the cornmeal mush that is to be fried the next day, as it prevents a crust forming. A little sugar added to the mush while cooking gives a rich flavor and assists in frying a golden brown.

Try a piece of breakfast bacon instead of salt pork in your baked beans for a change. A small onion put into the bottom of the pot gives a fine flavor, and many also like a scant teaspoon of dry mustard to one quart of dry beans.



When making juicy pies, trim the under crust one inch longer than the plate. Fill, and lay on top crust trimmed even with the edge. Moisten a little around the edge and fold over the under crust. Press together, and if a fancy edge is desired, crimp by rolling the fine cutter from the food chopper lightly over the edge.

After putting potato through the masher, set it over a hot cover, make a large hole in the center and into it pour the milk or cream and let it get hot before beating together. Hot milk makes much lighter potato than cold.

When boiling a pudding, line the bag with paraffin paper as it gives the pudding a better surface and aids in retaining the flavors.

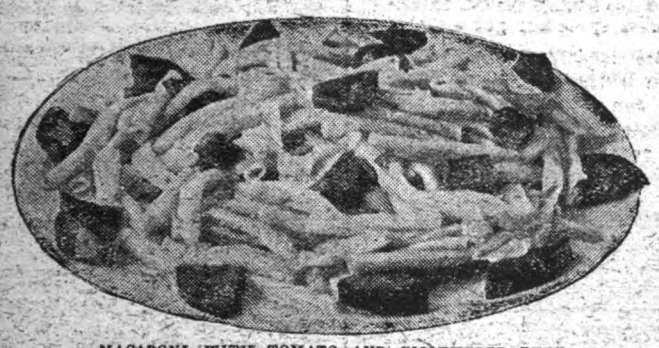
Breads and cakes require air in their composition. Therefore beating gives better results than stirring when mixing the ingredients together. In beating, as the spoon lifts a portion of the dough it takes a certain amount of air back with it.

A soggy undercrust to a custard pie can be prevented by brushing it over with unbeaten white of egg before filling, and putting the pie into an oven having a quick bottom heat.

AFTER-SCHOOL LUNCH.

If a pie is to be transferred to a serving plate from the one it is baked in, before laying the under crust, place three strips of muslin across the plate with ends hanging over, which may be used as lifters, and thus prevent all chances of breaking the pie.

When only the whites of eggs are used and there is no immediate use for the yolks, put them in a bowl, cover with cold water and set in a cool, dark place.



In creaming butter and sugar for cake in cold weather, add one tablespoon of boiling water and the work will progress more rapidly, and in no way injure the quality of the cake.

For variety, use a cup of cold cocoa made with half milk when making gingerbread.

Instead of straining honey, cut from the wooden frame into an earthen dish and set into a very slow oven. The comb will melt and rise to the top where it will remain and harden when the dish is set in a cool place. This process gives clear honey, and a solid cake of pure wax is obtained.

Try out some of the chicken fat, and in it fry two large onions sliced, and two sliced green peppers. When half done stir in about four rounding teaspoons of dry flour and continue cooking. Stew four large tomatoes and strain. Cut in thin slices, the corn from six large ears, then scrape the milk from the cobs. Put a little of the chicken fat in the bottom of a deep baking dish, then add the corn and lightly sprinkle with salt. Cubby Bear Cheers Brownie Whippoorwill

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CUBBY Bear and Bunny Rabbit were taking a stroll in the Pleasant Forest one warm summer evening. The full moon, round and bright, gave a soft light. Bunny Rabbit was dragging the Bunny Babies' cart after him, and every Baby Bunny was fast asleep.

"Wh-wip, poor Will! Wh-wip, poor Will!" came a mournful call, from somewhere in the shadows.

"There is Brownie Whippoorwill! How sad he sounds!" said Cubby Bear. "I would like to do something to make him happier."

"He is a strange bird," said Bunny Rabbit. "He seems to have no friends at all, but always hides away by himself. Speak to him, and see if he will answer."

"Good evening, Brownie Whippoorwill," called Cubby. "Will you come for a walk with us?"

"Thank you kindly," replied Brownie, sighing deeply, "but I cannot. I must make my plaint, till the moon goes down."

"Why are you so sad?" asked Cubby. "And please, would you mind telling us why you always say 'Whip poor Will'? Who is Will, anyway, and why do you not want him to be whipped?"

"I fear I cannot tell you much about it," answered Brownie Whippoorwill, "but I know my parents always told me that, as I grew up, I must take up the family call. I do not like it—I do not know who Will is, but I should be as sorry as anyone to see him whipped."

"Is that why you say poor Will—because you are sorry for him?" asked Bunny Rabbit.

"I say what was taught me," was Brownie's reply, and then went on with his old cry of "Wh-wip, poor Will! Wh-wip, poor Will! Wh-wip, poor Will!"

"Now that is strange!" mused Cubby Bear. "I wonder if anyone knows why Brownie's family want Will to be whipped!"

"I saw Wise Owl's great eyes back a little way," said Bunny Rabbit. "He is so wise, perhaps he can tell us."

They found Wise Owl sitting at the door of his house in a hollow tree.

"Please," began Cubby, "will you tell us, Mr. Wise Owl, what is the meaning of Brownie Whipporwill's endless song?"

Wise Owl sprang to the ground with a suddenness which quite startled them.

"Wh-what?" he screamed angrily. "You need not come here to jeer at me, Cubby Bear!" Wise Owl's feathers were rumpled, and his great eyes glared.

"We—we only wanted you to tell us Brownie's story," faltered Cubby timidly.

"Be off with you!" cried Wise Owl, hopping up and down in a rage.

Bunny Rabbit and Cubby Bear hurried away, hurt and puzzled.

"What ailed him?" asked Cubby. "I never saw Wise Owl so angry before!"

"I do not know," answered Bunny Rabbit, his long ears all a-tremble.

"Here, here, you folks!" spoke up a shrill voice. "Look who you're running over!"

It was Tillie Turtle, whom they had not noticed in their hurry.

"Oh, I am so sorry!" said Cubby. They begged Tillie's pardon, and told her about Wise Owl's strange behavior.

"Perhaps you can tell us what we want to know, you are so old, and know so many things the rest of us do not, Tillie Turtle," said Bunny Rabbit. "Why does Brownie Whipporwill make his strange, sad call all through the summer nights?"

"I have heard the story," answered Tillie. "It is a legend of the forest. I will tell it to you as my mother told it to me. For long, and long, the Whippoorwills have called for the same punishment."

"Let us ask Brownie to come with us and hear the story, too," said Cubby. So they went to the hemlock tree in whose branches the bird was hidden.

"Hush, Brownie Whippoorwill!" called Tillie. "I am going to tell your family story, and you may hear it, too. I wonder your parents did not tell you all about it before charging you to keep up the call."

Brownie came, and all four of them sat down comfortably on a soft, mossy bank, side by side.

"Well, once upon a time, my mother said——" began Tillie.

"Please, what was your mother's name?" asked Cubby.

"Samantha Turtello," answered Tillie, "and a fine name it is. Though I prefer my own plainer one, and she did, too, or she would not have given it to me.

"Long ago, there was a bird named Will. A helpful, willing creature as ever lived. Always, he was saying so kindly, 'Y-yes, I will! W-will, I will!' And everyone who went to him for a friendly turn was sure to get it. Of course, Will was a favorite with nearly everyone. But there was an Owl, Ornery Owl, his name was, who did not like Will. Perhaps he was jealous, I do not know. He was a crabbed, unpleasant creature—oh, much, much more so than Wise Owl is, and he could not bear to hear Will calling so pleasantly, 'Y-yes, I will! W-will, I will!' 'Some day, if he doesn't stop it, there'll be trouble!' said Ornery Owl. And at last, the trouble came, as I've noticed trouble generally does come when we're watching for it.

"There was a Downy Woodpecker who had been sick, poor thing, and was weak and hungry; too weak to go pecking at the trees to find worms and bugs to eat. Will took pity on him, and showed him a soft, rotten log, lying on the ground, all full of beautiful white worms. Downy Woodpecker was a thankful bird, but it seemed that Ornery Owl thought he owned that log, and was going to have an owl party, with the log for a dining-table, and no trouble to get supper. My, but he was in a rage! He flew at poor Will, and pecked at him, and beat and whipped him with his great wings.

"Will's family got together to see what could be done about it. They couldn't undo the whipping, but after talking it over among themselves, they went to Ornery Owl and told him what they had decided to do to punish him. Wherever the Owl should go, up and down and back and forth, there would be a member of poor Will's family, telling aloud, that all might hear, how he had whipped poor Will."

"WELL, ONCE UPON A TIME MY MOTHER SAID——"

"Oh—Wise Owl must know about it—that is why he was so cross and snappy when we asked him to tell us the story!" this from Cubby Bear.

Tillie chuckled.

"Yes, indeed!" she replied. "To be sure he knows. A funny thing it was for you to ask him, of all people, to tell you about it. Well, from going about in the forest by day, the Owl took to flying by night, so in the night the Whipporwills have told the world of Will's unjust whipping."

"Strange I never heard the story before," said Brownie Whippoorwill. "I thought I was asking for someone to be whipped, and wanted to keep hidden from sight. I did not like it, for I am kind at heart. So it all happened a long, long time ago?"

"Yes."

"But, Tillie," put in Cubby Bear, "Mr. Wise Owl is not to blame for what happened then, is he—what another Owl did long ago?"

"Not a bit," answered Tillie.

"And Brownie Whippoorwill has not been telling about poor Will's whipping to shame Wise Owl, for he knew nothing about it?"

"No, indeed!"

"Then why need he keep it up—that dismal call of his—and why need Wise Owl be angry?"

"All very needless, and very foolish."

Cubby Bear laughed in delight, and gently patted the sad bird's wing.

"Cheer up, Brownie Whippoorwill," he said. "You hear what Tillie Turtle, daughter of Samantha Turtello, has said. You need not keep on with your sad plaint—you need not hide away from everyone—you may be cheerful and happy, playing among the other forest people. And I will be your friend!"

"But Wise Owl will never like me——" began Brownie.

"I will see Wise Owl myself," offered Tillie, "and explain matters to him. I am not afraid of Wise Owl! He shall hear what I have to say, and if he flies in a rage and wants to peck out my eyes I can draw myself into my safe shell and talk to him from there. This thing may as well be settled now as ever." And Tillie Turtle slid off the mossy bank, starting for Wise Owl's hollow tree.

Cubby Bear, Brownie Whippoorwill and Bunny Rabbit waited long before Tillie came back.

The Bunny Babies stirred uneasily in their sleep. The little cart was a small bed for so many of them. One woke and began to cry, which disturbed the others, who set up a fretful wail.

"Dear, dear!" sighed Bunny Rabbit, as he tried in vain to soothe them, "I ought to take them home, but I do so want to hear what Tillie will have to tell us!"

"This bank is soft and mossy," said Cubby Bear. "We can lay them here, and perhaps they will go to sleep again."

When the last Baby Bunny had curled in comfort, and all were sleeping once more, Tillie Turtle came crawling slowly back. Ricky Coon was with her.

"I have settled it!" Tillie told them proudly. "It took a long time, and I was afraid you would all have gone home before I came back. Wise Owl was angry, and would not listen at first, but after a time I made him see how foolish it all was. 'Let other Owls and other Whippoorwills, in other places,' I said to him, 'keep up the trouble if they want to; but let us have peace and happiness and friendliness here in our own Pleasant Forest!'

"He is coming here as soon as he smooths his feathers a bit," she went on, "and Squilly Porcupine is coming with him. Perhaps we can find two or three others to join us, and have a little party here for Brownie."

"I hear Wise Owl coming now," said Ricky Coon.

"O-o-oh!" shivered Brownie Whippoorwill, "I feel sort of scared!"

"Never a bit!" Tillie encouraged him. "Shake claws prettily when you are introduced, and then we will perhaps play some games!"

So it came to pass that moonlit night, that Brownie Whippoorwill, instead of making his doleful call, hidden away from sight, was learning to sing with the others, while they played the lively game of "Chippichoo:"

"Chippy, chippichoo we sing,
Wave your paw or flap your wing,
Left hop, right hop, count one, two,
Playing chippy, chippichoo."

ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

CROWD around, all of you, and let me see how the summer sun has browned your faces and brightened your eyes. I hope you have all put a happy vacation behind you—a full summer made up of work, play and rest properly mixed and taken in three delicious installments of June, July and August. My own mountain vacation seemed far too short and the weeks passed like twin sixes. Probably this plaint of mine could be echoed in thousands of voices by those of you who read this. And now the first month of autumn takes many of you back to school desks and laid-aside books. Well, I go back to a desk, too, but in a classroom I like to think I shall ever play scholar while the term lasts. For if all the world is a stage, as Cousin Shakespeare once told us, it is perhaps more certainly a big school—presided over by Old Professor Experience, handing out cracks with his ruler and making us review our lessons several times when we have been particularly dunce-like. In days in grammar or high school, it is sometimes possible to dodge recitations (if we have any such wicked cousins in the Family!), or perhaps our turn does not come. Sometimes unpreparedness may be camouflaged or a too-confiding teacher fooled. But there is no getting out of the lessons that have to be learned in the School of Life. We each have our turn and we each have to line up during the course with Professor Experience's old and keen eye coldly upon us and his ruler ready in his hand. The Professor is especially hard on poor spellers. If anyone misses words like "industry," "honesty" or "faithfulness"—crack! goes the ruler and the crestfallen and stupid ones have to take their spelling books back to their desks and prepare for another try. I once knew a light-hearted chap who several times carelessly missed a simple word like "duty," and the Old Professor kept him after school for several years just for that one error!

In mathematics, too, the School of Life has a course which, if it does not go into "trig" or the higher calculus, has yet some simple points that Professor Experience, backed by volumes of wise and ancient teachers, insists must be thoroughly learned before any promotion can come. The Professor tells his classes again and again that too much time is spent upon addition and subtraction, while division—the most important branch of Life mathematics, is almost wholly neglected by some of the best "math" experts. He places simple sums before students and says: "Do these first"—and when we fail it helps us nothing that we can add into nine or ten figures and subtract in a deft and dozen ways. The Professor only shakes his head sadly, while his eyes gleam a little sternly behind his Time glasses. Perhaps he takes down a favorite textbook and says: "How many times have I read you this rule of simple division: 'Give, and it shall be given unto you'? I want no more addition and subtraction papers handed in until you have done the sums in division already before you." And unfortunate scholars are again kept after school for many, many years.

In geography, the Professor is quite as exacting and demands that we learn our own limits and boundaries, our own climate, products and resources, before we spend time studying those of our neighbors. He insists that when he is ready to ask, for instance, "What is the capital of Man?" we should have become wise enough to answer promptly, "Heart, Professor," and not "Stocks, Bonds and Mortgages," as one fat stupid fellow did and went to the foot of the class in jig time. This poor chap tried to excuse himself by saying: "Why, I thought it was the same place, Professor, for the textbook says, 'Where your Treasure is there will your Heart be also.'" But, as you may guess, Professor Experience did not find this excuse satisfactory and there was one more fat fellow added to the long list of stay-after schools.

I could tell you a lot more about what I have found about Professor Experience's methods since I have been a student in the School of Life. Of his strange way of teaching history, for instance, and what he has to tell about physiology and hygiene—his lessons in these subjects being often quite different, it seems to me, from what the doctors quote. But I do not want to have you think that I am one of the Professor's bright scholars or a "teacher's pet." No, indeed; I, too, you may be sure, have been cracked with the ruler and kept after school many a time. Yet I think I always knew that the Old Professor was right in his rather harsh discipline, and that when I could finish with disobedience and stupid blundering I might really enjoy his course. And most assuredly I might as well prepare to enjoy it anyway, for there is no playing truant from his desks. Mine is pretty well whittled and scarred—some ink stains and one or two tear stains—but I believe I am finding each term new ways to keep my books neater and less dog-eared, and to get through my daily recitations more easily and with better marks.

Thinking of all this, I know there is one thing sure for all of you who have to troop back to your schools this month: the better you handle your classroom tasks now, the easier you will find the post-graduate course that Old Professor Experience will have ready for you when you matriculate into the School of Life. Every habit of attention and application gained now is a crack of the ruler avoided later on. Every willingness to work, all love of knowledge for its own sake, will mean just so much more kindly treatment from the Professor and fewer poor marks when he makes up your report cards at the end of the long term before you.

Dear Uncle Charlie, whose birthday we will all remember this month, was one who had sat long and diligently at a hard desk in Life's great school. How he profited we all know. I remember I told him this once and he answered: "Lisha, my boy, how I used to get my knuckles cracked before I learned to sit up straight and keep an eye on Professor Experience when he was talking! He is a bird of a teacher, Lisha, but there's too many of us think we know it all and can afford to loaf instead of plugging away at the lessons he sets us every day of our lives."

Uncle Charlie did profit by his lessons in the School of Life. Although they were hard ones, indeed kept "plugging away." And lovingly earnestly he divided all he learned from the Professor among those of our Family who not yet enrolled in the larger school. As I sit at my desk after my vacation and read all of your letters, I can accomplish my tasks better, more wisely and happily, because of much that Uncle Charlie told me of Professor Experience's methods. So, in my turn, I say these things this month about what the School of Life may mean a little later on to all of you. I know it is an emptier classroom to me since my friend left it for his great promotion these almost two years ago.

And now for the letters:

ZAMORA, BOX 64, CALIF.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

This is my third attempt to have a letter of mine appear in COMFORT, so I am kind of doubtful about this one. But then they say the third time is a charm, so here goees!

I guess you would like to know what I look like: Well, I am five feet, one inch short, have blue eyes and medium brown hair, and I weigh 118 pounds. I am fifteen years of age.

I live on a farm of about 178 acres. We raise barley, hogs and alfalfa. These three are our main standbys, although of course we raise cattle, chickens, etc. We have a small dairy consisting of six cows and about 75 hens. We hope to go into the chicken and dairy business heavier later on.

We have a big pumping plant to irrigate the alfalfa, orchard and garden. It pumps from 900 to 1,000 gallons of water per minute. Going some, eh?

How many of you like to swim? I sure do. I don't swim much, but nevertheless I could just live in the water. I ought to be a mermaid, shouldn't I? I hope to be able to swim pretty well at the end of this summer as we go swimming all summer long.

I have two brothers and one sister. I am next to the youngest. I think our family is real nice—just two boys and two girls.

Zamora is not a big place, the population is only about 400; but just the same she is up and coming. I am not going to say it is the best place on the map (even if I do think so) because they all say that about their home town and you can't blame them, can you, Uncle? I know I can't.

Won't some of the cousins please write to me? I would just love to hear from you. I will answer all letters that I receive.

I will give Billy a great big dish of ice cream if he will not eat my letter. We made ice cream today and I'll make a whole freezer full especially for him.

Your loving niece and cousin,
BEULAH MAY CLOVER.

I'm glad you think your family is nice, Beulah. Some folks don't like their families a bit and it makes things most inconvenient, particularly when they go around telling other people about it and just what is wrong with their especial family. Probably your family is so nice because it is a lucky one—the two boys and two girls making it a four-leaved Clover. This is the sort of joke Billy hates, and if he reads it there is going to be trouble in my family. I know I shouldn't say it, Beulah, but much as I dislike to confess it I must tell you confidentially that one-half of my family is not "real nice." I don't have to specify, of course, that this means the four-legged half.

You write that you have "a dairy of six cows and 75 hens, Beulah May. I was much interested in this remarkable statement. You must find the hens the best milkers because you keep so many more of them than you do of cows. You did not say what breed of hens you have found to produce the most butter or if you think it best that Leghorns should be dehorned when kept for dairy stock. We would all like to hear more about your hen dairy. It must be hard to keep pin-feathers out of the pail at milking time.

Beulah, you seem to have a happy life, with nothing to do but swim "all summer long." You really should be careful that your ten pink toes do not turn into a tail and you become a Zamora mermaid. For I don't imagine being a mermaid is all fun. You have to sit on a rock a lot and keep combing your hair and singing like a victrola. Anyway, that's what all the mermaids do I ever heard about. Now when you're a slippery mermaid, to sit on a wet rock and comb wet tangled hair is no singing job and not as easy as it may sound. And mermaids are particularly slippery and have slathers of hair. Don't turn into a mermaid yet, Beulah. Take my word for it, you won't like it. If you see your toes getting fishy, dry them well in the sun and sprinkle them with salt.

ST. MARIES, IDAHO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

It was Uncle Charlie got me into the League and now it is you who will have to help me. For heaven's sake get this letter past Billy, for it is important, very important, that it be printed. I know goats are stubborn, for I had to deal with a goat once; but get Billy quiet and I'll tell you what I want: I have got so many letters from cousins that I cannot answer them all and I want to thank them all through dear old COMFORT. I am depending on you and dear COMFORT to relieve me of my troubles now. Cousins, I appreciate and love all your letters and was glad you wrote to me, but I'll tell you I have received forty letters in one week and I will answer them as soon as I possibly can. I thank you all for sending the songs I wanted. Why it would bust John D. Rockefeller up in business if he had to buy postage stamps for me. The only way I can see to answer all these letters is to put a mortgage on my house and lot to buy postage stamps, but I will write to you all at the earliest possible minute.

Now some asked about Idaho. It is a swell country, beautiful scenery and good wages now. There is plenty of work at present, but living is high yet.

I had some write to me about my being engaged to Alvina Ziena. I say do not think of such a thing. Not saying that Alvina is not a nice girl, for she is; but I'll settle that question, for Alvina got married about two months ago—but not to me. For those who wish to write to her, I'll say her address is: Mrs. Al. Hopez, 346 E. Lodi Avenue, Lodi, Cal. Now, cousins, don't get jealous of me, for you know I would not marry a girl 22 years old the 21st of February and I only 18 the 30th of January.

Augustus Trick, did I hit you a hard blow in my last letter? I'll bet if I were close to you, you would hand me over to the undertaker. But, Gus, take my advice and do not run the girls so. They are human, the same as you.

Well, Uncle, I will have to close or it will take all of COMFORT to publish this, but I do not want the cousins to think I am not going to answer their letters.

From your loving nephew, ARCHIE GILLARD.

P. S. Cousins: I am not going to California now. Alvina is married, so it will be dangerous to visit there now. I might be filled with shot when I return, if I returned at all. I am going to visit Wisconsin, Minnesota and Illinois instead. Love to you all, from

A. G.

Archie, I'm glad you wrote to clear up this matter about Alvina. Well, you furnish statistics proving a complete alibi. It must disappoint some of the cousins who were baking wedding cake and buying rice, but it can't be helped, I suppose. However, I do think your first letter encouraged us to think you were going to put a California housekeeper in your Idaho house and lot. So you must not blame us for feeling a trifle flat when you tell us the whole scheme has been busted by one Al Hopez. Archie, you did not get to California in time. The race may not be always to the swift, but the odds are a darn sight in their favor.

I'm sure, even if they have to wait for replies, that none of the cousins will want you to swap a mortgage for any two-cent red stickers. Why not send 'em all a St. Maries postcard and only put on half a mortgage? After so deceiving and disappointing all of us about Alvina, you should have the penalty of having to write forty or fifty postcards a day to the cousins whom you leave without any chance to extend congratulations. But who can tell what sharpshooting may be done by the blind little god of love as you travel through Wisconsin, Minnesota and Illinois. Archie, unless you put a stovelid over your heart, we may get a chance to send you a few thousand felicitations yet.

WEST FORK, ARKANSAS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I thought I would write as I never have written you before. I live ten miles from the railroad track, where they raise the razorback hogs, out in the good old mountains of Arkansas, 20 miles from Fayetteville, the county seat. I have to go one mile to school. The name of my school is Dripping Springs but my school is out now. I was promoted to the sixth grade last term. I have six brothers and two sisters. I would be glad to hear from all the cousins who care to write, and I will answer all who send a stamped envelope.

I will close by giving a description of myself: I am four feet, ten inches tall, I have black hair, black eyes, and am a reader of dear old COMFORT.

With love from your niece, ETHEL RUSSELL.

Ethel, why in the world do they want to raise razorbacks on a railroad track down in Arkansas? It is inconvenient both for the hogs and for the trains. The conductors and brakemen of the St. Louis & San Francisco must get tired chasing the hogs off the track and if they miss many the rails must get horribly greasy. Of course, it is an advantage for the dining cars to be able to get all the fresh pork chops they want right along the roadbed, but all the same I should think there would be a great deal of waste involved. I can't see any real sense in the thing at all, and I think the hogs would be much happier and less razory if they were penned somewhere else than between switches. Ethel, you have the Fayetteville Hog Growers Association consider this matter. It needs attention.

I was sorry to hear your school had temporarily gone dry, Ethel, and had stopped drinking. Probably the September rains will start the springs going again so that you and other scholars may quench your thirst for knowledge. It is the best kind of spring at which to drink and you should use the largest possible cup.

Ethel, you have a bunch of brothers and I hope they do not boss you too much. Brothers are pretty bossy at times. If they get too bad, you can send them away to chase the razorbacks off the track before the 2-15 is due at Fayetteville.

PASKENTA, CALIFORNIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I am a little boy eleven years old and I live in Sunny California. I have light hair and blue eyes and I am about five feet tall. And I ride bulls at every round-up and I have never been disqualified and I get boys' money.

I have a brother, his name is Clair. He can ride them straight up and rake them down the shoulders. We are good riders up this way.

We have a round-up almost every month.

Well, as I have written a letter, I think I will quit.

Truly your nephew, GEORGE BOTKIN.

You must be good riders up your way, George, if you can ride bulls as you say you do at every round-up. A bull must be a very difficult creature to ride. Most bulls that I have seen are fidgety animals and have a nasty way of shaking their heads and looking at you out of the corners of their eyes in a disagreeable manner. And I never liked their voices, either, or the style in which they wear their horns. Any bull that I ever ride, George, will have to have a sofa cushion securely tied over each horn before I swing into the saddle. I think this would help a lot about my getting disqualified. But you did not say why you choose to ride bulls, George, instead of a nice freckle-spotted California pony. Perhaps you have some particularly clever bull who is fast on his feet and uses his horns to help in the round-up.

And, George, I think it is wonderful about your brother Clair who can ride bulls that stand straight up on their hind legs. I suppose he hangs on to their horns with his rake to prevent slipping off. I would sure hate to slip off a bull, George, with nothing but a rake handy as protection. When I am around bulls I want to be right on my feet and with a five-bar fence not too far away.

Billy, who has been in California and who knows everything, anyway, says that I am "making a complete fool" of myself (which were exactly that wicked Goat's words) about this bull-riding business. Bill says I don't know at all what a round-up is and how the rounding-up is done. Well, that may be, George, but I certainly know what a bull is, and when there is any riding of bulls to be done I am going to be somewhere else. Bill can talk all he wants to; I think he needs rounding-up himself!

SOMEWHERE IN THE HILLS OF VIRGINIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I've been listening to the confessions, accusations and cross examinations of the League for a pretty good

"A FORGOTTEN LOVE; or, Love's Cruel Awakening"

By Adelaide Stirling

The subtitle better fits this fascinating novel which exemplifies the fact that the flame of true love, once kindled, is never forgotten, for even though cruelly extinguished it leaves an indelible scar.

In the strongly drawn, lifelike characters of this thrilling story is portrayed how differently true love is affected in different natures when neglected, slighted, scorned and betrayed. In the case of one victim the bleeding heart continues to adore the unworthy object of its undying affection and is dragged down by it; but perfidy and abuse turn the stronger woman's love to hate and arouse a thirst for vengeance. Read the story and judge which is the better way.

This delightful story will run as a serial in COMFORT. Don't miss the first installment in the coming October number. Make sure by renewing your subscription today.

The Hope Chest Girl

Old-Time Marriage Chest Comes Back as Hope Chest of Today

By Hester C. Cunningham

See front cover illustration.

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE store of linen which a bride took to her husband upon her marriage was a matter of great importance back as early as the 15th century. It was then that the mothers and grandmothers, in their wisdom born of the necessities of their day and generation, began the practice of each year laying by pieces from their own looms, and often from their own treasure store of family laces and jewels, for their minds dwelt upon the future of their daughters who according to custom, were expected to marry at an early age. The domestic chest was an important piece of furniture in those times, and the one to hold the daughter's marriage linen was known as the marriage chest, and by the 17th century was so glorified, with inlay of ivory, ebony and precious woods, as to be considered a marriage coffer. Of all these, probably the Italian chest was the most gorgeous. The chief characteristics of the English chests were panelled fronts and ends, with feet formed from the side posts. Frequently names and dates were carved on the panels. These old marriage chests have been handed down through all these generations, and there exists in this country a great number and variety of true English type and origin.

Leaving the subject of chests for a little, let us turn to the maids of old New England, who at a very tender age began to receive instructions in the art of spinning and weaving. Theirs became a thorough knowledge of the vast amount of work that preceded the needle and thimble in the making of garments in those days. As in time fingers and mind became more and more skillful, these maids were taught to make counterpanes with exquisite applique patchwork and fine quilting, bed hangings and chair cushions. To make a perfect buttonhole was an accomplishment always insisted upon, as well as a knowledge of other stitching, such as drawnwork, cross-stitch, crewelwork and feather-stitching.

These Colonial mothers often had but the crudest conveniences, but their sturdy resourcefulness and capable hands achieved what we recognize in present-day needlework as a "take-back" to these very times, for we have developed no art that compares with theirs in genuineness of expression.

There are no files of newspapers or magazines from which to get a glimpse of the intimate side of life between mother and daughter in those stern days when the dictates of the husband and father were never questioned, but from many a letter long yellowed with age, and from the religiously kept diaries, we know there was a precious heritage of love of home, and the Good Book was the mother's guide in her teachings of thrift and industry, in faith and purity, and in a fine sense of duty.

"That "all the world loves a lover" was as true then as now, and Cupid's dart was just as busy. Who could say that these maids of old New England, set to the task of weaving fine linen for their own marriage chest, did not indulge in romancing, and with the soft hum of the spinning-wheel dream what they hoped would come true. If, "she hath much laid by for her wedding," David was encouraged by his mother to find favor with Prudence. Reared in the expectation of marriage, accomplished far beyond her years, should David happen to be her heart's desire, will Prudence reveal her secret at the first approach of David, or will she modestly withdraw "and let her own works praise her in the gates" according to the spirit of her times?

The Hope Chest of Today

There is a great assurance that the girls of today have as strong a domestic side as did the maids of Colonial days. I hear some dissenting voices, but when you consider how many-sided is necessarily the life of a modern girl, and her dream that sometime she will be mistress of her own home is never crowded out, to me is proof positive that our girls are as sweet and promising as ever. Probably the toilsome days of our Colonial maids were very irksome at times, and we feel they were deprived of much that belongs to youth by natural inheritance.

Today we hear little of the marriage chest of our ancestors, but in place the modern girl has given us the Hope Chest, a change of name which implies all and even more than did the marriage chest of earlier times. Hope shapes the dreams of youth; hope diminishes with the increase of years. In the very adaptaton of the name Hope, we have even greater proof that our girls are lovers of home. With the girls of long ago, the marriage chest was filled through compulsion, and was considered a dowry, while in the freedom of today, bed linen and comforts, sets of doilies, pretty covers, bags, pillows and many other articles are made during leisure hours to be used in her own home, if her dream comes true.

And then there are the girl friends, all of whom seem to have started hope chests, and such gifts as are given in exchange are usually of a domestic nature and intended for the hope chest, whether the presentation occasion be Christmas or birthday. What with educational pursuits, church work, club canning, club bazaars, more travel, I mention but a few of the things expected of the modern girl, and when she plucks the petals from the daisies, and whispers, "He loves me, he loves me not," her dream still rings true.

The Colonial Note

Girls, often alluded to as "little women," instinctively love "purple and fine linen," and the hope chest girl pays tribute to the maid who filled her marriage coffer with treasures that endured the rigor of wear, and in the following generations became precious heirlooms to be willed to sons and daughters. In recognition of the magic wrought from their threads of worsted, homespun and linen, old blankets, sheets, capes and other pieces are being sought from which to fashion various hope chest articles. In the marvelous counterpanes, quaint embroidery effects, linen undergarments done in rare stitchery, besides the tapestry and samplers, we feel gratefully that,

"Not for their hearths and homes alone,
But for the world their work was done."

What an Ingenious Girl Can Make for Her Hope Chest

Piles of gleaming, white bed linen, rose-blue comforts, snowy table-cloths and napkins, dainty, elaborately embroidered towels and the innumerable other things that go with them—the sofa pillows, bedroom sets, rugs, quilts and the commoner kitchen things. It would take quite a bit of money to buy them, more, perhaps, than you realize. And you know you simply couldn't get along without them in that lovely dream home!

Let me whisper you a secret, you proud possessors of the growing hope chest! There are literally dozens and dozens and dozens of those pretty, yet very necessary "home" articles which you can make yourself, with hardly the expenditure of a penny—providing you have been wise enough to save every bit of cloth, whether it be oilcloth, silk, wool or cotton, every scrap of ribbon, boxes, tin cans (yes, really), that are bound to accumulate in every home.

If with the calm certainty that they will all come in use some day, you have rescued the above named apparently impossible things, to you go my secrets. And let me remind you again, that to buy these articles ready-made or to purchase the material with which to make them, will mean considerable expense, and in the end they will not be one whit prettier than those fashioned from the ragbag.

Sofa Pillows

First on the list come the sofa pillows. And here you may wander all over the ragbag, picking your material at will, for sofa pillows, nowadays, are made of everything from burlap sacks and unbleached muslin to the finest, sheerest organdies and silks. Their shape, too, is quite as varied as the material with which they are made, for they may be square, round, oblong, oval, triangular, diamond, fan and the "bolster" varieties.

They may be finished of all one material and one color, or both may be combined very effectively. And the modes of finishing and trimming are innumerable—ruffles, embroidery of every description, ribbon, cord and tassels, flower ornaments, lace and "patchwork" figures.

One very attractive square pillow, simple to make, was fashioned of pink organdie. A two-and-a-half-inch ruffle, gathered through the center, was sewed around the edge, and a large French knot design in black and bright Copenhagen blue was worked on the front of it. If you do not embroider, use the new "patchwork" flowers and leaves—circular pieces of cloth with a small dark piece for the center as flowers and green material for the leaves. Arrange these attractively and sew to pillow with contrasting color, coarse silk thread.

If you plan to have a window-seat in the new home, this set might interest you. It consists of two blue pillows, made of rep, each cut eighteen inches long and ten inches wide. A two-inch strip of the material was folded and sewed in with the seam, finishing the edges. Then a strip of filet lace two inches wide was sewed on three inches from the end of each pillow. No further trimming was needed for, indeed, the result obtained was quite novel. You'll probably find lots of odd strips of cloth this width from which you can fashion several sets if you wish.

Square pillows of gay cretonne rarely need any extra trimming at all, but the very plainest ones can readily be made to look really charming. Burlap sacks can be dyed greens and browns, even shades of rose and yellow, and, after made into pillows, dressed up with "patchwork" flowers. You will like them just as well as your silk ones—and they're much more durable.

Again, square pillows of subdued shades can be made colorful with squares of bright ribbon or cretonne—five in all. Sew one in each corner and one in the center, and make them deep enough so that the most extended point of each of the corner squares meets the points of the center square. You can determine this by measuring the pillow.

Round pillows, quite popular now, are finished in various ways and made of various materials. I have seen some very pretty ones made of unbleached muslin. To make the simpler ones, cut two circular pieces thirteen inches in diameter, and a strip three and a half inches wide an inch longer than the circumference of the circular strip. Sew the round pieces onto the narrow strip, leaving an opening for the filling. If you have only material enough for the top and side piece, make the back of something else. Combined colors produce pretty effects, and the pillows may be finished with applied flat flowers, ribbon, silk and cotton ornaments and ruffles, sewed with the upper seam.

Other round pillows are a bit fancier but no harder to make. By using a combination of colors and materials, one kind can be made out of cloth that otherwise would be too scanty for a pillow. To make this, cut the top circle smaller than the back one. Then combine strips of different colors, one, usually, like the top, so that when sewed together the strip is about nine inches wide and considerably longer than the circumference of the larger circle. Gather one side of the strip to the small top circle, and the lower side of the strip to the larger back circle, leaving sufficient space for filling, in all cases.

There is a stunning diamond-shaped one, too, which can be made of anything from black voile to black velvet. A tassel dangles from each point and the center of the pillow is adorned with bright rose and yellow "patchwork" flowers. And fir pillows, always so fragrant, are made square, usually, and of some firm material like cretonne and chambray. They may or may not be embroidered. A very new round pillow is a combination of black oilcloth and gay cretonne or gingham.

Light Shades

No matter how your light may be furnished, you certainly will want some of those lovely light shades for your living-room, dining-room and sleeping-rooms. But, my! It nearly takes your breath to price them in the shop windows! However, if you will get out your odds and ends of silks and cottons—the rather long, narrow strips—a bit of wire and ribbon, shellac and tape, you may have as many of them as you want.

With very little expense you can procure the frames, which come in all sizes and shapes. There is, indeed, a wide range of material with which to cover them, chief among them being the cotton and silk crepes, taffeta, satin, organdie and voile, gingham, cretonne, linen, poplin and pongee.

If the frame is covered with thick material no lining is used, where, if the outer covering is thin, a lining and sometimes an inter-lining is added. Generally, the material is gathered onto the frame, top and bottom, and finished with tape, braid or fringe. Ribbon bows, ruching, ruffles, flowers or embroidery may be added. Colors may be plain or combined, the outer covering of one color and the lining another.

Unusual shades are covered with bright wallpaper, shellacked and bound with colored tape or flat braid. Another frame is first covered with some very bright material, after which pictures cut from magazines are covered with ink and pasted on. This is the rather new "silhouette" shade. Nymphs, fairies, etc., make the most pleasing figures—also birds and trees.

Rugs

You'll find it fun to make rugs—the braided and patchwork ones, so much in favor all over the country, and suitable for every room in the house. Gather up all the fragments of silks, woolens and cottons and dye them different shades. Then braid them into rugs, letting your fancy hold sway in the fashioning of them.

Quilts

There's no need of sighing for those expensive comforts—so long as the ragbag holds out, my dears! You don't know what really lovely ones you can make until you have tried it. Like rugs, the center part may be made of a large square or circle of a firm material. If it is flowered or figured, let it be as it is; also, if it is a bright plain color, it needs no trimming—but if it is of a sober shade, dress it up with "patchwork" and cut-out flowers.

I saw a charming quilt, whose center was a square of rose chambray. Small yellow and bright blue squares sewed together completed the rest of the top part, the rose color being repeated in a narrow binding around the edges. No comfort could have matched it!

Calico or silkaline make a very good lining for the batting-filled ones. But listen, you need not fill them with batting! Worn blankets or an old quilt answer the purpose wonderfully, and, if a flannel lining is used, you'll find them plenty warm on the coldest nights, while the thinner ones are just the thing for summer.

Pin-Cushions

Pin-cushions can be made in any shape, in plain or combined colors, and, like pillows, in many materials, especially cretonne, the firmer silks, crepes, and fine cottons, like voile, organdie and muslin. The most of them, I notice, are trimmed with ruffles. A novel one of lavender pongee, trimmed with ruffles, flaunted a bouquet of silk flowers and ribbon, not in one corner but in the very center of the cushion. Embroidery is especially pretty, and lace over bright silk is charming.

Clothes-Hangers

You wouldn't suspect that really dainty clothes-hangers could be made out of wooden barrel hoops. Seventeen inches is the best length. Cut them off where the curve is uniform and make a hole in the center, through which draw a strand of wire twisted into the shape of a hook and fasten. Cover with silk or cretonne. If the hoop is an inch wide, cut two strips an inch and a half wide and nine inches long and two strips the same way, and embroidery adds to their beauty. strips onto the shorter ones, turn and draw on over hoop. Cover seams at center with ribbon. Flowers may be added.

Doilies

Every hope chest has its array of doilies and, like many other things, pretty ones can be made from the ragbag. Merely a circular piece of crash or linen stitched an inch and a half from the edge all the way around, and then fringed, has its simple charm. Square ones may be made the same way, and embroidery adds to their beauty. Colored rickrack braid applied to the round ones lifts them out of the ordinary.

A dear dresser set, consisting of two round and two oval doilies of lawn, was worked with French knots around the hem, after which torchon lace was applied. Another one was made of circular strips of tan and blue crash, edged with cream lace. A round piece of cretonne, combined with material of contrasting color, needs no further trimming and is just the thing for the den. These are only suggestions. With your material before you, innumerable "doily ideas" will pop into your head.

Covered Boxes

If you find toilet sets quite high, as you undoubtedly will, get out your boxes and make them yourself. Cover them with the finer silks and cottons or with the cut-out figures pasted on and shellacked. For the hair receiver, choose a large round box and cut a round hole in the center of the cover before covering the box. Make cardboard partitions for the hair-pin box and cover them with gilt. Handkerchief and powder puff boxes and jewelry cases, if covered with silk, may be puffed prettily about the sides or the covering may simply be drawn smoothly across the box, following the shape of the latter. Ribbon and flowers, of course, may be added.

Plants in tin cans or shabby pots may be slipped into one of those tall, round cardboard cereal boxes, which has been decorated with ever-useful cut-out designs, and made to appear very attractive.

Miscellaneous

Chief among the miscellaneous articles are the holders. They can be made of any cotton material. Color doesn't matter, and you can use one material or you may piece bits of gingham or cretonnes together if you wish. Shape is either round, oval or square. Padding may be any thickness, yet not too stiff material or flannel and underwear is very good.

A doily case will keep your doilies flat and smooth. Cut two circular pieces of strong cardboard about fourteen inches in diameter. Cover with any material and bind; join two pieces on the machine and close with snap or ribbon strings.

To make a silver case, cut a large square of cloth and line with flannel, velvet or soft silk. Sew "pockets" on machine to fit pieces of silver, leaving tops open. Make these at each end of the case, then sew across center so that it will fold readily. Fasten with cord.

Laundry bags, generally a foot-and-a-half wide and two-and-a-half-feet long, are easy to make. Make a wide hem at top and stitch again half an inch from hem for gathering string. Make a couple of eyelets at each side. Darning bags can be made in the same way, with pockets for thimble, thread and scissors added.

A clothes-pin bag is made of a twelve-inch square of muslin, across the bottom of which a strip six inches wide is sewed—for holding the pins. Two wire hooks, one in each corner, are added for hanging on the line.

Gather white flannel onto an embroidery hoop or a piece of wire the right shape for a convenient jelly bag.

Slender sticks for supporting potted flowers are painted dark green. The tops of them are decorated with birds, squirrels and butterflies cut from magazines and pasted onto cardboard. These are really very pretty and when the design on the top matches those on the cereal box "pot holder" the effect is positively bewitching, to say nothing of the novelty.

Have you still got a few small pieces of checked cloth left? Hem them and use them for dish-towels and dish-washers.

And of course you'll want some table mats, which may be round, oval or square and different sizes to fit the "hot dishes". Make them of linen, rep, white or colored, and pad them with flannel. Bind with contrasting material or regular tape. Mats for flower pots or the kitchen are cut from oilcloth and bound with the same material. Doilies work well on them but they are often used without it. If you are using them for table pads, to protect the enamel from scratching, they need not be bound. Pads for this purpose may also be made from old rubber hot-water bottles.

I think you will be as interested in the new home-made book blocks which a girl showed me the other day as I was. They are bricks covered with bright cretonne. They're unusual and very satisfactory, especially since you can work them to your color scheme by determining the covering.

I almost forgot to mention the brush-broom holder (you may use it as a home for the fly swatter if you wish!). Simply take a strip square of cloth and sew a narrower strip across the center of it, leaving both ends open. Bind with cloth or tape, binding the crosspiece before sewing on. A striking one was tan, bound and embroidered in red.

I don't believe there is need of making any more suggestions for, even after mentioning only a long list of possibilities I feel sure that the faithful old provider, the ragbag, is far from the stage of exhaustion. You'll discover lots of other ideas yourself. And here's hoping that you and your hope chest will profit by them.

the emblem by which she had sold herself. The memory of her wedding day came flashing through her mind, the sweet, earnest face of the man she had married—but Justin Hall the invalid and Justin Hall in good health were two different people in Bonnie's eyes; suppose he should follow her up and claim her for his wife.

Vividly she caught a mental vision of such a scene, then suddenly she smiled, and raising the little golden circle to her lips, she kissed it reverently.

"You may be a gambler in the eyes of the whole world," she said aloud, "but to me you have been an angel of mercy, and if you keep your promise in the future as you have in the past, I shall keep mine."

Feeling better after the little meditation on the cliff, Bonnie made her way happily back to the house. One glimpse at her father's face, however, robbed her heart of joyousness and sent her nimble feet flying up the steps.

"You will take me home, Bonnie?" the old man begged eagerly when she reached his side. "I want to see Elmwood before I die."

"Yes," father," cried the girl anxiously, "I will take you home immediately, but not to die—not that—not that surely!" cried Bonnie as she entered the house to give orders for the packing.

In a private ward of a big hospital Justin Hall lay flat on his back enthusiastically wiggling his toes.

Beside him sat his faithful friend, James Adams, scribbling rapidly as Justin dictated.

Suddenly Justin's hand went out to that of his friend and stopped his writing.

"It's a great world, James," he said pleasantly, "a great world to live in."

"It's great to know you are going to walk again, Justin," answered James. "Nobody will be so glad as I to see you on your feet again."

"I wonder," said Justin slowly, "if She—will be glad."

James laughed. "I'm sure your wife, Justin, is not proud of your gambling reputation."

Justin smiled feebly.

"Anyway, James, she was worth gambling on—just you wait till I'm walking again."

And again Justin began a wiggling exhibition of his bare toes, and again James began writing.

It was winter at Elmwood, and Bonnie in a close-fitting robe of black sat before an open fire in the old-fashioned living-room mechanically weaving a wreath of green leaves.

"It's snowing, Miss Bonnie," interrupted old Dorothy as she entered the room with a heavy cloak, "you better stay in."

Bonnie shook her head, then slipping into her coat, took up the wreath and passed out.

Slowly she made her way across the snow-clad orchard to the family burying ground and there with the snow falling upon her she placed the green wreath on a newly-erected stone bearing her father's name, uttered a prayer for his soul and retraced her steps.

When she entered the living-room again Lawrence Trabue was there to greet her.

She made an effort to pass him, but he held out a detaining hand.

"I will not wait any longer to see and talk with you, Bonnie," he said sternly, "you must listen to me, and now——"

Bonnie motioned him to a seat on the long sofa and sat down beside him.

"It's of you, Bonnie," the man said presently, with a great pretence of feeling, "that I am thinking—in this hour of grief you need a man to rely upon. I know now that I have always loved you and want you to marry me."

Bonnie smiled pitifully. "You still want the old plantation, Lawrence," she said slowly, "but I—I can't accommodate you."

"Then you are in love with the gambler!" Trabue exclaimed, "and I've a notion it's his money that's been paying your bills lately."

Bonnie rose to her feet, gave Trabue a stinging blow across the face and ordered him to leave the house.

Scarcely had he made his departure when Dr. West made his appearance in the doorway.

"Look, Bonnie," he cried excitedly, "that poor chap you left in your house while you were away has turned the tables on us."

Bonnie reached for the paper Dr. West held out to her and her eyes grew wide with excitement when she beheld the likeness of Justin Hall on the first page. Below the picture in heavy black letters she read:

"Justin Hall Parks, famous author, is rapidly recovering from a stroke of paralysis caused by an accident while he was in the South twelve months ago, gathering material for his latest novel, "The Winning Gamble."

The paper fell from Bonnie's nervous hands and she turned to her old friend with a little heartbreaking cry.

"Don't cry, my child," said the Doctor comfortingly, "no doubt your part in this thing will furnish considerable material for his book."

"Yes," admitted Bonnie, "I've an idea it will."

When the Doctor was gone Bonnie snatched up the paper and crushed it to her heart.

"You blessed dear," she cried excitedly, "to have put such a thing over on me—I'd be glad to own you before the whole world."

"But you were ashamed of the man, Bonnie Lathrop," Conscience reminded her, "so long as you thought him a gambler—and you are indebted to him, besides."

All night long Bonnie sat beside the fire in the old Elmwood library trying to fathom out how she could repay Justin Hall Parks for his generosity. Common sense convinced her that his generous act to her had been a sacrifice on his part; she must in some way repay that kindness, and above everything else, set him free.

With the early morning hours she reached a satisfactory decision, and calling Hankins she asked him frankly what the estate would bring if it were offered for sale.

"Around a hundred thousand," answered Hankins quickly, "considering its present condition."

"You will put it in the hands of an auctioneer immediately, Hankins," she said slowly. "We are going to sell out."

Hankins never argued anything with the mistress of Elmwood, but within a few hours time he had placed the sale of the ancestral Lathrop home in the hands of Attalis's best auctioneer; from there he went directly to the telegraph office and wrote out a telegram which read: "Mr. Justin Hall, Morning-side Apartment, New York City. The place is for sale Feb 1st.

"HANKINS."

* * * * * * *

The first day of February dawned clear and cold, and Elmwood had never looked more so. The widely-heralded auction had brought an eager crowd of spectators to the old home; they stood about in groups admiring the fine thoroughbred livestock, the wonderful young orchard and the elegant old home.

Bonnie from a sheltering nook within looked out upon the scene through tear-dimmed eyes, not until the place was sold would she open the doors of her old ancestral home to strangers.

With aching heart she heard the auctioneer put up and sell the livestock, then the entire crop, then came the place. Bonnie shrugged her shoulders when she heard him call it out; to her surprise, Lawrence Trabue started the bid, and she smiled faintly.

"You may be master of Elmwood, Lawrence Trabue," she said thoughtfully, "but you will have to pay for it if you are."

By leaps and bounds the price went soaring upward until it stood at the call of ninety-five

The Gods Arrive

by Maud Mary Brown

"Very well. Go ahead with your arrangements. And here's my blessing."

Marcia recognized the woman with the flying veils beside him as Mrs. Archer.

The girl's face dropped into her hands "His wife!" she murmured.

PART I.

UNABLE to control her impatient curiosity, Marcia Rand, a smile curving her sweetly-modeled lips, followed softly to the library where Harkness had sought her father.

She paused at the door and bent her head to listen to Mark Rand who was speaking in a voice new to her.

"Have you considered, Harkness, what it would mean to Marcia to leave a home like this to live on the salary of a chemist?"

"I understand, sir, and I think Marcia does, too," was the reply.

Marcia heard the tap of her father's pince nez which signified impatience.

"Don't start with that premise, Harkness. No inexperienced woman knows what it means to be hag-ridden by poverty. Haggling over the price of beefsteak and compromising on a cheap cut! Shivering through the winter in a thin coat and pluckily declaring herself warm! Staring into seductive shop windows and walking on! It's hell, Harkness. And I know, because I saw my wife—as sweet and fresh as Marcia is now—fade and die before I perfected the invention which made me rich.

"Success, Harkness, so often comes too late for men's wives; they sow but they do not reap. From the abundance of my experience I say that no decent man would ask a woman to share his poverty."

Marcia could endure silence no longer and she walked into the room, her pupils dilated till her smoke-gray eyes looked black.

"I heard that nonsense, dad," she began coolly, "and I want to ask you what you think would become of a race mothered by cowards. Do you suppose mother was afraid of poverty? I'll wager she wore it as a badge of courage."

The men had risen at her entrance and they stood regarding her gravely.

"Besides,"—her face relaxed into a smile—"Jim isn't going to stay poor; are you, Jim?"

Mr. Rand shifted his gaze to the man. "You're right there, Marcia," he said. "If I am any judge, he'll go up, but he'll exact toll on the way and I don't want him to collect from you."

"It's all settled, father," said Marcia, crossing to Harkness's side. "I go with Jim."

It was a tense moment. Marcia, her gray eyes blazing to black; Harkness, his pride touched, a trifle defiant; the man, his unyielding eyes traveling between the two.

Finally, very slowly, as if weighing every syllable, he spoke. "I will give my consent to this marriage provided, in order to keep my love and companionship, you will both renounce all claim to my estate."

He waited a moment for his listeners to catch the full significance of his monstrous terms.

"Or," he resumed deliberately, "you can, of course, marry without my consent. In that event, you, Marcia, will retain your inheritance. Which alternative do you choose?"

Marcia spoke, her head up-flung in a gesture of pride. "That isn't fair, father, and you know it. However, since you ask me to choose between you and your money, I'll do it. I choose you, unhesitatingly. We don't need your money; we have the youth and the brains to make our own; but, father, we do need you."

"I knew you would say that, Mark," his pet name for his daughter. "How about you, Harkness?"

His honor questioned, Harkness spoke stiffly. "I decide with Marcia," he said.

"Very well. Go ahead with your arrangements. And here's my blessing, children; may you keep your ideals. That's the best wish I have for you. Happy, Marcia? Good night, my boy. I suppose you'll be eternally under foot from now on." He flashed them a singularly genial smile and reached for his book.

In the living-room, Marcia turned distressed eyes to her lover. "Don't mind him, Jim. His early life was bitter. He was cheated and robbed of his patents till he lost faith in everybody."

Harkness's cheek was against the red-gold of Marcia's hair. "I know, honey."

"And my sister, Gladys, married unhappily—against his wishes. She deserted after a year, leaving an infant daughter. She died, later, alone in Europe. All those things have warped father."

"All I'm afraid of, dear, is that he's darned right."

A look of fear shot into Marcia's eyes but was instantly routed. "You aren't trying to get into reverse, Jim?" she smiled.

He held her closer, his honest eyes on hers. "You know better, sweet. I only want to shield you from your own dear inexperience."

"Then it is all settled." She dragged him forthwith to a davenport from which vantage point they began to plan.

Later, Harkness went to his boarding house, treading on air.

He had come to Oldham a few months earlier as chemist in the huge plant which made the town famous. Almost the first evening in town, he had fallen in love with Marcia Rand, whom he met at the country club, where he had been piloted by a Tech classmate.

"Go slow in that quarter," his friend advised when they had reached Harkness's room. "Her old man is dangerous, as every single man in Oldham knows."

"No peppery dad can scare me," defied Harkness. "I've noticed a few girls in my brief but checkered career, Arnold, but I'll tell the universe that she's the prize winner among them all. Ever notice her hair? Or the pure oval of her face?"

Arnold had shied a pillow at his friend's head. "Go write a sonnet," he had advised blithely.

That had been seven months earlier.

"I've won!" Harkness exulted as he floated home. "Hands down. Who cares for money? Besides, the old man was undoubtedly bluffing."

He paused on the doorstep, gesturing expansively to the world. "I thank you," he said whimsically, and went in and softly closed the door.

Late the next afternoon Mark Rand rose from a chair in his lawyer's office. "That'll hold, Seymour?" he asked.

"It will hold, Rand, but, unprofessionally, I call it a damnably insulting will."

"D'ye call assaying insulting, Seymour?"

"Of course, if it's only a test..... But even so....."

"Don't assume anything, my friend."

"I'd hate to endure the canker of your suspicion, Mark."

"You want to remember that I was once as credulous as Marcia is now. At least three men fattened on my ideas and rode in automobiles before I could afford a go-cart for Gladys. Sometimes, Seymour, I'm glad she ducked poverty."

"I know better than that, Mark."

"Anyway, I'd give a big slice of my fortune to get possession of her daughter. Sure you've done everything possible, Seymour?"

"Perfectly. And I rather think the Reeces deserve Anita as a salve to their pride. You couldn't do more for her yourself than they have done since they found oil on their Texas ranch."

"I'd like to see the little beggar," mused Mr. Rand wistfully. "But at least I have Mark."

He had reached the door when Mr. Seymour's voice halted him. "Sure you want that will to stand, Mark? What if you should pass out suddenly?"

"Don't worry, old man. I never felt more fit. Between you and me, I rather like that young Harkness. He has brains and breeding. I just want to make certain that there isn't a streak of yellow in him."

"Well, I'm only warning you that Fate might call your bluff."

"I'll stand the hazard." And he hooked his cane over his arm and left his lawyer frowning.

Within forty-eight hours, Mark Rand was dead. Never a skillful driver, but unwilling to admit it, he had motored up the side of the mountain to a quarry in which he was interested. On the way down, he lost control of his car and toward evening he was found beneath its upturned body, crushed and scarcely breathing.

As gently as possible, they carried his shattered body to the hospital, but he never rallied. Harkness came with stricken Marcia, awed and rather awkward in the tragic presence of death.

The evening after the funeral Marcia, her hand crushed in Harkness's, listened dully to the reading of the will which stripped her of her wealth.

Briefly, the estate was placed in the hands of a trust company for a period of ten years, after which it was to be turned into channels as directed and amplified upon in a sealed letter which was to remain unopened until that time. Every detail was planned, even to the selling of the house and its furnishings.

Mr. Seymour laid down the document, his eyes misty. "He never meant that to stand, Marcia," he said.

"It's all right," replied Marcia. "We agreed, didn't we, Jim?"

Harkness nodded and after a few awkward moments, the lawyer left.

"Do you care, Jim?" she faltered when they were alone.

"Only for you, dearest."

They were a long time silent. Then, "Honey," Harkness began, "I'm afraid I'm wasting my time here. I am a mining engineer, and if you consent, I'm going to get into line. I've recently heard, through Professor Lowe, of a good opening in Arizona. Its possibilities are limited only by my ability. In ten years I should be a consulting engineer with position and authority in the technical world. But the interim, dear, would be hard on you. I hate to ask you to go, but—are you game?"

"When can we start?" was Marcia's reply.

Harkness proved, in the years which followed, that he had not over-estimated his power. In less than nine years after going West, he was half-owner of a mine, without capital, however, to develop it, and a New York syndicate had tempted him East with a definite promise of assistance in the event of his making good with them.

His brief career read like an epic, but Marcia's was less heroic. She had cooked and washed and scrubbed. Before her two children had reached school age, she had opened a school for those of the miners. She had been her husband's advisor, and her sure instinct had guided him safely around several impasses.

Marcia had been happy, but she had paid the toll. She had no leisure for grooming and she wore mail-order clothes. In her busy life, something had to be tossed overboard, and she had never once wavered in her choice of what that should be. When the time came to say good by to the adoring miners and their families, she felt a bitter tug of pain.

"We've arrived, honey," Harkness exulted on board the East bound train.

Marcia glanced up from the pictures with which which she was amusing little Jim. "I believe I prefer to keep going," she said simply.

He laughed. "We're on our way, then," he said. "I will have you pleased."

Although Marcia would have preferred a quieter place, Harkness obeyed the firm's suggestion and took his family to a smart hotel. It was not till they were located and a nurse had been secured for the children that Marcia had time to observe what her married life had done to her.

Jim, she saw, carried himself with distinction. He had about him that aura of authority which comes from handling successfully big issues.

But herself! She studied the women about her with frightened eyes. Many of them, she felt, must be far older than her thirty years, but the lines which she wore unblushingly had been skillfully erased from their faces.

She and Harkness were lunching in the public dining-room one day when they had been in town a fortnight. Nothing escaped his alert eyes and the novelty of the situation, after comparative exile, intrigued him.

Marcia had been covertly watching a woman at a nearby table. Presently, perhaps drawn by Marcia's appraising eyes, she turned toward their table and with a surprised lift of the brows, she flashed Harkness a smile as she bowed.

Marcia's quick glance caught in her husband's face the fatuous look of a man of nearly forty who has neither conceded admiration to many women nor received it from them, but who suddenly finds it agreeable.

"That is Mrs. Archer," he explained in a low voice. "The firm is trying to interest her in a mining venture. I see her in the office frequently. Widow, I believe, with a pot of money. Stunning, what?"

"Very."

"You must meet her. And I say, Marcia, you'll have to see to your clothes."

"My things are mostly new, Jim."

"May be—but wrong. And you'd better go to a beauty place—whatever that may be—and get some of the effects of Arizona sun and water out of your skin. Finished? I won't go up, if you don't mind."

Marcia most certainly did not mind. For the first time she parted from him with a positive sense of relief.

Once in their suite, she sent the children out with the nurse and sat down in front of her mirror.

With dismay she saw that fine lines had centered about her eyes and mouth, that her skin was brown and parched and that a few gray hairs were ambushed at her temples. Her beauty was gone. And Jim, working as hard, had improved under responsibility.

"It isn't fair," she cried passionately. "Women are always the losers. I wish we hadn't come East. I hate it!"

She endured a bitter afternoon.

At seven Harkness came home to find Marcia dressed and waiting for him. He looked her over, his eyes clouding.

"Is that the best you can manage, Marcia? I'm afraid it won't do. Palmer and his wife and Mrs. Archer are below and they've asked us to join them. They're dressed to the nines."

Marcia controlled her voice with difficulty. "It's the best I have, Jim. Two months ago we thought it rather fine."

He frowned at the offending dark blue taffeta. "I asked you to see about clothes," he reminded her.

"An afternoon isn't much time. Besides, Jim, I— haven't any money."

"We'll remedy that, my dear," he said heartily; "but that doesn't relieve the situation tonight, does it?"

"I could plead a headache and not go down."

Her breath was suspended as she waited for his reply and when she saw his face brighten she could have cried aloud.

"Clever girl! That's a brilliant scheme."

He bent and kissed her. "My dinner clothes ready? Darn' lucky I got them last year when I went to the Coast."

He chatted gayly as he dressed and apparently did not notice her silence.

At two the next morning, he entered their suite, jubilant.

"Corking evening, honey. It needed only you to make it perfect. You shouldn't have sat up for me. We went to a show and had a bite to eat afterwards and then I was elected to taxi Mrs. Archer up-town. I tell you, this is the game, Marcia. I'm where I belong at last."

He thrust nervous hands into his pockets and paced the floor. "If only we weren't so poor! It's a damnable shame you didn't get your inheritance, Marcia. With that we could have splurged a little even here. As it is, I'm at the beck and call of the firm till I make good and they redeem their promises."

"Jim," Marcia began bravely, "I want to talk seriously to you. Until we came here I knew every detail of your business; now I don't even know your salary. Is it enough to keep us in a hotel like this and to clothe me as the women you were with tonight are clothed? I must know."

"It certainly is not. We'll have to get an apartment right away."

"Yes, Jim."

"And as for clothes—I've been thinking this evening, honey, that I don't care to have my wife mixed up with the business side of my life."

"I see."

"Just as soon as I can, I'll fix you up a checking account. I know you'll be patient, Marcia. My personal expenses are going to run high. I've got to have a car—in fact, I ordered one today. At that, it's cheaper than taxis."

"It will be fun to drive again."

"Don't count on it, Marcia. I don't want my girl mixed up in the New York traffic."

He yawned frankly. "Lord, but I'm tired! You understand, honey, that in a year or two I'll be able to house and clothe you with the best. I shall feel a bounder spending money on myself, but it's business. Just tread water a little longer, dear, and we'll swim out together. Now let's get to bed."

Harkness groaned a few days later when he saw the apartment which Marcia had chosen.

"A hundred and fifty a month for this cracker box! We had more light and space in Arizona for twenty."

"Let's go back," suggested Marcia hopefully.

"I should say not! I'm built for speed, old girl. By the way, the Palmers want to meet you but I put 'em off. My girl is for home consumption only."

Neither then nor later in the season did Marcia meet Harkness's new friends. Not that he was consciously ashamed of her; rather, he told himself, he was ashamed of his inability to clothe her fashionably and to give her a proper home.

Marcia was cruelly hurt, but she buried herself in her home and her children and for recreation she attended free lectures and recitals.

On returning home from such an excursion one day, her husband passed her in his smart roadster and Marcia recognized the woman with the flying veils beside him as Mrs. Archer.

He spent one of his infrequent evenings at home that night and Marcia waited in almost unbearable suspense for him to speak of Mrs. Archer.

At last, loathing herself, she said, "How's the fascinating widow, Jim?"

He looked up sharply. "Who?" he questioned.

"Mrs. Archer."

"Oh! I don't see much of her. Play something, Marcia."

That night Marcia's fear became settled conviction.

More and more Harkness remained away from home and gave his business as his excuse. The children no longer interested him. In checking up his statements, Marcia detected slight variations from the truth.

He swaggered somewhat, and grew stouter, and the flesh of his cheeks reddened and sagged. Watching the daily disintegration of his spiritual fiber was as sad and nearly as hopeless as watching the lowering of a coffin in a newly-made grave.

But she kept silent. He frequently conveyed his growing resentment at her father's will.

It had been unjust, she admitted to herself, and her tolerance and love and all the faith she could summon were all that she had with which to pay the debt of injustice, but spendthrift as she was in that coin, affairs between them grew steadily worse.

It was the spring of their first year in New York when, in answer to a determined ring of her door-bell, Marcia one day admitted a beautiful girl to her living-room.

The stranger's eyes studied every detail of the room and finally settled on Marcia.

"Are you James Harkness's wife?" she asked at last in an emotional voice.

Marcia nodded. "Sit down, please, and tell me what I can do for you."

The girl's face dropped into her hands. "His wife!" she murmured. "Oh, how can I tell you! I shouldn't have come! I should have left you to your innocent happiness. I'll go at once."

She lifted her face and her lips fell into the lines of deep distress while tears started to her hauntingly familiar gray eyes.

Marcia, quelling by sheer will the panic which was turning her icy with fear, forced herself to study the girl. She observed the magnetic quality of her undeniable beauty—the richness of her costume which by a narrow margin escaped being bizarre.

While she was studying her, the girl fell on her knees beside Jim who, intuitively aware of his mother's troubles, was having difficulty in holding his baby lips steady.

The girl had her arm about Jim and Mark and in spite of their reluctance was drawing them to her.

"There are children?" she faltered. "Are these your children, Mrs. Harkness?"

Marcia had forgotten that the children were observers of the unwelcome tableau.

"Run along to the kitchen, chicks," she managed through stiff lips, "and tell Mary to give you some cookies."

She watched them go and then turned to her unbidden guest.

"They are my children," she said. "Now will you be so good as to explain what errand brings you here?"

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

An Eyebrow or Two

THE question of eyebrows seems not a very important one, but all girls know that eyebrows have much to do with beauty. And for that reason, alas! they often do more tampering with their eyebrows than is quite wise.

"How shall I trim my eyebrows?" asked a young girl the other day. And the only proper answer to that is, "Don't trim them at all." Trimming hair makes it grow in many cases, and trimming eyebrows would be apt to result in shaggy irregular brows anything but beautiful to look upon. I presume what this young girl had in mind was the plucking of her eyebrows, for there has been an epidemic of plucked eyebrows until it began to look as if eyebrows would vanish from the face of the earth altogether, for each girl seemed to vie with all that had gone before in an effort to get rid of even more hair from the eyebrow line.

People with very heavy shaggy eyebrows may be permitted to pull out a few to bring their brows nearer to the accepted quantity, but most girls have none too heavy brows and when they begin to experiment with tweezers the result is disastrous. Haven't you seen girls and women with so little eyebrow as to look almost like bald-headed men?

It is permissible to shape uneven brows by the use of tweezers. Sometimes little hairs stray away from the regular line and plant themselves over the bridge of the nose or up on the forehead or a little too close to the eye, and such hairs can be carefully and painstakingly removed by using tweezers, catching the hair close to the skin and with one firm jerk pulling it out by the roots. Other hairs may take its place later, and the tweezers will again have to be called into action. It is wise to draw the skin firm and tight with the fingers of one hand while wielding the tweezers with the other.

Eyebrows which meet over the nose have been called by the Persians "the bridge of love," but few women care to possess them as they are apt to give the brows a lowering appearance. Therefore in this case, also, tweezers are permissible. Too many hairs should not be pulled out in one spot at a time, or the skin is apt to become not only irritated but sore. It is a good plan to rub a little zinc oxide into the skin after using tweezers for more than a hair or two.

With these uses the function of the tweezer in relation to eyebrows should cease. The girl who attempts to pluck her brow into a particular shape or a thin line is entering upon a hazardous undertaking for nine times out of ten she keeps taking out "just one more" until she looks like a picked chicken. It is difficult for the amateur to do such a job neatly. Beauty shops pluck one's eyebrows more or less successfully. That is, they leave an even line, but it is apt to be scarcely more than a line and this too extreme a fashion to be attractive.

The eyebrows should be as carefully cared for as the rest of the hair, yet many people merely include them in the bathing of the face and grant them no more of a toilette. They should not only be washed but carefully brushed. They should first be brushed toward the nose with a small eyebrow brush which can be bought at any drug-store for ten to twenty-five cents. This will remove any dust, dandruff, etc., as brushing against the "grain" of the hair dislodges whatever dust may have settled there. After this, the brows should be brushed away from the nose, and in a careful arch—not just a hasty brushing but a thorough one until the hair is glossy and satiny-smooth. This treatment is not only good for the appearance of the brow but for its health as well. A little attention to this one feature of our appearance will add to the beauty of any face.

Answers to Questions

L. L.—Oh, my dear, imagine having such a lovely color that people accuse you of painting! And, also, imagine, girls, if you can, L. L. asking me how to make them "not so rosy." My dear, thank the gods for your privileges, and let your pink cheeks stay pink. Suppose people do say you paint? Rub a damp handkerchief triumphantly over your cheeks and show them that it is Nature's own coloring. When one thinks of the tons of rouge that are sold each year just to help women simulate the color that has come to you naturally, doesn't it seem foolish to try to get rid of it? Also, my dear, it can't be gotten rid of. That is, unless part of it is due to a little irritation of the skin. Sometimes women use soap on their facial skin and irritate and redden it. Do not use soap on the face—that is, do not rub it directly on the skin. Use it at night in the water with which you wash the face, and have that water very warm, rinsing in warm water thoroughly, and finally in cool and cold. But during the day use no soap, only water. It is perfectly all right to rub off the skin with a little cold cream and a pad of cotton—this will remove all soil without at the same time removing the oil of the skin which helps to keep it soft. Any good cream of standard make is satisfactory.

JANET.—Yes, my dear, you need to reduce. You are fairly well proportioned, for if your bust is 41 inches, your waist should be 31, and your hips 41. Your hips at 43 inches are out of proportion to the rest of the body. I presume you wear some sort of corset? If you do, be careful in putting it on. Never put on a corset which is already laced. Loosen the strings at night before taking off the corset. And in the morning slip on the corset with the lacings very loose indeed. Settle the corset at the proper waist-line, hook up the front, fasten front, side and back garters (you need at least three pairs of garters on a corset), then draw the corset strings at the waist-line until it is properly adjusted to the figure, leaving the top of the corset loosely laced but the waist-line snug. Then draw the corset strings a short distance from the bottom of the corset—and a full figure needs a long corset—and tie that snugly. However, at your age you shouldn't be wearing corsets, and I only mention this for fear because of your full figure you have been indulging in corsets, in spite of your age. The fact that you have pimples and blackheads as well as this excess of weight shows me that you are eating wrongly. All your troubles come from that. You probably eat many sweets, too much of everything, and are fond of what we call the fat-building foods. Stop right now, my dear, before you become a grossly fat woman. Eat carefully, properly and never overeat. It is not only fatal to your figure but is an unlovely habit, and makes you slow of mentality as well. So let us see how you can make yourself over in the next few months. First, cut out all sweets. After you have gotten yourself down to a reasonable weight, you may eat sweets again but only in moderation. If I were you I should try to reduce myself to 118 or 120 pounds. For breakfast, eat an orange or grapefruit, with scarcely any sugar—in fact, eat the orange without any. Or eat melon, which is a good fruit. You should have plenty of fruit, for your complexion's sake, but do not eat sugar with it. It is all right to eat berries, peaches, apples, etc., so long as they are in their natural state, unsugared. Then omit all cereal, cream, sugar, milk, but eat a couple of soft-boiled eggs. Eggs give you energy and strength without fat. One thin slice of crisp toast with the tiniest bit of butter is all that you should have in addition. Drink plenty of water during the morning. For dinner eat vegetables such as spinach, asparagus, turnips, string beans, beets, etc., but little or no butter on them or in them. Lean meat is permissible, but no fat meat such as bacon, salt pork, etc. For desserts stick to unsugared fruit. You can't have anything better than apples, oranges, peaches, melon. The same sort of food for your lunch, and you will soon begin to lose in weight. But you must also exercise, vigorously. You should walk at least half an hour at a time, each day, not a slow saunter along the streets of your town, but a brisk tramp out into the country, shoulders dropped and back straight, chin up, breathing as deeply as you can without effort or too much thought given to it. In addition you should give at least half an hour a day to indoor exercise, five or ten or fifteen minutes at a time. Here are three good exercises; practice each of them at least twice a day for fifteen or twenty times—as long as you can do so without getting over-fatigued. Take a good body bath daily, even if you must do so standing on a folded towel and bathing a portion of the body at a time with sponge or wash-cloth. Friction the skin well with a bath-towel. Keep the bowels open daily, not with cathartics, but with proper food, fruit and vegetables, enough water and exercise. Cut out potatoes, macaroni, rice and all but a tiny thin slice of toasted white bread. White bread is both fattening and constipating. Also avoid all cereals, and do not use cream or milk for a time, while your allowance of butter should be almost nothing. Certain foods, as you know, build fat, while other foods do not contain fat-building properties. It is easy to see that for a time at least you should eat not at all of foods which will add fat to your figure. Now, my dear, take this seriously. You are only fifteen, and can make your figure almost what you will. If you keep on, however, as you have been doing, you will be a grossly fat woman, unlovely to look at and unwieldly to yourself. This is totally unnecessary; regulate your appetite so that you never eat too much, and regulate your diet so that you avoid foods that build fat. With just a tiny bit of perseverance on your part, you will find the pounds slowly slipping away and you will develop a figure that will be attractive, graceful and one of which you will be proud to own.

Exercise to Reduce Abdomen and Promote Elimination

Lying on the back on the bed or on the floor, in a loose garment without anything to bind, and without garters or bands (a nightdress is best or a bathing or gym suit), raise the right leg to a perpendicular position without bending the knee. The arms should lie along the sides, and the back should be flat on the bed. If it is not possible to bring the leg perfectly upright, bring it as far as possible, but the knee must not be bent in any case. Now lower the leg as slowly as possible, again without bending the knee. The more slowly the leg is lowered, the more benefit is derived from the exercise, because the muscles of the abdomen are exercised to hold the leg from falling. So let the leg down the tiniest fraction of an inch at a time. Repeat five or ten times; then practice the exercise with the left leg then with both legs together. You may have to rest between these three divisions of this exercise. While you may not be able to bring the leg to perpendicular for some little time, because of unused muscles, in time you can do this.

Exercise to Reduce Abdomen

Standing erect, chin up, chest out, shoulders dropped, heels together and toes turned out slightly, raise the arms over the head, palms facing forward. Now bending only at the waist, keeping both knees and elbows rigid, throw the arms forward and down and attempt to touch the floor with the tips of the fingers. Inhale as you raise your arms, exhale as you throw them down. Practice five, ten or fifteen times at one practice. Eventually you will be able to touch the floor, but probably not at once. However, you are young enough to have limber muscles and so may be able to do this at once. Practice it, in any case, every day twice.

Exercise for the Waist-line and to Promote Digestion

Standing erect, hands on hips, fingers forward and thumbs back, chest out and chin up, turn the body at the waist as far to the left as possible. Do not alter the position of the head but let it be carried around with the upper part of the body. Now turn the body at the waist as far to the right as possible. Make a big effort each time to move it even a little further than the last time. Practice ten or fifteen times.

USING TWEEZERS TO SHAPE THE BROWS.

If you will practice these three sets of exercises, twice a day regularly, you will be surprised at the change it will make. Remember the object of an exercise is to train certain muscles to do certain things. If you practice three days, then omit practicing for two, you are right back where you were to begin with; the only way to get real good from exercises is to practice every day regularly. Suppose you were training a dog in certain tricks. He would never learn if you showed him how one day, then did nothing for two more days, then took up the training again. You need to keep right at it. It is so in training your muscles and remodeling your body. Every day you omit the work you have gone back from where you started. Keep at it until you have accomplished the results. One thing about exercises, which most people forget, is that what is good to reduce fat is also good to build up muscle; so while I am giving you these exercises to reduce your weight, and while they will surely do it, a thin person could take them and gain in weight. The reason for this is that the exertion of the exercise wears away your fat while at the same time stimulating the digestive and eliminative organs to action; while as there is no fat to get rid of on the thin person and as no exercise will wear away the muscles, the thin person develops those muscles so that they add size to the body while at the same time the digestive organs being stimulated, more nourishment is secured from the food, more impurities eliminated from the body, and the thin person is as much benefited as the person over weight.

ONE OF MY FRIENDS.—If your complexion is muddy and pimply, that means your little stomach is not working properly and that you are probably not treating that useful organ just right. From your weight, it is evident either that you do not eat enough nourishing food or that your stomach does not assimilate it. You need advice just the opposite of what I gave "Janet." As soon as you get up in the morning, drink a glass of water; after you have finished dressing, drink another. In winter it is a good thing to drink hot water instead of cold; it stimulates the stomach and gets it into condition to digest its breakfast. Do not drink water with your meals, because that dilutes the gastric juice which has the work of digestion to perform and of course never take liquid into the mouth while there is food in it. The food should be thoroughly chewed until it is practically liquid before being swallowed; if you drink while food is in the mouth, it softens the food and you swallow it; but liquid of this kind does not have the digestive properties of the saliva which is put in the mouth for this purpose, so while the food is softened it is not acted upon chemically as it should be. Certain elements of food are digested almost entirely in the mouth; if you swallow such foods without proper chewing, they are only partly digested. Starchy foods, such as potatoes, rice, macaroni, white bread, many cereals, are digested almost entirely in the mouth. It is really a very important thing to be well and strong, and one cannot remain so if conditions in the body are such as to produce pimples and muddy skin. So get to work, my dear, and make up your mind to be as nearly a perfect woman as possible. Do not eat between meals, do not eat great quantities of sweets, such as candy, preserves, cake, pie, etc. Eat plenty of good wholesome food. Your breakfast should consist of fruit, berries with sugar and cream, or melon, or peaches and cream, a baked apple and cream, a dish of prunes soaked over night then cooked slowly a couple of hours, etc., etc. Any one of these is good for you. It wouldn't hurt you to eat prunes every morning for awhile—a good big dish of properly cooked ones—for it would help your elimination. After your fruit, you should eat a big bowl of cereal and cream, with buttered toast, and you should have in addition a soft-boiled egg or a poached egg—soft, of course. You can eat bacon, lamb, mutton, roast beef, steak, fish, chicken, duck, goose. Avoid veal and pork because they require so much work to digest, and it is evident your digestive apparatus is not working just properly. Eat potatoes, rice, plenty of green vegetables. Always have one fresh vegetable with lunch and dinner—a lettuce salad, sliced tomatoes, string beans, spinach (very good for you), creamed carrots, buttered beets, etc., etc. If you are constipated do not eat much white bread, but if your bowels operate freely once or twice a day, then eat bread and butter, chewing it until it is liquid. Drink milk with your breakfast and your lunch. Never drink coffee or tea. Practice the exercises I have given "Janet." They will stimulate all your organs to action and do you worlds of good. Soon your complexion will be as clear as anybody's. Don't forget the daily bath—a good thorough one, too.

INDIANA.—I am sorry that the rules of this department do not permit of my answering inquiries by mail, but here is a reply to your letter. You gave no nom de plume so I have invented one for you. Part of your trouble with superfluous hair no doubt comes from the use of depilatories. You are wise to discard them, but a little late. The peroxide and ammonia treatment which you are using is the best home treatment. If you are near a big city, and can manage to get there for an electrolysis treatment at the very best beauty establishment in town, you could have the hairs on your lip removed by electric needle. Probably it would not cost you more than $5, perhaps not so much. The rate is usually $5 per hour, but many hairs can be taken out in even fifteen minutes. It hurts, of course, but it is worth the effort. In the meantime stick to the peroxide; you can see for yourself that the hairs are not very noticeable after this treatment. How long it will take to kill your hair which has been so stimulated by the application of various compounds, I cannot say. New hairs come in from time to time, in any case, and you will have to be ever watchful. Since your hair has been so stimulated, there is no harm in using the tweezers as you have been doing. Be careful, always, however, to clasp the hair right next the skin and pull it out with one quick jerk, bringing the root with it. As for the hair on your arms, leave it alone, except for the peroxide and ammonia. Usually people subject to a growth of hair have more vitality than those who are not, so comfort yourself with that. You should have quite a magnetic personality.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

I found a great stack of old COMFORTS the other day and spent one whole day, nearly, in cutting out the Cubby Bear stories and making them into a book which will be attractive after the pictures have been painted.

I am twenty-nine years old and unmarried. I would like to hear from some of the sisters.

Lovingly, SUE

TEXAS.

DEAR MOTHER WILKINSON, SISTERS AND BROTHERS:

Did you see that smile on Mrs. Wilkinson's face? I just knew she liked the name "Mother."

I've come to talk about little folks for I love children. They have been discussed in different ways but I've never yet heard anything about children telling lies. Mothers, be careful. If you give your little girl a plate of food and she upsets it onto the floor and you know that she did it, don't go to her and say, "Who did that?" How easy it is to tell a lie then. Ask her why she did that and it won't be so easy to tell a lie then. I hope you understand what I mean.

How many girls in their teens have to do all the housework? I cook, sew, wash and iron and do nearly all the housework. My dear mother has been sick with rheumatism for a long time and is not able to do much work.

I am trying my hand at turkey raising this year.

I am a country lassie, five feet, four inches tall, weigh 150 pounds and have greyish brown eyes, a light complexion and dark brown wavy hair. If the woman who wanted the song, "St. Peter at the Golden Gate," will write to me I will send her a copy of it.

I've looked and looked for a letter from Pearl Vesey and Nelle Fischer. Where are they?

I am leaving my address with Mrs. Wilkinson. The first of September is my birthday (I will be nineteen) and I'd like to have a postcard shower.

HOME LOVING LASSIE.

Home Loving Lassie.—As long as you told no deep, dark secrets of your life, don't you think you should have given your name and address? You'd have gotten more postcards if you had. People are going to read your letter and say to themselves, "I believe I'll send her a card, she seems like a nice little girl," and they'll hunt up a view of Main Street or the Library or a "Happy Birthday" card and get out the pen and ink and hunt around for a stamp and then—they'll discover that you didn't give your name or address. "Humph," they'll say, "I guess she doesn't care much whether she gets any cards or not, not giving her name. I'm not going to bother with her." That's what will happen to you and what would have happened to several others in this issue whose requests were not published because they didn't give their names, or rather because they asked to have their names and addresses withheld.—Ed.

AMHERST JCT., WISC.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL:

I live in a small village. My husband is a potato buyer. We have been married nearly five years and have a sweet baby girl, two and one-half years old.

I want to tell you about my scheme for filing recipes. I take the cards from the Shredded Wheat Biscuit packages. These are 3½x7⅜ inches, though cards of any dimension would do. I clip from COMFORT and other magazines the recipes I want to keep and paste them on these cards, putting one subject on a card or cards. For instance, I paste all cookie recipes on one card or on several cards and put an elastic band around them, and the same with the cards having cake recipes. This is better than a book as I can arrange them in alphabetical order.

Intestinal Influenza

DURING the last three months in our talks we have taken up some of the most common summer diseases of babies, and given the symptoms and simple treatment. We have also given some suggestions in regard to preventive measures, and these are the things to bear in mind and follow out.

There is an old maxim or saying, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," and this certainly is true in the care of babies.

If by a little special care in regard to exposure, drafts and clothing, we can prevent baby from taking cold, it is far better than to know how to treat the cold.

If by carefully looking after the food, the digestion and bowels we can prevent the sensitive intestinal mucous membrane from becoming irritated or inflamed, we will save baby and mother a lot of suffering and worry.

No line of talk or advice one could give is applicable to all cases, at all times under the different surroundings that must be met, but one must take into consideration the general ideas expressed and so far as possible apply them to your own individual case, and by so doing I think you will get help.

A nursing mother would like to eat the food the rest of the family are eating, but she must consider the fact that she is eating for two people, and food that gives her but slight indigestion may cause baby a serious intestinal disturbance.

If it is a bottle-fed baby we must bear in mind the dangers, especially in hot weather, of the unclean bottle and nipple, also be sure that the cow is healthy if you are giving modified milk. The first two years of a baby's life is most certainly a trying time as it eats what is given it with a natural tendency of putting in its mouth and swallowing everything within its reach.

If a baby persistently vomits its food you may be certain that it does not agree with it, and if it is modified milk or prepared food look for the cause.

Dilute it a little at a time and see if you cannot find a strength that it can take without vomiting. If it is a nursing baby, it may be nursing too fast, or too often, or the mother's milk may not agree with baby.

Mothers must take all these conditions into consideration, find the cause in their special case and remove it.

I wish to call your attention to a new disease that is called intestinal influenza. When we speak of influenza, we at once think of the great epidemic of 1918 that swept all over the world and caused millions of deaths.

This form of influenza appears in milder form in different parts of the country, but as in 1918 attacks the lungs and heart with more or less complications.

INTESTINAL INFLUENZA, so-called, is an entirely different disease and seems to attack the organs of digestion, and the most characteristic symptom is gas, with severe pain of a colicky nature. The baby or older child may seem to be well, but is suddenly taken with a severe pain in abdomen with more or less vomiting and diarrhea.

On examination you will find that the abdomen is very much distended, and this does not seem to be relieved by vomiting or the diarrhea. The attack comes on so suddenly, especially in a child old enough to walk and play around, that the mother thinks the child must have injured itself. In one case I was called to see a little boy four years old, who was playing and suddenly began to cry out and press his hands on his abdomen. Symptoms of this kind at this time of year make us think of green apples, but in this case the mother assured me there were no green apples eaten, but thought the boy might have fallen and received some serious intestinal injury or hernia. Scientists who have investigated this disease claim that it is caused by a germ, a gas bacillus that seems to thrive in an acid medium.

In some sections of this country there has been quite an epidemic, and while there have been few, if any, fatal cases, there is a great deal of suffering and the little patients become very weak and thin.

The most important part of the treatment is to stop the pain and this has to be done with some opiate. In older children minute doses of morphine, in babies two to five drops of tincture of opium, dose depending on age, in teaspoonful doses of castor oil. The opium stops the pain, checks the irritability of the bowels, and the castor oil relieves the gas. Externally, hot turpentine stupes should be applied all over the abdemen. These are made by putting one tablespoonful of turpentine to eight ounces of hot water, wring out cloths as hot as possible, then cover with dry flannel. The diet must be very simple, avoiding all acids. It may consist of equal parts of vichy water and milk, lime-water and milk, diluted beef juice. For the thirst give small pieces of cracked ice if patient is large enough to suck them; if not, swab out mouth often and give small sips of water.

The patient usually responds to treatment, and with careful diet there will be no complications.

Questions and Answers

SORE NAVEL.—My 16-months-old baby boy has had trouble with his navel ever since he was born as it never healed up. It is red and wet all the time and sometimes a bloody-looking water oozes out of it.

MRS. L. M., Armathwaits, Tenn.

A.—It would seem better that your baby had the personal attention of a surgeon, but if this is not possible would suggest that you bathe navel with one per cent. Dakins' solution once a day, and touch up any unhealed parts with nitrate of silver stick, then dusting on some precipitated sulphur powder.

WEANING BABY.—Should the mother of a six-months-old baby wean it if she becomes pregnant, and what should she feed it? MRS. H. B., Marcus, Ia.

A.—Yes, she should wean baby at once, giving it modified milk, also oatmeal gruel.

SWOLLEN NAVEL.—What can I do for my 17-months-old baby whose navel swells? She also has a yellowish discharge that irritates and inflames her.

MRS. W. R. H., Greer, S. C.

A.—Should press the navel back into place and hold it with button and adhesive straps. Take button size of silver quarter, cover with soft gauze or cotton, with the rounded on concave side pressing inside on navel, and hold it there with strips of adhesive plaster, wearing this for some months, changing gauze and adhesive often enough to hold the navel in place. For the yellowish discharge, should bathe the parts with Dakins' solution, also should give baby two drop doses of tincture of chloride of iron, three times a day, in water or simple syrup.

ENLARGED GLAND OF NECK.—I have a baby one month old that has an enlarged gland on the right side of its neck and am writing to find out what I can do to remove it. MRS. G. K., Kaufman, Texas.

A.—Should try applications of Iodex, on clean gauze. If you get no relief from this, would suggest that you consult a competent surgeon, but do not hurry about this as baby is rather young for surgical treatment.

FOOD FOR BABY.—Will you tell me how to fix modified milk for baby nine months old who has two teeth? I am all run down, myself, weigh but 88 pounds; wish you would sugget help for me.

MRS. E. B., Salem, Oregon.

A.—I should wean baby at once, putting it on one part water to three parts of milk, teaspoonful of sugar of milk and tablespoonful of lime-water to each six-ounce feeding, giving this every three hours during the daytime; soon the baby ought to be able to take the milk without the addition of water. You can also feed the baby oatmeal gruel, stale wheat bread toasted, graham crackers. For yourself, weaning the baby will help you, but should take some preparation of iron, Gude's Peptomangan, or Neoferrum. Get out in the open air all you can and take, every three hours, a tablet containing one grain each of valerianate of iron, quinine and zinc.

WEANING BABY, WOOL SHIRTS.—I have three girls, baby is seven months old. She never cries, only when it is time to nurse her, but how can I break her of nursing in the night? Should I give her food? Do you advise wool shirts and stockings?

MRS. K. I., Mapleton, Ia.

A.—Do not nurse seven-months-old baby during night; if she wakes up, give her water to drink. No, I should not give her food if she is gaining, as mixed feeding is not ideal. Yes, I think wool shirts and stockings are best to wear.

CONSTIPATED BABY.—What can I do for my six-months-old baby, bottle fed, who has always been slightly constipated? Sometimes the stools are streaked with blood. She has no teeth. Why do they not come? MRS. E. S., Tillamook, Oregon.

A.—Give teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia often enough in her food to keep bowels freely open, graham crackers, molasses cookies, plenty of water to drink will also help relieve constipation. The exact time that a baby's teeth should arrive is uncertain and there are many normal healthy babies a year old without a sign of a tooth.

BREAKING OUT ON BABY'S FACE.—My five-months-old baby, who is bottle fed, has at times a breaking out on his face. Can you tell me the cause, and what to do for it? MRS. R. E. B., Castlewood, S. D.

A.—Without much doubt, the breaking out is caused by indigestion, and I would suggest that you dilute his food a little with water, also give tablespoonful of lime-water to each six-ounce feeding. Give teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia often enough to keep bowels open.

SLUGGISH LIVER.—My 17-months-old baby is having trouble with his bowels and liver. The bowels move too often and stools do not look right, and at times he has a swarthy look, and I think he needs something for his liver as the bile does not seem to be right.

MRS. R. J., Texarkana, Texas.

A.—If the bowels are too free, give baby, three times a day, a tablet containing Bismuth Subnitrate, three grains, and Pepsin Sacch, two grains. I am a little confused as to what causes you to think that the liver and bile are at fault, but if you mean by the swarthy look to the skin that the baby is jaundiced, give baby every three hours a tablet containing one-fourth grain each of calomel and soda, for a few doses. Do this once a week, or whenever this condition shows up.

PAINFUL URINATION.—My five-months-old baby girl at times cries out when urinating. What is the cause and what can I do for her? I am all the time craving starch and chalk, and will these injure baby, as I am nursing her? MRS. E. H. M., Gilford, Mont.

A.—Without much doubt, the baby's urine is highly acid, which would make it irritating and painful. Would suggest that you take alkalies in the form of lime-water, vichy water, and avoid acid foods. The craving for chalk and starch would seem to me to be rather a morbid longing, and I do not think I should indulge myself, although I do not see how it would injure baby.

WEANING BABY.—When should I wean my 10-months-old baby, and what can I feed him? He is healthy and has six teeth. MRS. C. C. S., Texarkana, Ark.

A.—You should wean baby when he is 11 months old. His diet should consist mostly of milk, but you can give him oatmeal gruel, custards, stale wheat bread toasted, graham crackers, beef and chicken broths, coddled eggs, one per day.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

I am an ex-teacher and not a good cook. That is why I had to fix some device for recipes.

I have just finished a bedspread of unbleached sheeting, and appliqued an original wildrose design of my own.

I would not teach children the alphabet before sending them to school. It does not help them. Let the little ones cut out the numbers that are on the sheets of a large calendar. Give them another sheet that is not cut and let them arrange the numbers in order, looking at this sheet. I think six years the best age to send children to school. My greatest difficulty was that children were sent to school when they were too young. If I start to talk school I won't stop!

Best wishes to all. MRS. BERNIE JOHNSON.

WISCONSIN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I am a farmer's wife and like farm life in most ways. My chief objection is that there is usually no provision made for the farm women going away from home unless taken by some of the men, and this isn't always convenient.

How many of the sisters have clean-kept lawns? In the spring see that the lawn is put in good condition and plant some new shrubbery, vines and flower seeds. Where do you discard such rubbish as cannot be burned? I have a barrel set a little way from the house and put tin cans, glass, etc., in it. When it is full it is easy enough to have it carried somewhere and dumped. So many farmers have so much work to do on the farm that they neglect their yards. When I am tired I like to look out upon a freshly mowed lawn and especially in the moonlight with the shadows of the trees upon it.

I do my own housework and sewing with the exception of the very best, raise chickens and take care of the garden and help care for the lawn. I have help mowing it as it is large and there are twenty trees on it.

I would like the sisters to each tell a couple of helps or short cuts in housework for it would help so many. I will begin it.

1. I never stand to do any ironing. I sit on my kitchen stool and am not tired when through. It is a medium high stool and I soon learned to iron this way.

2. Don't use a piece of soap after it gets thin and small enough to be bothersome, but put it in a pail kept especially for such things and after there is enough pour hot water in pail and use for washing machine or scrub water.

My family consists of my husband, little daughter, not quite three years old, a hired man and myself.

Jackie, I am glad to hear you have a "Better Baby." Mine was not but is next thing to it. She is a fine, healthy girl. If there is ever another it will be a real "Better Baby."

A CONTENTED FARMER'S WIFE.

WISCONSIN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for over fifteen years.

How many of you sit down while doing your kitchen work? Use a stool made for this purpose or an old organ stool, turned up to the desired height. It works fine. Mother uses one and it saves her a lot of trouble with her feet.

Have your children bow legs? My little girl had and I always tied her legs together above the knee with an old stocking. I did this every night. She never fussed when I did it and always reminded me of it when I forgot it. Her legs are nice and straight now.

Mrs. Vernon, I believe in buying good things that wear longer instead of buying cheap goods which soon look shabby.

I am twenty-five years old and have been married five years. I have a dear husband and two children, a girl three and one-half years old and a boy fourteen months. A FLOWER LOVER.

SO. CHARLESTON, W. VA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have always been so interested in COMFORT that I could hardly wait from one month to another for its arrival. You don't know me so I will tell you about myself. I am twenty-five years old, five feet, two inches tall and weigh at present one hundred and five pounds. I have dark brown hair and eyes. We live in town, our own home and have one dear little boy, almost four years old. I am sending his picture which I hope to see in COMFORT whether my letter is printed or not. His name is Albert McCray. He likes to have me read the Cubby Bear stories to him and he knows his alphabet and can recite several poems. He is an industrious little fellow and wants to help me do the housework so. I shall teach him housework just as though he were a girl. He has everything he wants to play with and enjoys himself even though he is alone. We take delight in fixing things to please him. Just now he is with his grandmother as I have been sick and am unable to care for him. I long for the time to come when I can have him with me. I have a good home and husband and I love him and my home and baby. Could one ask for more of this world's blessings? I wish every sister who writes a letter to this Corner could say the same.

ALBERT MCCRAY.

Good wishes to each sister and dear Mrs. Wilkinson.

MRS. C. W. MCCRAY.

PARK RAPIDS, MINN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL THE SISTERS:

I want to join your happy circle and hope I can be worthy of wearing a Sisters' Pin. I have been wanting one for years.

I love COMFORT and I couldn't think of being without it.

I've had many helps through this corner and now that I've succeeded in one of my own attempts lately I will tell you about it. I have three dear little ones, a boy nine years old, a girl seven and another boy of two. My oldest boy and girl would never be as good friends as I wished them to be and though they seldom actually fought they were always quarrelling and tattling, "Mamma, brother this," and, "Mamma, sister that." It got to be a habit, this whining voice of his, until it got on my nerves. I don't believe in much spanking so I told him if he would stop whining I would give him a nice present, but that every time he tattled or whined I would mark an X against his name and the more X's he got the smaller his present would be. Every time after that that they would cry, quarrel or tattle I would mark an X under their name. Now they are the most loving children I ever saw and they enjoyed the game themselves. When they hurt themselves they would rub the hurt place and laugh as hard as they used to cry. If one hurt the other I would mark the one that cried as well as the one that did the hurting. That kept them from crying for nothing and giving the other an X.

I would not teach my daughter dancing, no matter how graceful it would make her. I danced and not a little either but I know better now. I am sure all actors are not bad but the stage is not safe and it is a risky place to send your daughter.

I am, your admiring TORA-ANNE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I hail from South Carolina to chat with you all. I'd like to sit where I could hear Pearl Vesey talk for she simply radiates sunshine with her optimism. All would get more out of life if they looked for the silver lining of the clouds in their lives.

At present we are living in Greenwood, S. C., having moved here from Georgia, near a little place called Cobbtown. I've always lived on a farm so it is only natural that I miss the things connected with it. I like the people whom I've met but I miss the dear folks from down home.

Saving Garden Plants for Winter Cheer

By Eveline Vance

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

SUMMER is waning and all lovers of garden flowers begin to dread the approaching season when pinching frosts will lay waste the floral splendor that is their joy and pride, and they wish it were possible to carry indoors all, instead of a chosen few, of these cherished friends. Adapting outdoor plants to indoor conditions is no small undertaking, but the one who succeeds in growing a window full of healthy, vigorous plants is well rewarded. For those who have had little or no experience, a few simple instructions will give a start in the right direction.

A southern exposure for flowering plants is necessary, and if there is a bay window to catch the extra light and the morning and afternoon sun the situation is ideal. Swinging or stationary brackets on the sides, shelves across the front, with perhaps a hook in the ceiling for a hanging plant will utilize full capacity. In deciding upon the number of plants it must be remembered that they will increase in size and must not be crowded. All arrangements for the care of the plants should be made before they are taken from the ground, and the earlier in the fall this is done the better, for the chilly nights are injurious to most plants. By taking the plants in early they have a chance to gradually recover from the shock of transplanting before the fires are started and the doors and windows closed. All plants require moisture in the air, and for this reason they usually thrive in kitchen windows unless exposed to cold drafts from outside doors. If there is no source of moisture for the plants, a dish of water must be kept on the stove or register, otherwise lice, red spiders or mealy bugs are likely to appear. Bad air and coal gas is as injurious to plant as to human life.

Window plants should be turned a little every day so that each side will be equally exposed, otherwise they will be one-sided, for they always grow toward the sun and light. Room must be given for drawing the shades at night as a protection from the cold window glass. In placing plants, those requiring the most heat are put at the top of the window where the temperature will be much higher.

Decorative Accessories

In recent years we have been following more and more the Japanese idea of making all things decorative that have to do with flowers and plants. The parrot sitting on his perch at the top of the page, and the canary which appears above the grapefruit plant are called bird-sticks, typically Japanese, and are used to give support to such plants as may need a prop.

ENGLISH IVY.

These birds are very simple to make, in fact, children who draw can do them. Make an outline of the bird on a thin piece of wood such as a cigar box cover. Then jig it out or cut with a sharp jack-knife. Paint in bright colors and mount on a small stick which is best painted leaf green.

The painted watering-pot is another testimony to our love for making things about us attractive. It is small and oval and is first painted inside and out to prevent rusting. Field daisies are painted on one side, which makes it so pretty that leaving it out of place gives no offense.

Painted flower-pots are receiving considerable attention, and with a very little practice one masters this method of decorating. Designs from wall-paper or cretonne can be copied on a dark foundation. The design on the grapefruit plant-pot is dark green with a yellow scallop at the top. The jardinieres have been considerably displaced by the home-decorated pots.

Potting-Soil and Fertilizers

It is only in a general way that a rule for plant soil can be given, as the character of the soil in different localities varies so greatly. If leaf-mold, rotted sod, sand and old manure are available, excellent results with all ordinary house plants may be obtained. If you have rich garden soil that contains considerable clay, it should be mixed with charcoal or sand and leaf-mold. If the soil is very sandy, it requires rotted sand and manure. A very thorough mixing of the different ingredients that go into the making of the soil is necessary before potting begins. In a wooden box spread the materials in layers, then turn the whole mass over and over with a shovel until mixed and fine. Never attempt to use earth that is so wet that when taken in the hand moisture can be squeezed from it. Spread and nearly dry, so that when mixing is completed the whole mass will be of a crumbly consistency. If the soil is made too heavy, or too rich, it will cause the roots to rot.

PAINTED FLOWER-POT

Sand or charcoal makes the best soil drainage for plants that are likely to remain in the pots for a year or more without repotting. Use a clean sand such as masons use for making mortar. Charcoal also prevents souring of the soil.

You can easily make your own charcoal. First, start a hot fire with plenty of wood, and when this is about half burned out, push it into a compact, level pile, and closely fill the stove with hard wood and let it burn down to a bed of solid coals with all drafts closed. Take out the charcoal, extinguish any fire that lingers in it, and when cold place in a bag and pound with a wooden mallet until well broken; then sift out the fine to mix with the soil, and return the coarser for drainage in the bottom of pots.

Liquid fertilizer made from cow manure is the best for house plants and has the advantage of being available in most sections. When made from horse or sheep manure the danger of burning is greater. All manure shuld be at least one year old. One and one-half peck of cow manure to 12 gallons of soft water is a safe proportion, but when made from sheep manure use only three quarts, or from horse manure six quarts to the 12 gallons of water.

On an average, plants do better not to mix fertilizer into the potting soil, using the manure solution instead whenever the plants require feeding. With well-rotted sod and leaf-mold the plant will find nourishment enough for a considerable length of time. Under-fertilizing produces better results to house plants than over-fertilizing which causes many plant troubles. With proper soil to start with, care in watering, fairly even temperature and sun, plants will usually thrive throughout the winter without being disturbed unless they are attacked by plant lice which suck the sap from the plant and cause loss of vitality. These tiny insects will be found on the under side of the leaf, and a weak tobacco tea, or soap-suds applied with a small bulb syringe seems likely to be the only effective way of exterminating them. The first application is not likely to reach them all and must be repeated.

Sometimes a plant will suddenly take on a sickly yellow appearance, which indicates some insect has attacked the roots. First press the earth back from the sides of the pot in several places and pour in some of the weak tobacco tea, at the same time pouring some into the saucer where it will be taken up through the soil. If this fails, the plant must be taken from the pot, the soil removed and the roots washed. The best way to do this is to remove the plant, as described in this column, then set it in a pail of tepid soap-suds that just cover the soil. In a short time the soil will have loosened from the roots until it will rinse away with little disturbance to them, and at the same time the roots have been cleansed. Whale-oil soap is excellent for this purpose, but ordinary soap is usually effective. Rinse the roots in clear tepid water and put the plant into fresh soil and a clean pot. In doing this, with the left hand hold the plant in position, and the roots so they will mass as little as possible.

In most communities will be found a store that sells plant remedies with directions for their use, also plant foods and fertilizer. If your local store does not carry them, they will be found listed in seed catalogues from which you can order by mail.

Wonderful Clay Brings New Beauty to Every Skin!

SCIENCE is giving new complexions for old through a marvelous discovery! Dull, blemished skins are being transformed into exquisite softness and smoothness almost at once. Years of scientific research and experiment have finally revealed the elements which, when combined in certain exact proportions, clear the pores of every impurity, and leave the complexion as clear and charming as a child's.

The skin is provided by Nature with millions of tiny pores with which to expel acids and impurities. When dust bores deeply into these pores and stifles them the impurities remain in the skin. The result is not always noticeable at first. But soon the complexion becomes dull and harsh. Suddenly the face "breaks out" in blemishes and blackheads. And if the impurities are still allowed to remain, the complexion becomes ruined entirely.

The New Discovery Explained

Certain elements, when correctly combined, have been found to possess a remarkable potency. These elements have been blended into a soft, cream-like clay, delicately scented. It is applied to the face with the finger tips—just as a cream would be applied.

The wonderful discovery has been given the name of Domino Complexion Clay. The moment it is applied, the millions of tiny pores in the skin awaken and hungrily absorb the nourishing skin-foods. In a few minutes the clay dries and hardens into a fragrant mask. There is a cool, tingling sensation. You will actually feel the tiny pores breathing, relaxing, freeing themselves with relief from the impurities that clogged them.

Allow Domino Complexion Clay to remain for a little while. Then remove the fragrant mask of clay—and with it you will remove every bit of dead skin, every harmful impurity, every blemish. A hidden beauty will be revealed—beneath the old complexion will be found a new one with all the soft, smooth texture and delicate coloring of youth!

What Users Say:

I received my jar of Complexion Clay and I am very much pleased with it. My face was full of blackheads, wrinkles and large pores, and there is a great improvement already. I cannot say enough for it; every woman who has facial toubles ought to give it a trial. It's wonderful.
Mrs. A. B. Scott, Geneva, New York.

I think your Complexion Clay is wonderful and no woman should be without it, and you can tell anyone who wants to write to me regarding it. I used it twice and my friends say I am looking fine. I want to thank you for letting me know of your wonderful preparation.
Mrs. A. Pothe, 137 N. 7th St., Brooklyn, N.Y.

I received the Complexion Clay, and it is a pleasure for me to recommend it. I used it several times and it has done more good for my skin than anything I have ever used.
Mrs. D. Smith, Manville, N. J.

Thrift in Home Dyeing

By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

TO increase the service of materials made into wearing apparel, only those of a good quality should be purchased. In other words, by adding but a fraction more to the price of a yard of cloth, it will do double service, for the higher-priced materials are made of longer staple which gives wearing quality, and being wider will require less in length from which to cut a garment. All materials worth the labor of making into wearing apparel, whether woven from linen, cotton, silk or woolen, are washable. Science has given us many substitutes for the pure thread which has its own rich finish, but many of them will not stand the test of washing without undue shrinkage, cockling and breaking, to say nothing of the artificial finish which disappears at the first tubbing. So if, after reasonable service, there still remain portions of garments fit for further service before doing duty in floor mats, they must be made of genuine materials.

LABEL THE BOTTLE.

Often used fabrics are worth remaking but the color has faded and must be renewed. Dyeing was a tedious process in olden times when the "gude" wife must gather the wild bark, nuts, blossoms and various leaves from which to "steepe" the color for all her household dyeing. Compare such laborious effort to spending but a few cents for a package of powder that will give most any color or shade, and comfortably preparing it with little labor, the present-day housewife may count her task an easy one.

There are two types of package dyes, the choice depending on the nature of the fabric to be dyed. One is called general dye, and dyes all kinds of materials. The other is called specific dye, and of this there are two kinds, one kind is for silk or wool, and another for cotton or linen. As package dye is distinctly marked as to the purpose of its contents, no mistake can be made. There are also printed directions for mixing and setting the dye which must be carefully followed for satisfactory results.

Still another class of home dyeing is done with dye soaps, which are very satisfactory in restoring ribbons, silk waists, faded cotton or linen materials to their original color.

Preparing the Material and Selecting Colors

Thorough cleaning before dyeing is necessary. If not done, all spots and stains will take the dye unevenly. Cleansing by ordinary washing is sufficient for most materials, with especial care that all soapy water be rinsed out. If a garment is to be recut, it is best to rip it apart, remove all fastenings and rip out hems before washing.

Wash silks can be dyed satisfactorily, also the China and Japanese silks, foulards, georgette and crepe de chines, but the cheaper silks which have been treated to a mineral solution to make them look heavier and better, make results doubtful. This treatment of cheaper silks is called "weighting" and can be easily detected by applying a lighted match to a small piece of the goods; if the material flames and curls into a small ball it is not weighted, but if it does not burn with a flame, but chars and retains its original shape, it is weighted.

In selecting the desired color it must be borne in mind that the very darkest shade of the material has to be "covered." For this reason, the professional dyer will only guarantee the darker shades. To obtain as light a shade as the original or lighter, all color must first be removed from the fabric, and as this is done with powerful bleaches, it is not an advisable undertaking. Cotton or linen can be boiled in a solution of washing soda, using two tablespoons to each gallon of water. This should be rapidly done, and the soda water boiled out through several waters.

Another reason for selecting dark colors is that in dyeing garments whole, the seams, hems and other thick places will not take the dye as evenly as one thickness, and often require redipping.

Preparing and Using the Dye

In using the package dye the easiest method is to dissolve the entire contents of the package. The label will state color and whether the dye is general or specific. Dissolve the dye in one quart of hot soft water; rain water is preferable. Strain the dye through cloth thick enough to catch the undissolved particles before bottling. If you have some liquid glue at hand, it is well to glue the part of envelope containing directions onto the bottle. When the dye is prepared in this form, quite frequently it is useful in coloring rinse waters. For example, if some dark brown dye is added when rinsing khaki colored shirts, blouses, trousers or girls' dresses, they will keep an even color.

The dye bath may be prepared in a tin, granite or agate-ware kettle. Weigh material to be dyed, as the package usually indicates a certain amount of dye to every pound of material. If you have less than a pound, do not use all the dye.

Put garment or material into kettle and cover with soft warm water, work through the hands until thoroughly wet, then wring out. Two things are thus accomplished; the material must be wet in order to have the dye penetrate evenly, and the amount of water necessary to cover the material has been ascertained. Now add to the water about half the amount of dye called for in the directions, and the material for setting color, which is properly called the mordant. The most commonly used household mordants are salt and vinegar. Shake out the wet material and lay into the dye bath, stirring with a wooden stick and slowly adding more dye until the desired shade is reached. Stir almost continuously so that the material will not stick to the bottom of kettle.

PREPARING THE DYE BATH.

In dyeing linen, cotton or silk, bring the dye solution slowly to a boil and simmer for 25 minutes. In adding more dye, remember that the shade looks darker when wet. In dyeing wool keep the dye just at the boiling point to prevent undue shrinking. If, however, the dye runs excessively in the rinse water, the material must be returned to the dye kettle and boiled, else it may "crock" when worn.

After dyeing, the garment or material must be rinsed until the dye ceases to run, which will require several waters. Many get better results by allowing the garment to first dry, and then wash and rinse.

In dyeing a cotton and wool mixture, it may be necessary to use both the specific dyes, one for cotton and one for wool, in order to obtain an even color. Do not mix, but dip from cotton dye into the wool dye.

clear beef fat until soft and brown. A little hot water can be added from time to time. Add one pint of rich strained tomato, a little salt, white pepper and paprika. Set on the back of stove and slowly cook two hours, adding a little boiling water if necessary. This makes a thick sauce. Cut beef in small squares, sear in beef fat, add a very little hot water, cover closely and bake in a moderate (slow) oven two hours. Drop half a pound of macaroni into boiling salted water, boil hard 25 minutes, drain and plunge into cold water. Drain, and add to tomato sauce, bring to a boil and turn onto serving dish over the smothered beef.

AFTER-SCHOOL LUNCH.—Children invariably return from school hungry and unless it is time for their night meal it is a mistake to give them cake or pastry as it remains long enough in the stomach to interfere with the regular meal, thus causing dreams and wakefulness. A cracker, or a slice of light bread, together with a little milk or broth, is quickly digested, and should be given sparingly. A child requires something, but it should be selected with care. Fresh fruit is also an ideal lunch between meals. Most children like tomato, which is easy to have on hand. Cook some rice in plenty of water, with a little onion and celery or celery salt, adding tomato 15 minutes before it is done. Serve with the addition of a little sugar and butter. Even cold, this is delicious.

STUFFED POTATOES.—Plunge well-scrubbed potatoes into boiling water and cook ten minutes. Drain, place in hot oven and bake until tender but not overdone. Make a cross with a sharp knife on one side of the potato, then carefully turn back the corners and leave them in this position. Scoop out the potato, mash and beat light with hot milk, butter, salt and paprika, and return to jackets. Set in hot oven thoroughly heated and serve at once.

STUFFED PEPPERS.—Take six whole medium-sized fresh green peppers, slice off the tops, remove seeds, and save tops to replace. Soak in cold water to which two tablespoons of salt have been added to each quart of water. Drain, press in the filling, and replace the top, holding it in place with toothpicks.

FILLING.—One cup of chopped cold chicken, one tablespoon of chopped parsley, one tablespoon of chopped onion, two tablespoons of melted butter, one cup of oven-toasted bread-crumbs, one-half teaspoon of salt, one-eighth teaspoon of pepper, and one egg slightly beaten. Mix very thoroughly.

CAULIFLOWER LEAVES.—It is not commonly known that the large rib of the cauliflower makes a delicious dish. Cut the ribs from the remainder of the leaf, cut into inch lengths and soak twenty minutes in lightly-salted cold water. Drain, drop into boiling water and cook until tender with cover partly on the kettle. Season with butter, salt and paprika, or with a white sauce.

PUMPKIN CUSTARD.—Peel, cut pumpkin into small squares and slowly cook until quite dry, which may require several hours. Stir frequently. Into a double boiler put two cups of the cooked pumpkin, two cups of milk, one-fourth teaspoon of grated nutmeg, one-half teaspoon of cinnamon, about one-eighth of a teaspoon of ginger, the grated rind of half a lemon, and one-third teaspoon of salt. Stir and cook about 20 minutes after the boiling point is reached. Beat three eggs until well broken and mixed, but not until light, stir in one and a half cup of sugar, and over it pour the pumpkin mixture. Pour into a shallow baking dish, set in a pan containing a little boiling water and bake in a slow oven until firm.

PUMPKIN PUDDING.—Put one-half cup of sugar into a stew-pan and set where it will slowly melt and turn brown, or caramelize. Soak one and a half cup of stale fine biscuit-crumbs in three cups of milk for two hours, then add it to the sugar together with one cup of cooked pumpkin, one-half teaspoon of cinnamon and the grated rind of half an orange. Stir and cook about 20 minutes, or until well mixed. Beat three eggs slightly, pour over the above mixture and bake slowly until firm. Serve with an orange sauce made by boiling for five minutes two cups of water with one cup of sugar, then thickening with three heaping teaspoons of corn-starch wet with a little cold water. Cook ten minutes, then add half a cup of orange juice, one tablespoon of lemon juice and one tablespoon of butter.

GOOSEBERRY MARMALADE.—Wash and drain the berries without stemming or removing the brown tops. Crush a few to start cooking and slowly bring to a boil. The fruit will not require as long cooking if the addition of water can be avoided. Cook until the seeds have separated from the pulp, then press through a fine sieve. Measure the strained pulp, allow an equal amount of sugar, then simmer together about 30 minutes. Pour into jelly glasses. This is exceedingly wholesome in winter.

CRAB-APPLE JELLY.—Wash and quarter fruit, and cover with cold water in a preserving kettle. Cook rapidly until the fruit is well separated and soft. Pour hot into a bag made from one thickness of cheese-cloth which will allow the juice to quickly run through, removing the coarser parts of apple. Then drain through a thicker bag. More juice is obtained in this way. Measure about three-fourths as much sugar as there is juice. Boil the juice hard for ten minutes and skim. Add the sugar slowly which has been heated in the oven. Pour into jelly glasses and cover with melted paraffin when firm. The very small crab-apples make the best jelly, and they must be used while very hard.

Crab-apples are so rich in pectin that they make a firm jelly even when combined with other fruits or berries that contain little pectin, while the flavor harmonizes and imparts richness. Where berry juices are added, it is safer to cook down the strained apple juice somewhat before adding sugar and other juice.

SPICED BLUEBERRIES.—Make a small cloth bag and tie into it one tablespoon of cinnamon, one scant teaspoon of allspice and one-half teaspoon of cloves. Into one cup of strong vinegar put the bag of spice, one pound of brown sugar and two pounds of granulated sugar. Slowly simmer for about 15 minutes then add the blueberries and cook until soft. Seal.

The Winning Gamble

thousand. Then Bonnie noticed with a bit of excitement in her face that there were only two bidders left, Trabue and a strange gentleman who flourished a heavy walking stick occasionally over the heads of the spectators.

Finally Trabue, turning an angry face towards the stranger, called him out as winner.

Slowly the crowd disbanded and the gray headed stranger, now owner of Elmwood, made his way towards the house.

"I would like to settle this matter with Miss Lathrop alone," he said when he reached the porch.

Aunt Dorothy let him in, and the auctioneer went back to the scattering crowds who were claiming their various purchases.

In the library the purchaser of Elmwood met Bonnie face to face. He noticed with one swift glance that her eyes were wet with tears, but Bonnie brushed them away and made a faint effort to smile.

"You will have a beautiful home here," she said calmly as she held out her hand—I—I love it."

"I think it's a beautiful old spot, too," answered the man, "but would you mind telling me why you offered it for sale?"

"No," Bonnie answered slowly, "nothing matters now. I had as soon tell you as not—I was heavily in debt, and there was no other way for me to pay."

"You little silly!" the stranger cried as he snatched the grey wig from his head, "did you think I'd let you do a thing like this?"

"You?" gasped Bonnie as she recognized Justin Hall—"but how did you know?"

"That's all right how I knew," answered Justin, "the thing that pleases me is that I just did make it here in time to save you."

"Don't you realize,' Bonnie said presently "that it was to pay you—that I offered the place for sale—you don't think I'd try to keep my promise after I learned what you really were did you?"

"Surely you don't hold that against me," murmured Justin. "Am I not a perfectly nice gambler?"

"You—you—gambled on me," stammered Bonnie with quivering lips.

Presently Justin's arms closed about the little woman at his side and for a moment they stood in silent ecstasy.

"What you say, Sweetheart," said the man softly as he raised her face to his, "shall our gamble stand as fiction or fact?"

"How did it end?" the girl asked softly.

Justin drew her a bit closer to his heart.

"Why, just as it should," he answered tenderly, "both the hero and heroine admitted they had loved each other from the moment of their first meeting, let their marriage stand as it was and lived happily ever after. Now," he said slowly, "shall it stand?"

Bonnie gave his eager face one loving glance then nodded:

"Yes."

How to Make Money at Home in Spare Time!

Every Wife or Self-Supporting Girl Can Use Extra Money for Clothes.

Why Not Make it Yourself---Right at Home, This New Way?

IS THE more-money problem worrying you? Does it seem as if the rent comes due oftener, that the children's clothes wear out quicker, the family bills pile up higher than before?

Does it seem as if the dollars simply will not stretch to meet the bills and still get the things you need and want?

Think what it would mean, then, to be able to earn at home the extra amounts you need for the little luxuries you desire. Think of having always at hand a means of turning your spare hours into money!

If you are ambitious, if you want more money, if you have some spare time each week, plus the will-to-work and a degree of adaptability, you CAN turn your spare hours into dollars by knitting Olde Tyme All-Wool Socks at home on the Auto Knitter.

Miss Eunice A. Fox, a New Hampshire woman who is the only support of her aged father, was becoming really alarmed about her financial affairs. Then an Auto Knitter advertisement showed her the way to make extra money without giving up her little Gift Shop business. Nearly five years ago she secured a machine, learned to use it and soon began to clear up the burdensome debts that had accumulated. She has used her Auto Knitter earnings to put electricity and new plumbing in her house and to paint and paper it; to pay a large doctor's bill; to buy rugs; and to purchase necessary clothing for her father and herself. All with money earned in the privacy of her home, in spare time.

Mrs. Banghman, a Kansas housewife, wanted to make extra dollars for some of the labor-saving home conveniences she had long wanted. When she heard of Auto Knitting she felt sure she had found the right way—and so it proved. After working with the machine about a year, Mrs. Banghman has realized many of her desires, among them a kitchen cabinet costing $60, an electric vacuum cleaner and a sewing machine motor. Her spare time work with the Auto Knitter paid for all of these, and in addition has brought her several hundred dollars in cash.

Five years ago Mr. W. M. Irving, of Missouri, was having a hard time making both ends meet. Then he found out about the spare time money he could make with an Auto Knitter. He secured a machine and has used it regularly ever since to add to his income. Auto Knitting has enabled him to give his family many comforts and conveniences—such as a set of library furniture, a typewriter, clothing and shoes. He has also used his earnings to make payments on the home where he now lives, and to build a satisfying bank account.

These are but a few of the many people who are turning spare hours into cash with the Auto Knitter. Many workers whom we prefer to class as exceptional report much larger earnings than those we mention. The earnings vary with the amount of time devoted to the work and the speed of the individual operator, but whether the amount be large or small it is most welcome and helps to make the lives of these workers easier and happier.

Guaranteed Price for Standard Products

You are given a signed Work Contract, guaranteeing you a market for every pair of standard Olde Tyme Socks you produce, and fixing a definite price which you will be paid for your work, in addition to which you will be furnished with yarn to replace, pound for pound, that which you sent us in the form of socks.

You can work as much as you please or as little as you please—and the standard product you complete can be disposed of promptly and profitably to the company. You are not compelled or obligated in any way to send any part or all of your work to the company unless you wish. You can make socks and sell them to your friends, neighbors and local trade. But if you prefer not to canvass or do any selling, then it is always your privilege to send your standard socks to us and receive our fixed rate of payment, together with replacement yarn.

More Than $100,000.00 a Year Being Paid to Workers

To workers who are taking advantage of the Work Contract, we are now paying earnings at the rate of more than $100,000.00 per year. In addition to this, we are shipping workers more than $625,000 worth of fine Olde Tyme Wool Yarn.

From these workers, we are receiving Old Tyme Wool Socks at the rate of more than a million pairs per year. This does not include the large numbers made by workers and sold to their own trade. This immense number of pairs are received at the factory, where they are sorted and shipped to more than 9,000 dealers in all parts of the country, including department stores, men's furnishers and general stores.

Yet out of this large number of socks received, from novices as well as experts, from new workers as well as old, less than 5% have to be laid aside and returned as being below the standard set for Olde Tyme All Wool Socks.

Positive Proof of Success

The large volume of socks received shows that Auto Knitting is not an exclusive accomplishment, confined to the abilities of the few, but a profitable home occupation that can be successfully entered by the average individual.

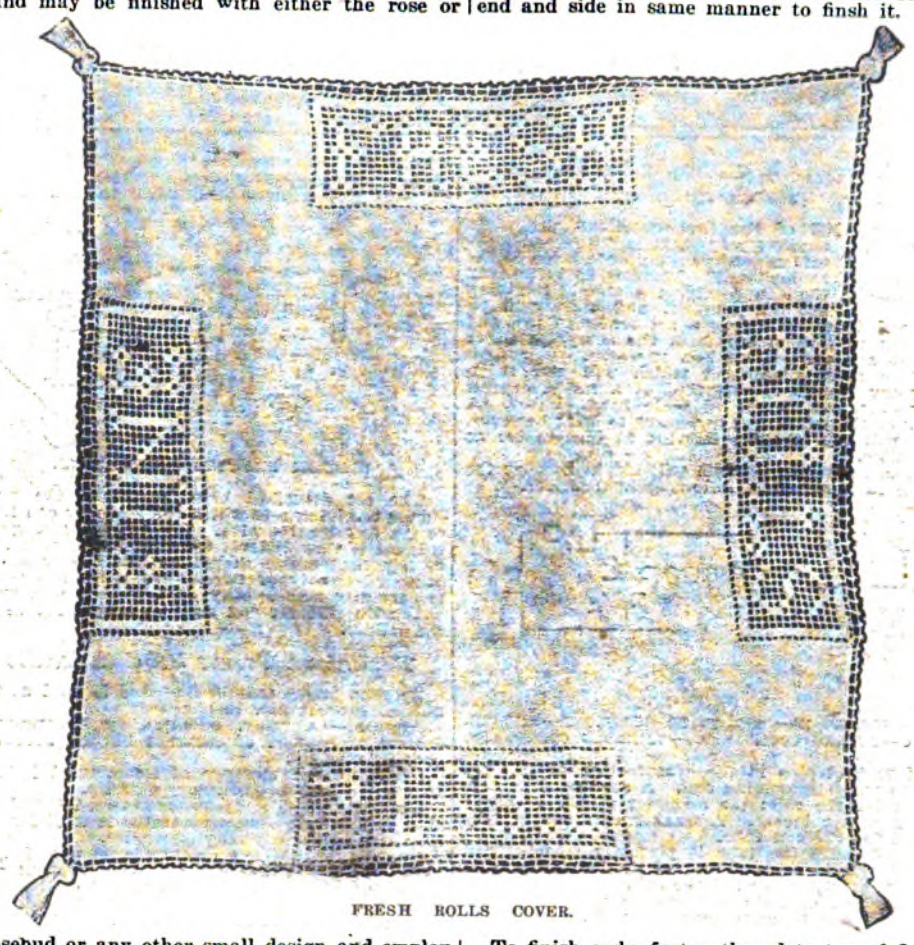
Filet Crochet Straps for Linen



Almost without number are the dainty, useful articles which can be fashioned with a ball of cotton and a crochet hook. For Christmas or bope chest gifts, the designs shown this month are especially appropriate and lovely.

A set of filet straps for household linen, of which two working designs are given on preceding page, would delight any one. These can be made for sheets, napkins, etc. Two each being needed for pillow cases, and bath or guest towels. Finish the ends with rosettes and ribbon for tying or mount the filet on a ribbon-covered elastic band.

These straps are 18 spaces wide as shown, and may be finished with either the rose or rosebud or any other small design and employ any sort of lettering.

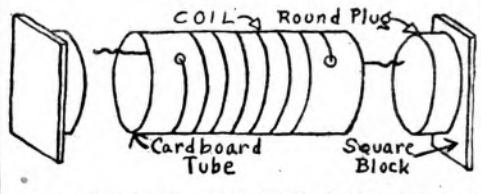
How to Make a Simple but Efficient Radio Receiver

ONE of the first questions the radio novice always asks is, "How can I obtain a good working knowledge of the radiophone?" There is no better way than to construct a simple receiving set for yourself, and more will be gained than by buying a set ready to use and trying to fathom out from the complication of wires and connections how it works.

The most simple set which will give satisfactory results is composed of a tuner, crystal detector and a pair of radio head phones. A few of the parts it is necessary to buy; however, we will try to make this set as inexpensive as possible.

The following diagram will aid in keeping the plan in mind while following instructions.

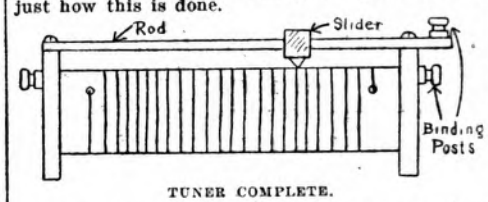
A—AERIAL. D—CRYSTAL DETECTOR. P—PHONES. T C—TUNING COIL. V. C.—VARIABLE CONDENSER.



The first step in the construction of this set is to wind the tuning coil. A cardboard tube is used for the coil; the diameter should be about four or five inches. A Quaker oats box is very good for the coil tube.

Make sure the tube is perfectly smooth, and it is well to apply a coat of shellac to the tube before starting to wind the coil.

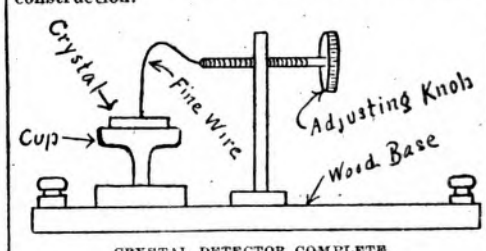
The coil consists of from 60 to 90 turns of No. 22 double cotton-covered wire. Bare copper wire may be used if a thread is wound between turns to prevent their touching each other.



One end of the coil should be left long enough for an outside connection. Shellac the entire coil after winding, and pierce a small hole in the tube at each end of the coil and pass through the ends of the wire through the holes so the leads will be on the inside of the coil.

The coil should now be mounted on two wooden end pieces. A neater piece of work will be obtained by having two round plugs made to fit the ends of the coil. These plugs should be mounted on two square end pieces and the tube may be tacked or stuck onto the finished end piece.

A small hole should be made in the center of each end piece to allow the leads to be brought out. These leads should be attached to two binding posts mounted on the end pieces.



The next step is placing the slider on the coil. The following diagram will give a good idea of just how this is done.

TUNER COMPLETE.

In the above diagram it is easily understood that by sliding the slider from one end of the coil to the other, a variation in the number of turns takes place. The coil should be scraped bare at the point where the slider makes contact. This is done by using a piece of emery cloth on a block of wood. The slider rod is made of a piece of square brass rod and the slider itself may also be of brass. As it is very difficult to make the square hole in the slider, it is a very good idea to purchase the slider. The rod may also be bought for a small sum. Observe that a binding post has to be soldered to the end of the brass rod.

The tuner is now complete and we must next have a detector. The detector is very simple in construction.

CRYSTAL DETECTOR COMPLETE.

In the above diagram, a small metal cup is mounted on a wood base and a piece of brass drilled and tapped is mounted close by. The cup is filled with babbit metal and a piece of galena crystal is placed in the heated metal. When it cools, the galena is firmly connected to the metal.

A small brass rod is threaded and a knob fastened to one end. This rod is screwed through the brass upright and a fine stiff wire soldered to the end. The stiff wire is bent into such a shape that it will rest lightly on the crystal and may be moved by the adjusting knob. The base of the metal cup is attached to one binding post and the base of the brass upright to another. By closely observing the diagram, there should be no difficulty in constructing this detector.

The other instruments used in this set are the variable condenser and the head phones. These are easily obtained from any radio dealer and the reader will find it much cheaper to buy than to try and make these instruments.

The construction and erection of the aerial was taken up last month so we have left the connecting of the various instruments. For the benefit of those who do not understand the diagram at the beginning of this article, the following will give a more comprehensive idea of the connections.

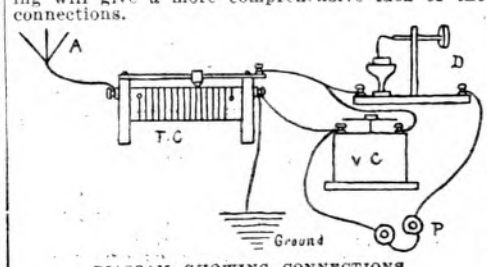


DIAGRAM SHOWING CONNECTIONS.

The set described here is one of the most simple receiving sets which the beginner can hope to get any results with. The receiving range of this set is very difficult to estimate but it is safe to say that music should be heard over a distance of twenty or twenty-five miles if the set is carefully made. Any good phones will work well with this set and may be bought for about six dollars.

Technical Terms Used in Radio

AMPERE is the unit of flow and is used as the unit of current flow in a circuit.

AUDION.—A relay, operated by electrostatic control of current of currents flowing across a gaseous medium.

COUPLING.—A measure of the mutual inductance between two oscillatory circuits.

DIELECTRIC.—The insulator between the plates of a condenser. Every insulator is a dielectric, even the rubber covering of a wire.

FUNDAMENTAL WAVE LENGTH is the wave length which the aerial and ground alone, without any added inductances or capacities, will send out.

GRID.—The thin frame of wire placed between and insulated from the plate and filaments of an audion tube.

LOOP AERIAL.—One similar to a frame aerial having several turns of wire wound in series on a frame, which form a closed circuit, part of which may be the ground.

OHM is the unit of resistance which an electric circuit offers to the flow of an electric current.

RECTIFIER.—A device for converting alternating current into pulsating direct current.

STATIC CHARGE.—An electric charge at rest on the surface of a body.

STOPPING CONDENSER.—A small low-voltage condenser used in the detector circuit to store up small impulses of current in a wave train and then give this energy out in one discharge to the telephone receivers for operating the diaphragm.

VACUUM TUBE.—Name usually given to a glass tube exhausted of air and grid inside used for detectors in radio work.

Questions relating to the radiophone, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Radio Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department.

Questions and Answers

Q.—Are there any broadcasting stations working on long wave length? R. L. G., Pa.

A.—Yes. Bedlow's Island, N. Y., works on 1400. This is a U. S. Signal Corps station.

Q.—Is a loop antenna good for a crystal set? A. D. F., Tenn.

A.—No. You will probably get no results at all on a crystal using a loop antenna.

Q.—Does Arlington broadcast music or speech? F. D., Va.

A.—We have no data on a broadcasting station at Arlington. All of the broadcasting at this station is by telegraph. Rumors have it that Arlington will soon have a broadcasting station.

Q.—What is the approximate cost of parts for making a receiving set with a detector tube, including batteries? J. F. L., Mo.

A.—The writer built such a set and the cost of material was $52.60. We are able to receive music from stations 800 miles away with the set.

Q.—Is it possible to transmit voice by using an arc instead of a tube? R. L. D., Ohio.

A.—Yes. This method of telephony was used long before the tube came into operation but is not as satisfactory as the tube.

Q.—Which of the large broadcasting stations started first? J. M., Mich.

A.—K.D.K.A., at East Pittsburg, was the first real broadcasting station. This station was nearly a year in operation before the others opened.

Q.—What loud speaker is best for a large hall? W. R. T., Md.

A.—The Western Electric loud speaker is the best but very expensive. A Magnavox will give good results and is much cheaper.

Q.—Has the new Armstrong super-regenerative circuit been successfully used by the ordinary amateurs? C. B. U., S. C.

A.—Yes. Varying results have been obtained but as yet this new circuit is not practical for the average amateur.

Q.—Will COMFORT give a complete plan for a regenerative receiver in "Radio Flashes"? D. S., Colo.

A.—Yes. In an early fall issue we shall start an article with complete instructions for making a long-range regenerative receiver.

Q.—How long does it take to learn to read the wireless code? M. P. O., Kans.

A.—It all depends upon the person. In the radio schools it generally takes four to six months to learn to read at a speed of 20 words per minute.

Comfort's League of Cousins

spell now, and I come myself with a few words and facts in behalf of the farmer and farm. I live on a farm with my parents in a rather sparsely settled part of Virginia. My dad runs a general truck, dairy and stock farm. My mother has active interests in all kinds of poultry. We have a pretty good-sized family and operated all through the war, and up to a short time ago, without hired help. Common labor has been so high in comparison with the prices we received for our products that we long ago cut out hiring any labor at all. And what I speak of is not what I have heard some one else say, or what I have read in a book, but I speak from actual experience of hard work and long hours on the farm. And I know what I am talking about when I say that the farmer is of a class of people that scratch the longest and hardest for a few dollars. Any sudden downward fluctuation in the market is felt first by him. Any sudden upward turn of labor, clothing, implements and general commodities is felt earliest, keenest and longest by none other than the farmer. What difference does it make? says the public. He's only an ignorant, free and easily rode sort of a guy anyway. So that's how it goes, Uncle Lisha, from the national benefactors(?) in Washington down to the common laborers bumming along the highway. They all have a kick and a knock for the farmer.

But, Uncle Lisha, old dear, there's going to be a reaction some day, and to my way of thinking it isn't so far off. The farmer is tired, truly tired, of being knocked about. In a great many sections of the country he has become unconcerned about the rest of the world and only just produces what is necessary for himself and family. Let the rest do the same, he says. No, Uncle Lisha, the farmer is not really selfish. It is their greatest ambition to till the soil and watch it produce food to supply the nation. But the farmer has become hardened and unconcerned because of the scanty bit of appreciation and consideration that he receives from all sides. By and by, when food is scarce, and the country is in an outcry, the farmer will be called upon to make explanations. Believe me, he will smile when he says: "Why did you bite the hand that was willing to feed you?" The people will fuss and fume and fret, but food will be lacking and it will take months to sow and reap a crop. Meanwhile many will have opportunity to look with regret upon their big mistake.

Another thing, Uncle Lisha: money is always scarce with the farmer. It takes a lot of money to prepare for a season's work. It takes about all one can make from one season to get ready for the next. Not only that, but it takes hard work, long hours and a lot of figuring in one's few brains to make ends meet. Some of our city cousins may not believe it, but at the time I am writing these lines to you, Uncle Lisha, we are working fifteen hours each day. And by the time the cousins read this, if you see fit to put it in print, we will be working seventeen and eighteen hours. Let me tell you, Uncle, that the thought of getting down and after those fifteen and eighteen hours' work is the one little thing that drives our lads away from the farms to the cities. Yes, Uncle Lisha, they shirk while the wages are high and the work easy and leave old dad and mother to keep things going as best they can. But when things are dead and dull in the cities, as many of them are now, then these same lads come sliding back home. They claim that the desire for experience, where life is brighter, calls them away from home and the farm. But, Uncle, I feel sure that many have learned before this that all is not gold that glitters.

Show me the lad that thinks nothing more remains to be learned about the country at the ripe age of 18 or 20, and I can tell him he is mistaken. The trouble is with him, not the country, for he hasn't his eyes half open. Perhaps he has still in them some of that sand that got there when he was a little toddler playing hide and seek. This when he travels off to the city makes him an easy mark until the crooks and dead beats open them for him. So finally he travels back, praising the wonderful country and the clean womanhood therein. Brother, things have not changed a particle since you left. They were always just as beautiful, but you could not see them.

So boys and girls, all of you that are thinking to leave the farm to go where life is easier, happier and brighter, change your mind. You'll change it some day and you'd best do it now. Every day that you are away from home makes more for the rest of us to do, and more work as well as worry for mother. Help her while she is here. When she is gone you will realize you have lost your best friend.

Well, Uncle Lisha, I hope I have not worried you too much with this long letter. I'd be ever so glad to have you come and visit me this summer. I would show you real farm life, I am sure we could be good friends, for if I am not missing my guess mighty bad you are a wee bit Irish. I am Irish even to my name. I am five feet, eight inches tall, with brown hair, blue-grey eyes—you couldn't call me pretty, for I'm just

A small Irish spud, MIKE.

To read your letter, Micky, is to know it comes right from your warm Irish heart and your farm-calloused hands—which last do not seem to be so banged-up but what they can do a good job on the typewriter. I'll say your dad is lucky to have a girl like you—straight-thinking, true-acting and hard-working. You must know from what I have often written here, and particularly in COMFORT'S issue of April past, how well I understand just those conditions that your letter pungently outlines. Admitting these conditions on the farm, these financial handicaps and troubles of labor and of labor-hiring, the only chance for the farmer to change these things is to organize and to fight his cause collectively. All the agencies through which the farmer deals with the world are organized successfully and tightly. Labor is certainly well organized; the manufacturers are organized; the merchants through their chambers of commerce and other ties are organized, and the doctors and lawyers have their societies and associations constantly on the lookout for their interests and fostering all favorable legislation and fighting that which is adverse. Knowing that the farmer must wage his fight in this communal method, it is a satisfaction to learn that a beginning is being made—results of which are already seen in Congress, where the demands and interests of farmers are meeting with more attention and respect. Necessarily the movement has started in the West amid the larger acred and more heavily capitalized farms, but that organization will spread eastward is certain and it will reach even to "somewhere in the hills of Virginia." Then you may yet gain redress and reward, Mike, you little fighting spud.

While labor has gained and is gaining reduced hours of work, the 15- to 18-hour days you write about continue on the farm. Like yourself, I know these things, Micky, my dear, not from books or hearsay, but from actual experience. I have plodded around farm buildings up to nine and half-past nine of summer nights, lantern in hand—and have been up at five the next morning to start the round over again. To feed yourself, your family, your animals and the outside world with the work of your hands and the sweat of your brow is not an easy task, but it is a noble and natural one deserving of noble and natural rewards.

I don't quite agree with you, Mike, that it is the hard work that drives boys off of the land. The hardest labor and the most severe living conditions have been always endured by man when the financial return has fitly compensated. There has not been enough money gained on the farm, and the boys have chased the golden lure city-ward—where the chasing is also hard, you may be sure! But the farmer does not get enough of the dollar he produces. His share must be increased. I should like to go down to the Old Dominion and talk with you and your dad about how to do all these things, Mike, but I have got a 15- to 18-hour-a-day-job on my hands now. No, Mike; I'm not Irish, although your sort of letter makes me wish I were!

RAND, COLORADO.

DEAR UNCLE AND ALL THE COUSINS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for a long time and it suits me just right. I live in the great Rocky Mountains, the paradise of all true out-of-door lovers. Great pine forests and many small streams abound with game and fish. I have been in many countries and my first choice is Colorado. For several years I was what you call a "globe-trotter." During that time I visited twenty-one foreign countries: England, France, Italy, Egypt, India, Japan, Spain, China, Siberia, Russia, Philippine Islands, Guam, Hawaii, New Zealand, Australia, Alaska and the Fiji Islands. I also visited several ports in South America. I have stood on the Great Wall of China and have been to the top of the Pyramids, but I found India and China the most interesting of all the countries. Both of these countries are lands of mystery. China has as many, if not more, ancient curiosities as any Oriental country. In the walled city of Shanghai, China, can be seen many things just the same as they were 3,000 years ago. Much is so old that all records have been lost. One can spend many days in these ancient corners of the world and always find something different.

I can speak four foreign languages but Chinese is beyond me. It is said that nobody but a Chink can learn to speak it and to write one single dialect in a lifetime. Foreign travel is a great education, but it takes money.

Well, my mudhook has dropped, so I will close, but I will come again perhaps. If any of the cousins care to write, I will try and answer some of them at least. Wishing you all success, I am,

Your nephew, EARL W. ACE.

Earl, as a wanderer you are surely the ace and the high card. That you have come to rest in Colorado and like it best of all is a tribute that should make other states take notice—those proud Missourians, for instance, and the high-headed, sunkist Californians. Yes, indeed, Earl, your great pine forests must, as you say, make a paradise for out-of-door lovers. It is not everybody, of course, who does their loving out of doors, and some pick out a sofa behind the

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Vacuum System Explained

SEVERAL systems widely different in principle have been used on automobiles for supplying gasolene from the main storage tank to the carburetor, the vacuum being extremely popular at the present time. This system is an arrangement whereby the gasolene is transferred from the main tank, usually suspended at the rear of chassis, by suction created by the engine to an auxiliary tank located under the engine hood and sufficiently elevated to permit a gravity flow to the carburetor.

Let us first direct our attention to the auxiliary tank which consists of two chambers, as shown in the sketch. The upper one is the filling chamber and the lower one, the emptying chamber. Between the two is a partition in which is placed a valve. As explained in previous articles, the pistons in the cylinders create a vacuum and therefore this agent is harnessed to deliver the fuel from the main storage tank. By referring to the sketch it will be noted that from the upper chamber one pipe leads to the intake manifold, and another pipe to the main storage tank. The suction of the pistons on the intake stroke closes the valve between the chambers, also sucks the gasolene out of the main storage tanks into the upper chamber. As the gasolene flows into the upper chamber it causes a metal float to rise. When the float rises to a predetermined height, it operates a valve which in turn shuts off the suction and at the same time opens an air valve. The suction gone and the admission of air brings about atmospheric pressure in the upper chamber, causing the valve between the two chambers to open and allow the gasolene to flow from the upper to the lower chamber. The lower chamber is always at atmospheric pressure and there is always an uninterrupted flow to the carburetor.

As the gasolene drains from the upper into the lower chamber it is obvious that the metal float will drop until reaching a certain point again closes the air valve and opens the vacuum valve and the process of refilling the upper chamber commences again as above described.

Turning our attention to the main storage tank at the rear of chassis, we find two pipes entering same. As already stated, one connects the tank to the upper chamber of the auxiliary member. This pipe enters the top and extends down through to the lowest point, thereby making it possible to suction all gasolene possible from same. The other pipe merely enters the top of tank and ends there. The other end of pipe is open and is usually concealed at the highest elevation possible somewhere in the body of the car. The sole purpose of this pipe is to supply air to the main tank and keep it at atmospheric pressure at all times. It is also of paramount importance that the air pipe for the auxiliary tank be sufficiently elevated, otherwise there would be danger of spilling the contents when operating down-grade.

The chief factors in favor of the vacuum system are as follows: greater carrying space in the car, since the main storage tank can be suspended at rear of chassis; the ideal location of the auxiliary tank makes possible warming the gasolene which aids carburetion, the formation of the lower tank chamber prevents water or sediment which may be in the gasolene reaching the carburetor, and, most important of all, there is always a positive flow of fuel to the carburetor regardless of the grade on which the car may be operated.

Empty Vacuum Tank

Should the gasolene in the vacuum tank become entirely consumed due to exhaustion of fuel in the main storage tank, the vacuum tank can be readily filled after pouring gasolene in the main storage tank by closing the engine throttle fully and turning the motor over a few times with the spark off. Ten seconds is claimed to be sufficient to create enough suction to completely fill the auxiliary tank.

Providing the auxiliary tank has been allowed to stand empty for a considerable period and does not fill readily when the engine is turned over as above described, the difficulty might possibly be due to a particle of dirt or other foreign matter under the flapper valve between the upper and lower chambers. Still, on the other hand, it may be that the valves are dry. Removing the plug in the top of the tank and squirting gasolene into the tank will wash away the foreign matter; also wet the valves and thereby cause the tank to perform satisfactorily. There is a likelihood at times of the flapper valve becoming pitted with black carbon which naturally would have a tendency to prevent the valve being sucked tight to its seat. Scraping the valve with a knife will correct the difficulty.

What to Do in Case of Fire

Due to the numerous losses by theft and fire, insurance companies are investigating conditions very closely so that if possible they may continue to do business without necessitating raising the premium rate. One authority who has specialized on the fire menace has advanced the following suggestions on extinguishing fires:

1. The most important thing to remember in case of fire is to keep cool. A few seconds lost in panic at the start may result disastrously.
2. At least one small fire extinguisher should be carried on every car. It should be placed where it is readily accessible in an emergency. The small extinguisher is indispensable in handling a gasolene fire, and is also useful in fighting any other kind of blaze about the car.
3. In the absence of a distinguisher dirt and sand can be used. These agents are injurious to the mechanism, however, and should only be used in cases of absolute necessity.
4. Do not use water to extinguish a carburetor or other gasolene fire. Water is heavier than gasolene and only has a tendency to spread the fire.
5. Should the engine back-fire and catch the carburetor, turn the motor over quickly by means of the electric starter, as it may be possible to draw the flame into the intake manifold. Failing to check in this manner, use the extinguisher.
6. If the fire reaches the under-pan beneath the engine, extinguish that fire first. Fire travels upward, therefore always start at the lowest point.
7. A small electric spotlight can be used in a number of ways without the danger of causing fire. Never invite disaster by holding a lighted match over the filler cap of the gasolene tank in an endeavor to determine the amount of fuel in the tank.

Answers to Correspondents

LEAK IN WATER JACKET.—Can you tell me how to stop a leak in a water jacket caused by freezing? The break is about six inches long and leaks quite badly.
E. F. S., Driscoll, Wis.

A.—From the tone of your letter we take it that you have reference to the outer water jacket. If such is the case our suggestion is that you have the job inspected by a reliable mechanic who uses the oxygen-acetylene method of welding. It may be just possible that a durable repair can be effected without damage to other parts. On the other hand, due to the length of the crack and perhaps to its location the intense heat produced by the oxy-acetylene torch would be likely to warp the inner cylinder wall.

ENGINE KNOCKS.—After being run about 1,000 miles the rear cylinder of my new Ford car has begun to knock or rather make a clicking sound. Otherwise the car runs smoothly and seems to have plenty of power. Can you suggest the cause and remedy?
L. A. R., Wheelersburg, Ohio.

A.—Remove the cylinder block and examine the No. 4 piston. It may be that the piston is a trifle undersize causing a slap in the cylinder. If such is found to be the case, try to find a piston that is slightly oversized. Look at the wrist pin for the No. 4. piston. It may be of a loose fit.

KEROSENE AS FUEL.—Is there any means or appliance by which I can use kerosene as fuel in my car? It is a four-cylinder machine, bore three and seven-eighths, stroke five inches, r. p. m. 900, valve-in-the-head type machine. O. R. H., Chandler, Ind.

A.—Kerosene is not a suitable fuel for automobile engines. Much difficulty is at present encountered in the vaporization of the low grade of gasolene, it being almost impossible to generate sufficient heat to bring about this end. It is obvious, therefore, that steps would have to be taken in order to insure the necessary heat to vaporize kerosene. Because of its present lower cost, every motorist is of course interested in the substitution of kerosene for gasolene as a fuel for the automobile. The chief difficulty in the way of bringing about this end is that it is practically impossible to start a cold motor on kerosene, unless some complicated preheating arrangement be used. From time to time several types of combination (kerosene-gasolene) carburetors have made their appearance only to disappear in a very little time with absolutely no profit to their makers. In view of the fact that many automobile engineers have given much attention to using kerosene as a fuel for automobile engines and to date have been unsuccessful, our advice is that you abandon the idea of using kerosene and purchase only the best grade of gasolene available.

LOCATION OF CUT-OUT VALVE.—In installing a cut-out valve in a Ford car how far from the muffler should it be placed? How large should the V hole in the exhaust pipe be? T. H., Evansville, Minn.

A.—It matters not how far from the muffler the cut-out be placed, the only requirement being that it be placed somewhere between the engine and the muffler so that the exhaust gases can be passed through the opening instead of the muffler. The size of the V hole cut in the exhaust manifold depends upon the kind of cut-out used. The manufacturer of whom you purchase the cut-out will be only too glad to give you the information desired.

CARBURETOR OVERFLOWS.—The carburetor of my Ford car does not leak when the engine is running, but as soon as the engine is stopped the gasolene leaks out of the carburetor; the leak is slow but continual when engine is not running. G. H., Mound City.

A.—An intelligent answer is impossible for the reason you have failed to state the year in which your car was manufactured or the make of carburetor used. You cannot go wrong, however, by removing the carburetor from motor and subjecting it to a thorough cleaning. It may be possible that a piece of dirt has become lodged btween the inlet needle and its seat or that the needle is pitted or corroded. Make certain that the float is free to act, is not gasolene soaked and that the gasolene level is not set too high. Believe that a letter to the maker of the carburetor will bring complete descriptive literature on the care of the instrument.

TO LOOSEN STUCK PISTONS.—My Ford car has a cracked cylinder head caused by connecting-rod bolt giving way. The engine appears not to be damaged except for cylinder head and broken piston and ring, but the car has stood out in the rain and now I cannot turn the motor over with the crank. Is it possible that rust has tightened it up? What can I do to loosen it?
E. S. W., Sutton, W. Va.

A.—I would suggest that you pour in each cylinder a large quantity of kerosene and oil. Allow this mixture to remain in the cylinders from six to 12 hours and if you are then unable to loosen the pistons by exerting pressure on the hand crank, try jacking up a rear wheel and engaging the low gear. Rock the jacked wheel backwards and forwards. In this manner you can exert more pressure than with the hand crank and you should be able to break the pistons away from the cylinder walls.

TIMER MAY BE WRONG.—What is the direction of the current flow generated by the Ford magneto? Is it possible to put a Ford timer on wrong? Would burning two 18-24 volt headlight bulbs and one 18-24 volt spotlight bulb injure a Ford magneto?
MRS. G. S., Wyat, Mo.

A.—The magneto on your car generates low tension alternating current. The ignition current is therefore alternating current and has no general direction of flow.

It is possible to install your timer improperly. The rotor may be installed a half turn out of place. Providing the wiring has been removed it is possible to change the firing order by not connecting the cables to the proper posts.

I doubt if the magneto would carry the load except at high engine speeds were you to use the lights as you describe. I do not think it would injure the magneto, but doubt if the light would be satisfactory at ordinary speed.

MINERALIZED WATER ROUTS CHICKEN LICE

Tablets Dropped into Drinking Founts Banish Vermin, Make Fowls Grow Faster and Increase Egg Yield

Any poultry raiser can easily rid his flock of lice and mites, make chickens grow faster and increase their egg yield by simply adding minerals to the fowls' drinking water. This does away with all bother, such as dusting, greasing, dipping and spraying. The necessary minerals can now be obtained in convenient tablets, known as Paratabs. Soon after the fowls drink the mineralized water, all lice and mites leave them. The tablets also act as a tonic conditioner. The health of the fowls quickly improves, they grow faster and the egg yield frequently is doubled. Little chicks that drink freely of the water never will be bothered by mites or lice.

The method is especially recommended for misers of purebred stock, as there is no risk of soiling the plumage. The tablets are warranted to impart no flavor or odor to the eggs and meat. This remarkable conditioner, egg tonic and lice remedy costs only a trifle and is sold under an absolute guarantee. The tablets are scientificially prepared, perfectly safe, and dissolve readily in water.

Any reader of this paper may try them without risk. The laboratories producing Paratabs are so confident of good results that to introduce them to every poultry raiser they offer two big $1 packages for only $1. Send no money, just your name and address—a card will do—to the Paratab Laboratories, Dept. 869, 1100 Coca Cola Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and the two $1 packages, enough for 100 gallons of water, will be mailed. Pay the postman $1 and postage on delivery, and if you are not delighted with results in 10 days—if your chickens are not healthier, laying more eggs and entirely free from lice and mites—your money will be promptly refunded. Don't hesitate to accept this trial offer as you are fully protected by this guarantee.

The Laws of Breeding

I HAVE received so many letters lately asking about the principles of breeding of thoroughbred birds that I have decided to make it the subject of this month's talk, for there is no branch of the poultry industry so interesting or profitable, and every poultry man or woman should thank the clubs and fanciers who have successfully established shows all over the country. They arouse general interest in good birds, which bring the very cream of profit to the breeder industrious enough to study the standard, and develop, point by point, until a near approach to perfection is reached.

How is this to be accomplished?

Of course, there must be some thoroughbred birds, of whatever kind you intend to devote your energies to, as a foundation on which to work.

Many people seem to think that a thoroughbred means show specimens—a great mistake. You may have a bird hatched from an egg laid by a champion, but which develops a wry tail, comb, wattles or ear-lobes out of all proportion, or numerous other faults which disqualify for show purposes. These are the birds that sell for a dollar or a dollar and a half. They are, in all probability, from the best of stock, and judicious mating may enable you to rear winners. "Blood will tell" is nowhere more positively demonstrated than in bird or animal culture. It is better to buy faulty birds of a celebrated strain than a perfect "accident," for its progeny is nearly sure to show some, perhaps all, the mongrel of its ancestors.

The law of improvement demands a study of faults and shortcomings as well as good points. The meeting of extremes forms a perfect whole, and this suggests the line to follow. Further to exemplify: A hen with legs too short and a comb too large should have for a mate a bird whose legs are a little too long and comb a little too small, rather than a perfect specimen who would have no tendency in these directions to counterbalance the hen's weakness.

Again, you should have a fairly good lot of hens to select from. Commence by picking out the very best; study her closely; find the fault or faults, and select four or five others from the same pen with similar shortcomings, so that in considering the cockerel to be yarded with them there will be a general benefit. Naturally, if you can afford to start with a trio of prize winners, much time and labor will be saved.

The beginner is usually convinced that two perfect-looking creatures of any kind or sort will produce their like, but unfortunately such is not the case. A bird's ancestors have almost more influence on its progeny than the individuality of the bird itself. For that reason it is necessary to know the characteristics of the ancestral progenitors of the bird that you desire to cultivate, so that the signs of reverted heredity can be recognized at once, and intelligently combated by the next season's mating.

As Plymouth Rocks were the first American creation in poultry to achieve recognition by the public, we will consider them first.

The amateur who tried to breed Plymouth Rocks twenty years ago had to fight the legacies bestowed by the original mixed ancestry. Sometimes it would be the feathered leg of the Cochin; sometimes the black coloring or red feathers and poor breeding of the old-time hawk bird. Years of careful breeding have almost entirely eliminated such troubles in up-to-date stock. But allow a flock of originally good birds to mate indiscriminately for three or four seasons, and they will gradually lose their special Rock individuality, and reproduce in bleared form many traits of the birds from which they sprung. To militate such tendencies and keep up the standard, he amateur must be thoroughly familiar with the form and color of the ideal Barred Plymouth Rock type.

Until recent years male birds have been much lighter than pullets. Now the ambition of the club is to have males and females match as nearly as possible, and experienced breeders discovered long ago that to accomplish this feat it was necessary to keep two distinct families, each specially mated, to produce males and females.

When I commenced to read up on the subject, "line breeding" and "double mating" were my stumbling blocks. I read dozens of articles in different poultry papers before I was able to grasp the true meaning of either. Two perfect birds who match and have won first prize in a show-room will, if mated, invariably produce light or dark birds, and as invariably will the indiscriminate mating of two distinct blood lines of bred varieties produce blurred or imperfect markings. So the only way to get exhibition birds is to mate standard color males to slightly darker females who were sired by the same father. In other words, mating a bird to his half-sister, of a slightly darker color than himself, and the male progeny will almost surely resemble the father, while the females will be like the mother, strongly-marked birds, but too dark for show-room requirements. For blue-ribbon females, standard-color pullets must be chosen and mated with a male of lighter color, belonging to the mother's family—father or brother or son—it is immaterial so long as the relationship is on the mother's side. You will probably say, "Why, that is inbreeding," which, of course, it is; but as only the best-shaped and generally perfect specimens are chosen for such propagating, it is not likely to cause any trouble. Periodically it is well to procure a cockerel from some branch of the same family, which has been outbred, and make an experimental mating with one or two pullets. If the progeny of either sex are good, keep them and infuse new blood into the breeding pens, but always remember to keep the matings to standard color on the sire's line for males, and the mother's line for females. And also remember that shape and vigor are as important as plumage. Though I started my thoroughbred pens with prize birds, I had quite a difficult fight to get the bars to run straight across the feathers. They were good to the tips, but there they either mixed on the black line or conformed to the round of the feather. After two seasons I sent to the person from whom I bought the original trio for a very dark cockerel from the same females and mated him with quite light pullets. The first season I succeeded in getting two cockerels out of the chicks reared, which had perfectly straight bars and were all right in general color. The following season, straight bars amply repaid us for all the trouble and time.

From Barred Rocks I skipped to buff varieties. Cochins and Wyandottes, trying both the same season, and fortunately for the prosperity of the farm, I discovered that it was a mistake to try all sorts and kinds of birds, and returned to my original love for the White Wyandotte, from which I have never since deviated, so the following hints on buff matings are mostly gleaned from other people's experience and condensed as follows:

Study the male bird first; select the very best you can get, then carefully note each point and compare them with the demands of the standard. The best bird will be lacking in some respects, so choose the pullets to counterbalance his weaknesses. Should he be too large, have too large a comb, legs too long, or some other point of formation over accented, let the pullets be correspondingly weak in that special point. Don't lose sight of the fact that type should come first in selection. Time and judicious mating will eventually correct color faults.

"Breeding in and in" is a term which signifies the breeding together of animals of close consanguinity, but the closeness of blood relationship is not defined. The idea is to fix and concentrate any desired quality by breeding together closely-related animals possessing that quality. It is always easier to find one or two animals possessing the desired character in a marked degree than to find a whole flock possessing the same quality, e. g., every pen of birds has its "best bird."

If, then, we would seek to develop a family, flock or breed possessing the properties desired, we can most quickly secure this object by interbreeding the few individuals possessing the properties, with their offspring which have inherited the same qualities.

PRIZE ROSE COMB WHITE LEGHORN COCK.

Carefully and intelligently prosecuted, this process may result successfully. Ignorantly or injudiciously carried on, the result will probably be disastrous. It is a principle in stock breeding that coupling two animals possessing the same good quality, defect or disease, will tend to intensify that good quality, defect or disease in their offspring.

Two essential conditions must invariably attend successful inbreeding, viz., sound constitution and perfect health. With these as a foundation, close interbreeding may be practiced with the best of results, as is shown by the breeds thus produced and perpetuated by successful stock breeders.

The qualities of fattening easily and quickly, of early maturity, of enormous egg production, all have been brought to the highest perfection in individuals and families which have resulted from close interbreeding. Mr. Bates' rule in cattle breeding was, "Always put the best animals together regardless of any affinity of blood." One of the most valuable practical advantages of careful interbreeding is in the imparting of the quality of prepotency in males. The thoroughbred stallion, bull or cock-bird is bred to many females of his kind, and thus greatly influences the quality of numerous offspring on the farm or in the neighborhood where he is kept. A male which has inherited the concentrated virtues of a long line of interbred ancestors will stamp those qualities most certainly upon his offspring.

Cross-breeding as a farm practice may be defined as breeding together animals of different breeds or families.

Cross-breeding is of vast importance in improving the wool, muscles, meat, milk, eggs, or other marketable product of common or native stock. The common animals generally have good constitutions and good health; but are often inferior in their yield of valuable market products. The purebred animal, possessing the qualities desired and the power of strongly and surely transmitting them is crossed upon the common stock, and the result is usually great improvement. The prepotency of the purebred animal gives him power of affecting the qualities of the offspring to far greater extent than his mate.

Note how rapidly the pure blood increases, if in the process the offspring of each generation are bred with pure-bloods each time.

The first cross has ½ pure blood.
The second cross has ¾ pure blood.
The third cross has ⅞ pure blood.
The seventh cross has 127-128 pure blood.

With the second cross comes the question of interbreeding, i. e., the breeder must decide whether he will breed the daughter to her sire, or make use of another male of the same breed as the sire.

When by crossing with superior animals we have improved our stock, we must also provide improved conditions. The climate, the food and the care must all be as good as the superior purebred animals have previously enjoyed, else the improvement cannot be maintained.

In nature changes come slowly. It may be necessary to secure the desired changes by gradual steps. If the animals to be crossed are too disproportionate to each other, "reversion" will probably occur, and bring disappointment. "Violent crosses" are, therefore, to be avoided. Do not attempt to cross animals of distinct breeds having opposite characters. Never cross-breed animals simply for the sake of crossing.

Breeding between crosses is merely guesswork, and yields haphazard results, because usually crosses have not fixed hereditary characteristics. How fast the pure blood may become diluted by crossing out and out is shown by the fact that in the tenth generation the descendant would possess only one ten hundred and twenty-fourth part of the original purebred ancestor.

However desirable it would seem to be able to determine what qualities the father and mother each transmit to their offspring, the conditions of breeding are so complex and intricate that it is very difficult to establish proof of any theory as to this subject.

We are safe in asserting that the parent which has the greatest prepotency and an ancestry bred for the longest time, in a certain line, will most strongly affect the progeny.

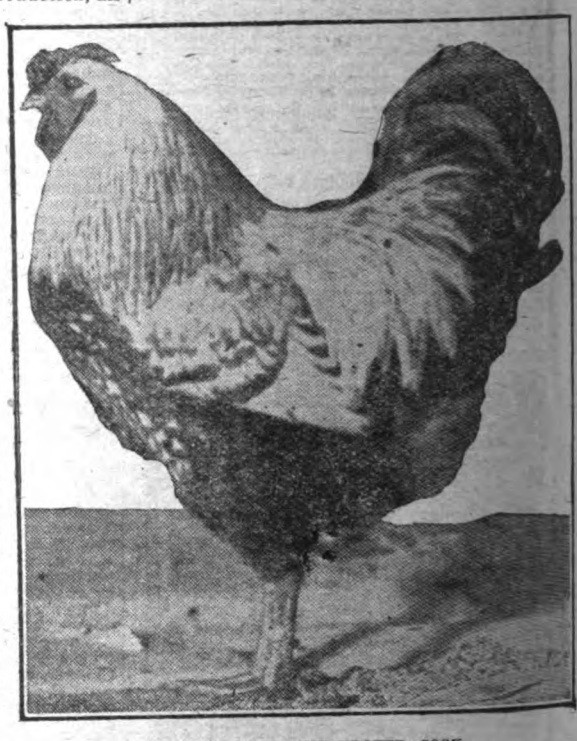
We may sometimes overcome the transmission of a defect or blemish of one parent by coupling with such animal a mate possessing very prepotent excellency in the point where the other is deficient.

It seems not so much a question of sex as of individuality. We may hence learn what individual parents may do, and by use of that knowledge and with close regard for accompanying conditions, bring about desirable or avoid undesirable results. The relative influence of parents is further affected by purity of blood, by constitution, and by physical vigor. The age of a parent may thus have much to do with the question. Lack of bodily exercise may tend to lessen the proportion of influence. Excessive use in breeding will cause diminution of power to transmit qualities.

Pedigree

From the study we have made of the principles of breeding we must conclude that the ancestry of our breeding animals is of very great significance in determining results. The development of the best breeds of farm stock has been in very striking degree the fixing of the desirable and prepotent characters of a few ancestors upon numerous descendants.

The pedigree of an animal is his line of descent, his list of progenitors; in short, his ancestry. In stock breeding, the term is often applied to signify the statement on record of the ancestry of an animal. An animal's pedigree may be good or bad, according to the worth or worthlessness of the ancestors included in it. It may be complete or incomplete, according as it includes all or only a part of the names of the individuals composing the animal's ancestry back to the formation of the breed.



The perfectly prepared pedigree of an animal shows the foundation stock of the breed that enters into his line of ancestry, and then step by step exhibits the different links in the chain of life, indicating to what extent the foundation stock and their progeny re-enter the pedigree, the closeness of interbreeding, the outbreeding, the use of unknown, doubtful or undesirable sires or dams. In fact, all the blood relationships of which the animal is the result.

With the pedigree should be studied the records, so far as obtainable, of the animals listed in the pedigree. In actual investigation of the ancestries of animals, it is almost and oftentimes quite impossible to ascertain the whole of the ancestral history of a given individual, owing to the completeness of the records of the past; only those animals which have developed peculiarly strong and valuable characteristics having been considered worthy of historical recording. Especially is this true in poultry breeding.

This subject of pedigree is a most emphatic illustration of the importance of the principles of heredity. It may serve to explain atavism, showing to what ancestor an offspring has reverted. It emphasizes the value of prepotency, since it often serves to show how the prepotent power of an ancient ancestor has stamped his descendants, even to the extent of a whole breed, with his qualities. It may further show the power of pure blood or of a cross in causing variation, or negatively exhibit the effects of unfavorable conditions in overcoming inheritable qualities, comparing expected and realized results.

The breeder should very thoroughly study his breeding animals as individuals, and by the senses of sight and touch learn to judge of their qualities, and especially to associate the visible form and the feeling of the conspicuous parts with the correlated unrevealed qualities.

We all like to see what we call beauty and symmetry in our fowls and other farm animals, but the practical breeder should learn to understand what form of symmetry is best adapted to and associated with the purpose which he has in view. A study of the characters of the different distinct breeds of farm animals shows us that different forms and characteristics attend upon varied qualities and powers, and that certain forms, colors and proportions become so well fixed that a bird does not strongly resemble the true type of its breed is rejected from the breeder's list of breeding stock. The breeder having ascertained as much as possible by the study of his animal's ancestry through pedigrees and records, next seeks to understand further qualities by the study of individual conformations.

The MODERN FARMER

September Garden Work

FOR the gardener and farmer September is the month of the big red harvest moon, the month during which Nature's early-season promises are realized bulging haymows, well-filled granaries and corn-cribs, and rootcellars swept clean and ready to receive a wealth of fruits and vegetables for winter storage. The days are still hot, reminiscent of August just past, but the nights are cool or even crisp and chilly with perhaps a touch of frost to warn the laggards that many "chores" still await early attention in the garden.

Though September is hardly to be considered as a planting month, some planting is to be done after autumn rains make prompt germination and rapid growth a certainty. For cabbage, cauliflower and lettuce that is to be pricked out in cold frames later on, sow seed between the 15th and 30th of the month. If sown earlier these plants will make too extensive a growth, and will be likely to run to seed when set out next spring. Later planting gives insufficient time to grow before cold weather; consequently the plants are small and frail, and may not survive the winter. Therefore the correct time for planting in any region depends to a large extent upon the gardener's own experience, for in the final analysis experience is by far the best teacher.

Late cabbage intended for sale or winter storage may not yet be ready to cut, but it will need a bit watching. Heavy rains and "open weather" are likely to cause unusually rapid growth that may result in split heads. If cabbage heads begin to crack, bend them over so that the root is broken on one side. This limits the amount of moisture that will be allowed to come up from the roots, and assures good sound, marketable heads. By the way, don't throw away the cracked heads; save them to hang up in the chicken house where poultry can reach them only by jumping. In this way the flock gets necessary exercise that will show to advantage in improved condition and increased egg production.

Celery should be banked for blanching or bleaching ten days or so before it is to be marketed or used. If left longer it is almost certain to turn rusty or spongy or become hollow. Be careful that dirt does not get into the hearts of the plants. Top dress asparagus beds lightly with well-rotted manure, and if new beds are to be set out now is the time to do it. Harvest onions when the tops are dead and brown, leaving them to lie upon the ground for several days in the sun to dry out thoroughly before storing them in the cellar, then winter them in a cool, dry, airy part of the cellar. Avoid the use of barrels for onions; best place them on flat open trays or in shallow slatted crates where the air can circulate freely.

No month is better than September for starting or renewing a lawn, for young grass makes strong, rapid growth before cold weather and is ready to begin as soon as snow melts in the spring. Small shrubs, but particularly evergreens of all kinds, should be transplanted now. If pines, firs, spruces or cedars are being handled, see that the roots are not exposed to air and sun; if this is allowed the resin in the roots "sets" and trees are more likely than not to perish. Nurserymen make a practice of taking a good-sized "clod" of earth up with the trees, and wrap it immediately with burlap sacking, then soaking thoroughly with water. Peonies, iris and other perennial plants may be set out now with good results.

Since September is the harvest season of the year, now is the time for the gardener to observe closely the results of his season's work, make note of his successes or failures either in his head or better yet in his pocket notebook, and compare the results obtained with the many varieties of vegetables he has grown. Some have done better than others; give them the preference next year. Make the lessons learned today serve you tomorrow—yes, and forever after.

Lending a Helping Hand

In the pioneer days of forest clearing and prairie breaking settlers had to help each other in every possible way. Indians were a constant menace and, self-preservation being at stake, community organization for defense became imperative. A spirit of pioneer Christianity pervaded every settlement and governed men's actions in those trying times before selfish aggrandizement had become the rule. And as a relic of the pioneer's splendid cooperation and brotherly love there remained for many a long day the kindly custom of lending a helping hand when sickness, death or disaster made such assistance necessary on the farm.

It is a misfortune, surely, that in the present struggle for existence and greedy dollar-getting and money-hoarding, even the farmer, who of all men most needs community cooperation to insure and maintain the welfare of himself and neighbors, is forgetting the golden rule lessons of pioneer times. Would that those good old customs were revived and practiced in every farming district! Then once more there would be "plowing bees" on the farm of the widow left without men-folk to put in the crops. Then would the young chaps gather again for a cornhusking contest on the neighbor's farm where sickness had incapacitated the help and the crop was in danger of being lost. We used to do those charitable things in the old days, and well do we remember that when thieves stole the village doctor's horse and buggy the generous neighbors "chipped in" and bought him a new and better outfit. One seldom hears of such kindly acts today, nor does it seem to be the fashion to speed the parting guest with dinner and present, or to welcome the newcomer with help in getting settled.

Let us see if, by discussing these things in the churches, schoolhouse meetings and conferences of the district, a stronger sentiment of mutual helpfulness cannot be aroused among farmers of the community and lead to the return of Christian cooperation and generous acts. It was Pope who said, "In Faith and Hope the world will disagree, but all mankind's concern is charity." That once was true, no doubt. Now, alas, it has largely been forgotten, and needs once more to be revived.

Every man, woman and child in a farming community, as well as the ministers and schoolteachers, may render splendid service by working earnestly for the betterment of community harmony and helpfulness, resting assured that no effort of this sort, humble though it may be, ever fails entirely to have a good effect. Results not apparent today gradually take form and finally attain magnitude, yet they owe their initiation to some small beginning. As sound passing out of our hearing vibrates on and on into the ether of space until, perchance, it meets vibrations of kindred tone and augments in volume until it peals forth in thunderous notes to be heard afar, so may we believe that every kindly word of pure quality strikes a kindred appreciative chord in some receptive heart or mind and in so doing creates cumulative force for good in all things pertaining to life and the world's work.

Silo Filling Suggestions

If possible cut corn when the kernels are well dented and set on the cob, for at this stage the crop contains the maximum amount of nourishment and sufficient moisture to guarantee good silage if correctly handled. If corn must be cut while still green and underripe, allow it to lie in the field and wilt for two or three days. This will remove much of the excess moisture or juice, a common cause of wet, sour silage if it is not dried out. If allowed to lie in the field and dry, however, there is little danger of poor silage even with immature corn.

If corn is overripe it must have water added for good results. Add water at the rate of from one-fourth to one-half the weight of the corn. There is little danger of adding too much water; in fact, the real danger is that insufficient water will be added. Perhaps the simplest plan is to run a steady stream of water from a hose into the blower while silage is being cut and elevated into the silo. If corn has been frosted it should be cut as soon as possible, for it dries out very rapidly. If it is not cut at once, add water to the chopped corn as advised in the case of overripe corn.

Thorough Tramping Is Important

Tramping silage is a very tiring, laborious task, and for this reason it is frequently neglected or indifferently done, but it is extremely important. Loosely-packed silage is almost certain to sour or mold. Keep a man in the silo throughout the filling process, preferably a strong, heavy fellow who does not object to the dirt. A man who will conscientiously sweat his way through the job, carefully spreading and tramping around the walls as well as the middle, will certainly earn more than his wages. Spread silage evenly as it falls from the blower; if this is not done all the heavier parts such as chopped ears and thick stalks will fall directly under the blower in one place and the lighter leaves will scatter more widely. By rights the mixture of cut ears, chopped stalks and leaves should be uniform throughout, and this desired end can be attained only by careful spreading.

See that silo doors or door boards fit securely to prevent leaking. This can be prevented if noticed while filling is in progress, but little can be done after the silo is filled. Soak down the top of the newly-filled silo with water thoroughly, tramping daily for several days after filling. If this is overlooked or indifferently done the top three to six feet often molds or "fire fangs" because it has not been tramped securely enough to exclude air. Refill if possible to make up for settling, then top off with a covering of straw well soaked and held down with heavy planks. If silage is not to be used for some time, it is a good plan to sow oats which will sprout and grow to make an almost airtight covering that can be quickly and easily removed when the silo is opened.

Beware of Posion Gas

Leave top or ventilator open until fermentation or curing is completed to allow gas to escape. Speaking of gas, always take a lighted lantern into the silo while silage is curing. Carbonic acid gas is formed in this process and as it is heavier than air it may be present in dangerously large quantities where ventilation is not provided. If this is the case the lantern will go out. Unless the farmer does likewise, and that promptly, he may be speedily overcome. Especially is this likely to happen in the deep pit silo, but fatalities have frequently occurred in common silos where a free circulation of air was not permitted. Better be safe than sorry.

Profitable Orchard Management

Productiveness of orchards could be greatly increased if horses and cows were not allowed to pasture among the trees, according to a statement recently issued on the subject by Prof. F. R. Gifford, horiculturist of the Wisconsin College of Agriculture.

Horses and cows pastured in orchards eat the nourishment that should rightfully go to the trees. The animals do not give back enough fertilizer to pay for what they take. Then, too, horses frequently injure trees by eating the leaves, tearing off the bark, or pulling down and breaking the lower branches. Cows also cause damage in the latter manner.

It is a good practice to allow poultry the run of the orchard, but it is a mistake to have the orchard in the chicken yard, however. Chicken manure is too rich in nitrogen. Isolated trees in chicken yards, where they are grown mainly for shade, frequently will make phenomenal growth, but will produce very little fruit.

With proper care apple trees will bear for many years. Old trees, the rotten portions of which have been cleaned and filled with cement, can be made to bear satisfactory crops by "suckering." Severe pruning and liberal use of fertilizer will induce suckering. Some of the suckers are then left to form a new top to the tree, and old growth is removed. When this is done the new branches will bear in three years. This plan has been successfully carried out in Wisconsin and adjoining states where many old, neglected orchards have been rejuvenated and are now bringing in money each year.

Spraying is one of the primary essentials for producing good fruit. If farmers feel that they cannot afford to do this alone they should form a "spray ring," several members purchasing necessary machinery and materials together and using them cooperatively.

New Things About Insect Pests

The satin moth, so-called on account of its white and satin-like appearance, is a dangerous enemy of willows and poplars that has recently made its appearance in Eastern States. This insect is common throughout Europe where it does great damage to both poplars and willows. It was reported present in this country in 1920 north of Boston, Mass., where it is thought that it had been established for several years. Though it is impossible to definitely determine the source of its introduction, it is quite probable that the insect was brought in with some importations of willows or poplars.

The satin moth hibernates as small larva, webbed over and concealed in crevices in the bark, so hidden and inconspicuous as often to escape the most careful inspection. While the pest is looked upon as not yet of prime importance, it is a very serious enemy of the plants it attacks, and the prevention of its further distribution in the United States is highly desirable. At present it is known to have spread to cover a considerable area extending from Boston into southeastern New Hampshire and involves some 63 towns in Massachusetts and seven in New Hampshire. It is proposed that quarantine restrictions shall be limited to the areas within these states actually determined from time to time to be infested.

BLISTER BEETLES NOW HARMFUL.—The disappearance of the variety of grasshopper which caused historical damage in Kansas a generation ago has removed the one excuse of blister beetles for living in that region. A study of these insects and measures for their control is reviewed in a recent publication of the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

The larvæ of blister beetles eat grasshopper eggs. When, in the language of the Scripture, the grasshopper was a burden upon mankind, these beetles were good friends of the Kansas farmer. The species of grasshopper responsible for a large share of the injury, and the one that stands today an insect bogy to those of limited entomological knowledge, has now disappeared from the scenes of its former activity so completely that specimens of it are curiosities to the new generation of entomologists.

But as friends the blister beetles are, after all, comparative failures, for they are found to destroy large acreages of sugar beets, alfalfa, beans and peanuts. On beans, peanuts and locust trees, and to a large extent on alfalfa, these beetles usually destroy only the petals and pollen of the flowers. On potatoes, sugar beets, and to a lesser extent on the Russian olive, however, they commonly strip the plant clean of its leaves.

A Paris green and quicklime spray, one pound of each to 25 gallons of water, and a zinc arsenite spray, one pound to 20 gallons of water, have been found most effective against these pests.

LEAD ARSENATE FOR HUSK-MAGGOT.—Experiments in the control of the walnut husk-maggot, a serious enemy of the black walnut, have been conducted with success by the Department of Agriculture. The habits and life history of the insect have been determined sufficiently to allow the study of control measures which have been conducted in two groves.

A lead arsenate spray was used in both instances with the result that in one grove a count of the nuts showed that four per cent. had been attacked by the maggots, compared with 60 per cent. destruction the year before. In the other the condition was estimated as 75 per cent. better than during the previous season. Flies confined in roomy wire-screen cages fed freely on sweetened water, to which sufficient lead arsenate had been added to give the liquid a milky color.

The Benefits of Lime

While it is seldom necessary to apply lime solely for plant food, there is frequent need of it to correct the acid condition of the soil. Many crops, particularly legumes, cannot thrive in acid soil. When clover does not grow well it is usually because the soil is acid or because drainage is poor. Some weeds, such as horse-tail rush, wood horse-tail, smart-weed and sheep sorrel, indicate that soil is sour or acid. To verify this indication the litmus-paper test can easily be made with blue litmus-paper purchased at any drug store. Take a lump of moist soil, break it apart, insert a piece of litmus-paper, squeeze it tightly together again, and allow it to remain for half an hour. Then take out the paper; if it is pinkish, or shows pink spots, the soil is acid and should be limed.

For best results apply two tons of finely-ground limestone, or one-half to a ton of burned lime every four or five years. If coarsely-ground limestone is easily obtainable at a low price it may be used, but more is required per acre. Apply limestone to the surface soil with a lime spreader, or with the manure spreader in which coarse manure and lime have first been mixed, then harrow in when land is being prepared for crops. It may also be applied to grass several months before sod is to be plowed under, but in this case more lime is required for quick results.

Hints for Hog Raisers

There are a number of "odd jobs" that in the rush of farm work may be overlooked unless the hog raiser makes it a point to "get them out of the way" before cold weather arrives. Now is the best time to scrape together the accumulation of manure about yards and pens, load it into the manure spreader, and spread it upon the meadow, stubble field or fallow where it will quickly decompose and work into the soil before fall plowing commences.

Rake scattered corn-cobs into piles, set them afire, and blanket them slightly with earth to prevent rapid burning. Choose a day when the wind is not too strong, however. In this way unsightly rubbish is quickly and easily converted into wholesome and health-giving corn-cob charcoal. Leave it where the pigs can have ready access to it at all times. There is no danger that they will do themselves harm by eating too much; the greatest danger, on many farms at least, is that they will not receive enough of it.

This is the season when lice and other parasites and vermin, both internal and external, seem to multiply most rapidly, perhaps because animals have been somewhat weakened by hot weather, scant pastures, poor water supply, or unsanitary conditions in hog houses or lots. Old hog breeders say, "Where lice abound look for disease also." No doubt where we find both vermin and filth, we may safely look for disease also. Consider lice as visible warning. If dipping has been delayed or overlooked entirely, attend to it now, then give houses, feed troughs, feeding floors and runways a thorough cleaning followed by a liberal coat of whitewash.

Questions and Answers

LOGANBERRIES.—I have read about the Loganberry and wondered if it could be grown here. Please tell me through Modern Farmer what this crop is like, how to grow it and will it grow here.

T. W., Dowagiac, Mich.

A.—The Logan blackberry, or Loganberry, is a trailing type that resembles the dewberry in its habits of growth and in forming new plants by the tips of the canes sending roots into the ground. It is a very strong grower, sometimes producing canes 20 feet or more in length. For garden use, set the plants in the spring six feet apart in rows six to eight feet apart. Let the canes trail on the ground for the first season. During the second spring either drive a strong stake beside each plant or build a trellis with two or three wires. Tie the canes to stakes or wires with soft twine or strips of rag that will not injure the bark. After the fruit is picked, cut out the old canes and tie up the new ones. If new canes grow too long, cut them back to any desired length and give the same general care as for blackberries. Loganberries are grown extensively in the mild sections of the Pacific Coast, and it is unlikely that they will survive cold winters elsewhere, though they might well be tried. We do not know of anyone who grows them in your region.

Poultry Farming for Women

D. A.—The hen must have met with some accident which has hurt her back. I can't think of any cure except the humane one of ending her misery with a sharp axe.

M. C.—As the majority of your young chickens are growing and doing well, the trouble must be hereditary. Possibly you have some old hens which are too fat, or hens which have suffered from roup or cholera in the past, and their eggs produce chickens wanting in vitality, and with roupy tendencies. Are you quite sure that the brood coops are free from lice? Sour milk could not have caused the trouble; it is one of the best feeds for poultry at all times.

S. P.—If you are keeping Leghorns, or any of the lighter breeds, one rooster to every fifteen hens, but if you are keeping any of the heavy varieties, such as Plymouth Rocks, Orpingtons or Wyandottes, it is not safe to keep more than seven hens with each rooster. I think the heat must have run up or down in the incubator. You have not given me any information about the way you operated the machine, or if any accident happened during the term of incubation, so it is impossible for me to say the exact cause of the trouble.

J. D. E.—The little turkey had what is commonly called blackhead, which is really a disease of the liver and intestines. When young birds once get the disease, doctoring is of very little avail. The only help is along the lines of prevention. You must have some old bird, turkey or ordinary chicken, which has the disease in a mild, chronic form. Next month I will go into the subject of the turkey disease, and my own experience in putting old birds into condition for the next year's breeding season. A hen which has had cholera may recover from it and in time go to laying again, but she will always be susceptible to cold, and her eggs should not be used for hatching.

E. W.—The lice were undoubtedly responsible for the chickens being dumpy. As you are sure that you have got rid of them, conditions will improve. Better put a little tincture of iron or nux vomica into the drinking water, or if you are not near a drug store, put a few rusty nails into the water. It will help to tone up their appetites. (2) If a considerable number of roundworms are found, the remainder of the flock should receive appropriate treatment. The remedies which are used to dislodge these parasites should be given when the birds are fasting. They should have a light feed at night and should be given the medicine the following morning. Two or three hours after giving the medicine they should have a purgative, which may be Epsom salts, 40 grains for each adult bird, thoroughly mixed with a small quantity of moist mash, and so distributed that each bird will get its share, or they may be given two or three teaspoonfuls of castor oil. An hour later a light ration may be given. One of the best remedies is oil of turpentine, which may be mixed with an equal quantity of olive oil and 20 to 30 drops of the mixture given at a dose. This is followed in two hours with two to three teaspoonfuls of castor oil. Thymol is especially active in the case of roundworms, and one grain of it may be made into a pill with a little bread and butter and given to each fowl. It should be followed by a purge, as in the case of other remedies. Santonica or worm seed in doses of seven or eight grains is also successfully used to combat this class of worms.

I MACG.—It seems as if the birds must have eaten some very stimulating or irritating food since you moved to the new place. Have you been using bone fertilizer or any such thing on the farm? All I can suggest is to give the whole flock a mash made of bran and middlings, moistened with castor oil, to clear out the intestines. Then cut down on food, giving only wheat or oats scattered in deep litter, and don't give them any egg powders or food specially prepared for stimulating egg production. Anything that forces egg production, whether it is an overfed condition or stimulating powders, invariably ends in malformed or rotten eggs.

MRS. L.—Please read answer to J. D. E. in this issue.

A COMFORT READER.—As you are located in California, there will be no trouble about June birds developing.

A. T.—I am sorry to say that I can suggest no treatment for the fowls, for I can't understand what the trouble is, as you have only nine old hens left. You had better kill and burn the carcasses and start in with fresh stock next year, after thoroughly cleaning and disinfecting the house, and purifying the yard and surrounding land by growing some crop on it.

C. S. G.—You have not given me sufficient information about the conditions, or the way you feed and care for the birds, to enable me to form even the faintest idea of what the trouble is, so it is impossible for me to suggest any treatment.

G. E.—When hens have suffered from roup it is not safe to use their eggs for hatching, no matter how thoroughly they may seem to have recovered, for chicks hatched from such eggs are never profitable, and as these have developed the disease, doctoring would be only a waste of time. Better kill them and clean up the premises.

W. C.—From your description, and from the way the joints swell, break open and discharge a watery fluid, I fear the bird has tuberculosis. Better kill and burn all affected birds at once, for the disease is spread through the droppings of an ailing bird, so one bird can contaminate an entire flock in a very short time, and what is more, the eggs of diseased birds frequently contain the bacilli, as has been proven by the inoculation of and transference of the disease to rabbits and guinea pigs. The young chicks hatched from such infected eggs are diseased when they leave the shell, and, of course, soon infect the poultry with which they run. Pigs, cats, rats and mice are especially liable to be infected with fowl tuberculosis from eating the carcasses of birds which have died, and these animals serve to keep up the contagion and may communicate it to other fowls. Even calves and colts are sometimes found suffering from this form of tuberculosis. Symptoms are generally not observed in the internal tuberculosis of fowls until the disease has reached an advanced stage of development. They begin with gradual loss of weight, wasting of the muscles, paleness of the comb and, toward the end, dullness, sleepiness and diarrhea. Very often there is at the same time a tubercular inflammation of the joints and of the sheaths of the tendons, which is revealed by lameness, swelling of the joints and legs, and sometimes by the formation of hard, external tumors of considerable size. Occasionally the skin over the swollen joints breaks, the interior of the joint ulcerates, and a small quantity of pus containing large numbers of tubercle bacilli is discharged. Swellings and bony enlargements of the joints with fowls are invariably suspicious, and their nature should always be investigated by killing the bird and examining the liver and spleen to determine if these have any whitish or yellowish spots on their surface which when cut into prove to be tubercular masses. There is no treatment that will cure fowls which have been attacked with tuberculosis. When the disease is discovered the effort should be to eradicate it at once by killing off the whole flock and thoroughly disinfecting all the houses and runs. As the great majority of the birds will probably be more or less affected, the chances are that any which are saved will have diseased livers and intestines, from which the bacilli will escape and keep up the infection of the flock and the runs. The danger of this is so great that no attempt should be made to keep any of the fowls that have been exposed to the contagion, no matter how valuable they may be. The bodies of the birds which have died or are killed as well as all the accumulated manure, sweepings and scrapings of the poultry houses, should be completely destroyed by fire.

G. F. G.—Yes, sour milk is very good for little chicks. Give them nothing for 36 hours after they hatch, then fill a pan with the whey from clabbered milk, and put into the brooder. Pick up a few of them, dip their beaks into the whey to teach them to drink. When a few commence, the whole brood will soon follow suit. When you think all have had a taste, take away the pan, and two hours later give them their first feed, which should be hard-boiled egg, chopped, shell and all, and mixed with an equal quantity of stale bread-crumbs. From January through the spring months, I always devote our space to incubation, brooding and the general care of young chicks. I don't know of any practical book that will give you just what you want. You had better subscribe to one of the good poultry magazines. I take pleasure in helping our readers with their poultry; beginners appeal to me especially, so please feel at liberty to write me for any advice you may want. I have raised poultry on a large scale for the last 17 years, and practical experience has taught me a good deal of useful knowledge, which I am glad to give to our COMFORT readers.

However, when the ceremony was over, the gay crowd came forward, brimming with mirth, and in the jollity that followed, these impressions in a measure passed away.

There were laughter and compliment on every lip, shaking of hands and congratulation on every side, until at length Minnie Shelton put a stop to it by coming forward and saying:

"The musicians are all ready, Lord Carrol; you'll have to dance the first quadrille with your bride; I'll claim you for the second. Hasn't it been a lovely wedding, though?—just as if it had been real, you know—and we've had all the fun without any flurry. My!" perking her restless head on one side and eying Josephine out of her bright eyes like some pretty bird, "don't I hope I may make as charming a bride when somebody comes to marry me!"

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

"I HAVE BEEN MAD."

When that first dance was over, Lord Carrol led Josephine to a seat, and, bowing before her, said, in as light a tone as he could command:

"Thank you, Miss Richards. I suppose our part in this little farce closes now. Allow me to congratulate you upon having assisted in carrying it off in the most perfect manner. I must confess," he added, a slight shade falling over his face, "that it does not strike me as just the thing to make a mockery of sacred subjects; but since Minnie Shelton, who is a veritable witch, and our guests have enjoyed it, perhaps I should not preach about it."

Josephine looked up at him with a strange glitter in her eyes, while her face was crimson.

Oh, if he would but utter one fond, tender word to her—if he would but give her a sign even, to show that his heart had been thrilled like her own while they were standing there side by side!

He noticed her heightened color, and thought she looked at him queerly, but he never mistrusted the storm that was tearing her heart asunder.

"I fear you are very warm," he said, kindly. "Shall I get you an ice?"

"Thanks, no. I shall do very well," she answered, constrainedly.

And then, with another bow, he excused himself and left her.

A convulsive sob broke from the girl's lips as she watched him pass down the long room and out at a lower door; then she, too, arose and glided through the window near which she had been sitting.

She sped along the wide piazza until she came to the end, where a flight of steps led down to a little arbor, or cluster of small trees which inclosed a great piece of statuary.

She fled within it, and sinking down upon the granite base which supported the marble group, she gave vent to her misery in a burst of passionate tears.

Lord Carrol, too, as he passed out of the ballroom, was more deeply moved than he would have liked to betray, and not very well pleased either with the part he had been compelled to play so much against his inclination.

Had his companion been any other than Josephine, perhaps he would have felt differently; but he could not forget that he had once been represented as her lover, and something in her manner tonight warned him that she would not have regretted it had that farce been a bona fide marriage service instead, and he was exceedingly annoyed over the affair.

He met his mother as he was going through a hall, and she detained him by gently laying her hand upon his arm.

"Has anything disturbed you?" she asked, looking up into his clouded face.

"No, mother; nothing but that farce which has just been enacted. I do not like such things; they seem too much like sacrilege," he returned.

"Neither do I like them, Archie," she said, gravely. "We have no right to make light of any subject so serious as marriage; but Minnie is a wild, thoughtless girl, intent only on the excitement of the moment, and did not stop to consider. I must say, though, that Miss Richards helped to carry it off splendidly, and appeared the blushing, modest bride to perfection. She is a fine-looking girl."

She said this to sound him, regarding him searchingly all the time that she was speaking.

"Yes; she appears to attract considerable admiration," he replied, indifferently, and then passed on.

He went out at the great hall door upon the veranda, which Josephine had just a moment or two ago traversed, and followed almost in her footsteps, until he came to that little circle of shrubbery, when, instead of going within it, he went around it.

He could not shake off the unpleasant sensations that were upon him; everything in his nature had suddenly seemed to become out of tune, and he wished to get way from even the sounds of the gay revelers within the house while his thoughts turned wistfully toward the new world and Star.

He was getting very impatient to go to her, and he had intended to be on his way thither before this, but circumstances had recently transpired by which he would be detained another month, and the time seemed very long to him.

He paced back and forth in the moonlight for some time, his footsteps making no sound on the velvety turf; but all at once, as he passed that evergreen circle, within which Josephine still sat, a sob fell upon his ear and startled him. He stopped to listen, and heard the sound repeated. With his usual energy and decision, he passed around to the entrance and approached the group of statuary to ascertain who was there.

At first he could see no one, for just then the moon was hidden by a cloud, and Josephine's dress being white, her form blended with the marble and could not be distinguished, while she was so absorbed by her own emotions that she was not aware of Lord Carrol's presence until he touched her on the shoulder and said:

"Pardon me, you are grieving; is your trouble anything that I can help?"

She sprang to her feet instantly and confronted him, her cheeks blazing hotly, her whole form trembling from the touch of his hand.

"Miss Richards!" he exclaimed, in surprise, as he recognized her, while involuntarily he recoiled from her, so unexpected and disagreeable—in his present frame of mind—was this meeting.

"I thought," he added, "that you were in the ballroom enjoying yourself with the other merry-makers."

She noticed the coldness of his tone, as well as his unconscious shrinking from her, and it cut her to the heart, while at the same time it aroused her anger.

"Enjoying myself!" she repeated, passionately and unguardedly; "the evening is spoiled for me; everything is spoiled—the world and my life. That mockery through which we have just passed has made me miserable."

It was strange, he thought, that they should both feel thus.

"I regret that anything should have occurred to make you so unhappy," he returned. "I hoped while you were the guest of my mother that nothing would transpire to mar the pleasure of any one. But," he added, more cheerfully, "you must not allow that farce to oppress you thus. I do not, as I have said before, approve of making light of such serious things, and marriage, to me, seems like a sacred ordinance. But no harm was done, I trust; our friends were amused for half an hour; and really, Miss Richards," he continued, smilingly, "if, when you come to be married in earnest, you make as charming a bride as you did tonight, the happy man will be one to be envied."

"Don't, Lord Carrol," Josephine cried out, in a sharp tone of pain, and laying her hand appealingly on his arm; "don't say such things to me!"

She was trembling like a leaf, and he saw that she was terribly excited, while the piteous tone in which she had just spoken went directly to his kind heart. He took her hand and drew it under his arm.

"You are nervous," he said, kindly. "Come and walk with me a few moments until you are calmer—the night is almost like summer—then I will take you back to the company."

His tone was so sympathizing, his touch on her arm so gentle, while it thrilled every fiber of her body, that it was more than she could bear.

She was going tomorrow, and this man whom she loved with a passion almost amounting to idolatry, would be beyond her reach. She would not meet him again for months, perhaps never, and this thought, added to her other pain, broke her down completely.

She grasped his arm with both her white hands, her heart was beating like a frightened bird's, there was a choking sensation in her throat, and bowing her graceful head upon her clasped and trembling hands, she burst into a fresh fit of weeping, which was like a tempest.

The young lord found himself in a very awkward position. Those shaking hands, that bowed head lying so near his heart, that lithe, quivering form, those tears and sobs, told him but too plainly what caused this deep emotion.

"Miss Richards—Josephine," he said, unwittingly using her first name in his embarrassment, "let me take you in. You will make yourself ill. What can I do for you?"

But she could not control herself. She had abandoned herself too entirely now to her passion to conquer it readily, and she sobbed on, conscious only of how she loved him, and that she was near him.

Oh! if he could but have returned her love, she would gladly have given the best years of her life. There was no sacrifice too great, she thought at that moment, for her to make in exchange for the prize she wished to win.

"What can I do for you, my friend?" he asked again.

"Love me!" burst most unconsciously from her trembling lips.

He started violently. He had not imagined that she would dare to give utterance to such words as these; while she knew, the instant that they were spoken, that instead of gaining his affection, she had forfeited even his respect.

There was a moment of awkward silence. Then Lord Carrol said, very gravely, but still very gently:

"Miss Richards, you have become so excited over what has transpired, that I think you are hardly conscious of, or responsible for, what you have said. Shall we go in now?"

"No!" she answered, lifting her head, proudly, and stifling her sobs, although she still clung tightly to his arm, as if she could not let him go. "No; I will not go in yet. Having said so much, I must say more. You are right. I am not responsible for the words which I have spoken. I did not mean to speak them—they escaped me unawares; but since I have spoken them, I cannot recall them, and my secret is mine no longer. Oh!" she continued, with a heart-breaking sob, "pity me, have compassion on me, forgive me!"

"I have nothing to forgive," he said, kindly; "and, believe me, I am very sorry that your nerves should have been so overtaxed tonight; but," and his face flushed, "perhaps it will be better for both of us if I tell you that, however much I may esteem you, my heart could never respond to the wish you have expressed; it has long been given to another. I thought you knew this; I thought you knew that—I loved your cousin, Miss Gladstone."

Her hands dropped from his arm as if they had been burned, while keen, quivering pains shot all over her body at this avowal.

Her head came up with a haughty gesture, her eyes blazed with sudden anger, her red lips curled with bitter scorn. She had humiliated herself—she had bowed her proud spirit to the dust to win him, and now he dared to tell her this—dared to tell her that he loved the girl whom she hated, whom she had triple cause to hate in that she was far her superior in every way—she had won the heart of the only man whom she had ever loved, and had laid her under an obligation which she could never repay.

"I believe I have been mad!" she whispered, fiercely, through her tightly shut teeth, which shone like lovely pearls in the moonlight. "Yes, I must have been mad," she went on; "some spirit of evil must have possessed me to make me tell you what I have; for—hear me, Lord Carrol—I do not love you; I hate you! If I ever had any love for you, it has turned to hate now, and I detest the girl whom you profess to love, and for whom you have dared to confess your affection, knowing how I hate her."

She pressed her hands wildly to her temples, with a low moan. It was not so easy as she thought to hate where she had loved so passionately.

"Do you think it is a light thing?" she asked, hotly, "for a girl to reveal the secrets of her heart, as I have revealed mine tonight? Do you think there has been no sacrifice of pride or modesty on my part to tell you what I have told you? My heart has been burning to ashes while standing here by your side, and you have pitilessly tortured me still further by telling me that you love Star Gladstone—that girl who has only crossed my path to mar my every prospect in life. I thought half an hour ago, when I stood beside you during that mock ceremony and spoke those sacred words, that if they could only have been real—if I could indeed have been made your lawful wife, it would have been like the happiness of heaven for me. If you could have but called me by that fond name only once—if you had looked tenderly into my eyes and owned me yours, I could have asked no greater bliss in life. But, heavens! when I break every barrier down, when I forget my womanhood and modesty and tell you how I idolize you, you coolly inform me that you love the girl I hate. Beware! you have made me an eternal enemy to you both, and I will ruin both your lives, as you have ruined mine, if I can."

She would have dashed wildly by him after uttering those last fierce, revengeful words, but he placed himself directly in her path and would not let her pass.

He saw now that all his sympathy and kindly feeling had been worse than wasted. He had read her character aright from the first; she was totally selfish, and her love—if an unreasoning passion like hers could be called love—would have made any true man miserable, for her ambition would never be satisfied.

He did not wonder now that he had not had more faith in her, and his sympathy and sorrow for her at once turned into contempt.

"Miss Richards," he began, in a stern, cold voice, and looking down into her angry blazing eyes with a glance which cowed her in spite of her passion, "what respect I may have entertained for you heretofore, what pity or compassion I may have experienced for your apparent suffering tonight, and the only emotion which ever made you appear really womanly or gentle in my eyes, has wholly vanished during those last vindictive words of yours. I had begun to hope that you had learned lessons of charity and kindness during the past year—that you had come to realize there was something more required in life than a continual seeking after pleasure and the gratification of pride and ambitious desires; but I perceive that I was mistaken, and I am sorry, for you will be the greatest sufferer. Your declaration of hatred, and your threat that you will ruin Miss Gladstone's and my life, are but idle words; for our love is something that malice can never touch, and a month hence I shall be on my way to America to make her my wife."

Josephine uttered a cry of mingled pain and anger at this, and made another effort to leave him, but he would not let her go even yet.

"I have not quite finished what I wish to say, Miss Richards," he continued, "and we may as well come to a full understanding at once. I have been told of the change in Miss Gladstone's fortunes. I have, indeed, learned much regarding her life while she was with you that has both pained and surprised me. I know, too, of some things which occurred this year, when you were both visitors at the same fashionable resort. You are, it appears, to remain a resident of England, and we may meet occasionally in society; but let me tell you I shall never allow any such indignity to be heaped upon the future Lady Carrol as that of which you were guilty this summer at Newport."

He saw her start as he said this.

"What do you mean?" she demanded, haughtily.

"I do not think you are so ignorant of my meaning as you appear," he returned, his handsome lips curling with scorn; "but if you wish to be reminded of the fact that you publicly twitted Miss Gladstone last summer of having once performed the duties of a chambermaid in your family, I can do so. But do not let it ever happen again, or I shall feel it my duty to make all the facts of the case public."

"Who has told you this?" she demanded, angrily.

"That does not matter," he replied, coldly; "it is sufficient that I know it."

"Ralph Meredith has told you," she cried.

"Mr. Meredith is my friend—but that is a point we need not discuss, I think," he answered, quietly.

"Perhaps you do not know that he played the role of devoted lover to Miss Gladstone this summer," she sneered, hoping to make him jealous.

Lord Carrol flushed.

He had mistrusted something of this from what Ralph had told him. He did not believe that Star would have confessed what she had to him, except to convince him that she could never entertain feelings of affection toward any one save the man who, as she supposed, had wronged her.

"Miss Gladstone is my affianced wife," he replied, proudly, feeling that he had a perfect right to regard and speak of her as such, knowing that she still loved him, and that his explanations to her would re-establish their former relations. "But," he added, as he stepped aside now to allow her to pass, "it is useless to prolong this interview; only let me caution you, Miss Richards, to remember that while you show proper respect for me and mine, I shall also tender you the respect belonging to a lady."

She was as white as her spotless dress now. He could see by the moonlight that she had grown perfectly ghastly, but there was a wild, fearful light in her eyes.

"My hate will follow you both," she said, hoarsely, "and I tell you I will ruin your lives if I can."

She dashed by him and disappeared from his sight, leaving him standing there wonder-stricken that a creature so beautiful to look upon could possess so depraved a nature.

Forty-Mile Trap-Line

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CHAPTER ONE.

LON Baker paused in the act of stooping to fasten the snow-shoe harness tighter on his feet, and warning a companion with an almost inaudible "Hist!" to "freeze" in his tracks, he reached for a trim-looking .30-30 carbine reposing underneath the straps of the well-loaded toboggan.

There was no pulling and tugging in releasing the rifle; Lon was too good a woodsman not to look after the accessibility of his rifle while in the woods. In quicker time than it has taken to write this, the young woodsman had lined the sights accurately onto a half-hidden target, and in another half second the report rang loud and echoed and re-echoed against the lofty mountains among which the travelers were lost to the civilized world.

"Ah! attaboy, up to your usual reputation as a second Deerslayer, Lon," enthusiastically exclaimed the young lad who was holding to a "gee-pole" fastened to the hindermost strap of the toboggan that was lately being drawn over the frozen snow by the hero of this narrative.

The speaker was obviously a lad not used to the ways of the big woods; in fact, he had only lately emerged from a famous down-state college, where he had put in four years' hard work struggling with classics and higher sciences. Around his home village, he answered to the name of "Tubs" Johnson; but at home on Sundays when polite company was around, his mother called him Percy.

Percy Johnson had been promised a place in his father's business, but like so many businesses just after the war, just about the time Tubs got through the school, his father's business went into bankruptcy and there was little left after the creditors were paid. This calamity to the family circumstances threw Tubs on his own resources; fortunately he had a considerate father who appreciated initiativeness above all desirable qualities in a young man. Despite Tubs' rotund figure, the family physician insisted that he was physically run-down as the result of prolonged indoor studies. The result was that Tubs was sent to the family camp on Racquette Lake with the instructions to put in a month of hard paddling and fishing. During the summer's vacation, Tubs met Lou Baker, a local Nimrod of considerable renown, and the two had formed a great liking to each other. As Tubs was alone in the rather spacious lake-shore camp, he invited Lon down to stay with him and act as guide on fishing and hiking excursions in return for board and a moderate wage. Nothing suited Lon better, for, as he said, his home was wherever his hat hung, and the log bungalow was vastly more comfortable than his father's shack at the foot of Bear Mountain. Lon's father was a foreman for the Santa Clara Lumber Company.

Before the summer was over, Tubs' weakened body had undergone a remarkable change. The soft flesh had hardened into muscles, and instead of a pale, shallow complexion, he now wore a sun-tanned, ruddy countenance that would do justice to an Indian. But long with the improved health came an ardent desire to remain out in the great open, at least for a year or two. The family fortunes would not permit him going on to the higher universities with his education, and now with so many soldiers returned from service in the Expeditionary Forces, jobs were few and far between. Most big companies were loyal to their old employees, and Tubs could well appreciate that his late schooling would not give him priority rights to a position over an ex-service man and former employe. Besides, positions were few in the small town where his people lived.

After talking the matter over with his parents of taking a job, they did not insist that he look for one immediately and even objected to his suggestion of going to a larger city to find employment. So when Lon opportunely flashed a news circular from a big fur house on Tubs at the Racquette Lake camp one day, the discussion readily turned to furs and the opportunities of making money trapping fur-bearing animals.

"It's going to be a big fur year, Tubs," Lon had said; "the signs are good. Muskrats are building their houses unusually early and the beavers are working over-time. Already the geese are wending their way in long strings toward Southern climates. It means a long, hard winter is coming. Cold weather will make people buy furs, and the fur dealers are now anticipating a big season. This report says that practically all the big city markets are cleaned out of old stock. This indicates the season will start off with lively, competitive buying, and almost invariably such a lively demand for furs reflects to the trappers in soaring price-lists. I've seen it happen before, Tubs. In fact, one winter I made more money trapping than Dad did at hard labor for the lumbering outfit. Me for the old trap-line this fall."

"I'm with you," emphatically declared Tubs, who had learned to put a great deal of confidence in any proposition made by the native Adirondacker. If he could make good money, even better than wages or a clerk's salary, at trapping, a healthy, enjoyable occupation, what could be better, was Tubs' decision.

Now the boys were actually in the big woods, alone, far from the sound of train whistles and the smell of factories. They were following a snow-shoe trail to their well-stored log cabin on the shore of Moose Lake. During the fall months they had stocked the camp with provisions and other necessaries, blazed two sets of trap-lines, built a considerable number of cubby pens and otherwise prepared for a busy trapping season. At the moment the trappers had halted to take a shot at a passing game animal, they were enroute to the camp with the last toboggan load of odds and ends that had been forgotten or omitted from their check-list.

"Hold, Lon, give him another soft-point, quick, he's going to get up," excitedly exclaimed Tubs, as he glimpsed through the bush the struggles of a buck deer to escape from an unknown danger. Almost simultaneously with Tubs' remarks, Lon mercifully sped another death-dealing soft-point bullet straight to the heart of the victim.

"I didn't shoot the second time because there was a possible chance the deer would escape," explained Lon. "A down buck is as good as your meat; but I don't like to see 'em wounded like that, with a broken back. Ah! a fine young spike-horn, Tubs, the best kind of eating you ever touched a tooth to," he continued, coming up to the now quite dead buck. Yet, though the eyes were looking glassy-like, Lon didn't dare walk up carelessly to stick it with his drawn hunting knife. He had too much respect for the menace of the deer's sharp knife-like hoofs, which are often wielded murderously in the last death struggles. Walking around to the animal's head, the young hunter grasped one of the horns and properly stuck the deer.

The boys now worked industriously to make a safe cache for their valued prize. Only a few days remained of the open hunting season, and they would need plenty of meat for the camp larder. Each one had a right to a buck, besides an extra one for camp use, and they had a special permit to keep the venison in camp several months after the season would close. Getting a buck so soon was rare luck of the Red Gods, for it would save so many days from hunting which could be applied profitably to the trap-line. However, owing to the heavily-loaded toboggan and the several miles between themselves and camp, it would be necessary to cache, or "hang" the deer for future use. This they did in the following manner:

First the boys turned the deer on its back, feet up, and with the keen-edged hunting knife ripped down the belly and removed the paunch and entrails. The heart and liver were strung on a stick to be taken to camp, while the carcass was swung up by a rawhide thong to a lower limb of a balsam. As soon as the carcass was cleared off the ground about three feet, the thong was tied and the meat was thus left swinging out of reach of small varmints like the skunk which might eat off it. The man smell would suffice to keep larger animals away. The meat would soon freeze solid and keep in perfect condition. This is why woodsmen speak of their outdoor coolers. Later the boys would come back to the cache and cut off such portions of the meat as they might need in camp, instead of attempting the strenuous task of dragging or tobogganing the carcass to camp whole.

The boys reached camp at dark and, as was to be expected, first put the deer heart and liver to cooking smothered in a liberal measure of onions. When the plain but wholesome "grub" was set on the board table, the boys declared they never tasted anything quite so good; and Tubs declared that he had never had such an appetite in his life.

There was a great deal to do to fix up the camp into an inhabitable shape, and by the time everything was arranged in order to suit the fastidious Lon, the boys eagerly spread blankets over the balsam in the bunks and immediately lapsed off into the sleep of the weary.

"Hey, yo-ho, where do you think you are—in your mother's Restwell instead of the balsams, Tubs? Hey, you, Tubs, hit the floor, I say. We've got a big day ahead with the traps," were the next words Tubs heard after his first night in camp. Dreamily he turned over and imagined he glimpsed his partner, Lon, bending over a box-stove turning buckwheat pancakes and frying bacon, then it turned into a dream in which he was shooting at a whole flock of bucks with horns like parlor rocking-chairs. Now he wounds one, which charges him, and the next moment he is bolstered head-foremost into the snow.

"Holy socks and cold Christmases, this is a nice way to wake a fellow up, you big sour-dough," exclaimed Tubs, crawling out of the wind-beaten snowdrift in front of the camp where he had been so ignominiously pitched by his husky partner.

"Didn't I yell at you for a half hour, and tell you I'd wash your face in snow if you didn't get up? What do you think this is, a sanitarium? I can see you've had a healthy sleep, but I'll tell you by the time you put in a week following me around these mountains with a trap pack, the odor of frying bacon in the morning will sure as Mike wake you up," replied Lon, seating himself at the table without further ceremony.

Tubs, who was fully awake by now, suddenly decided he had an appetite, and hastily washed without waiting to melt the ice around the sides of the pan.

An hour later the trappers were back to the scene of the killing of the day before, fully dressed for the trail, with rifles and a pack of traps.

"Now, Tubs, you just watch your Uncle Lon close, if you would learn the trapper's art. First we'll take a circle around these entrails. Ah! just as I expected, see these tracks?"

"Yes, looks like a small dog's tracks," replied the greenhorn Tubs.

"Well, they're not, but were made by a pair of foxes. See, the tracks vary slightly in size; takes close observation to notice it. They danced all around here last night, I suppose wondering what in the sam-hill had been going on in these peaceful woods; but they were scared to approach the leavings closer on account of the man smell. If we leave the entrails here, the foxes will come around every night, gradually getting closer until after a few nights, when the man smell isn't strong, they will come up to feed off them," Lon explained to the less experienced trapper.

Lon now proceeded to set a line of traps around the bait, at varying distances away up to a hundred yards, on the knolls and in trails between trees and stones where the animal would naturally be guided into the trap. The traps were No. 2's, lately boiled in balsam tea to kill the foreign odors, and were set with gloved hands. They were clogged to poles and to bushes cut at a distance from the sets.

"This is a sure set, Tubs," informed Lon, "if worked right. We won't come to the place for a couple of days; there will be no use. Then we only approach to within a hundred yards or sight to see if everything is right. If a clog is moved or gone, then we will investigate closer; otherwise leave without having made a human scent trail to the traps. Of course, if it should snow heavy, we'll be out of luck and will have to reset the traps; on the other hand, if it snows lightly, we stand a fine chance of making a big catch soon. Now we will tie a rawhide thong to the paunch and drag it around a few of these hills, which will make the best fisher line you ever saw. You take the buck's head and make a drag out of it. When you get around on the other side of this hill, look for a hollow snag, and leave the bait in it, setting one of the No. 2's in the entrance. Cover the top over with balsam to keep out the snow. Preferably the hole should be about two or three feet off the ground, with a pole leaned up to it; the fisher can readily walk in, and the snow will not drift over the set in the winter months to come."

Tubs had heard Lon describe the universal cubby pen set so often he felt no further instructions were necessary, and after being cautioned to blaze a few trees as he went along, and shoot twice when he got to the other side, where Lon was to meet him, the junior trapper started out to establish his first trap-line. Lon started in the opposite direction with the paunch of the deer, which was bait enough for about six sets.

Lon proceeded slowly, dragging part of the bait, and carrying the remaining portion in his waterproof packsack, keeping his eyes peeled for suitable hollow snags; besides, he spent much time in skirting windfalls and bogs and in observing fur signs. Ordinarily the trip around the hill would consume an hour's time, but with the necessary delay in making the sets, Lon was about three hours in getting to the point where he was to meet Tubs. There had been an abundance of fisher, marten, fox and raccoon signs to attract his attention, and he had even stopped to follow up some of the trails a distance to the best set locations.

When Lon reached the side of the ridge opposite the deer carcass, he was surprised not to see Tubs anywhere in sight. Then he began to wonder that he hadn't heard any shots, which on first thought Lon had dismissed by merely assuming that Tubs was saving his ammunition. Since Lon had six sets to make to Tubs' one, and the distance favored Tubs, if either, Lon began to worry about his missing partner.

"Surely a blind pig could find its way around a little ridge like this, I'll just shoot off this carbine and wait awhile," reasoned Lon, as he sighted over the barrel at a saucy red squirrel. Boom! "Another marten bait and one less pest in the woods," exclaimed Lon, picking up the mangled remains of a most energetic robber of birds' nests, camp chinkings and trappers' baits and camp food.

After a half-hour wait, and no appearance of Tubs, or any sound from him, Lon became actually worried. The sun was now getting low, and the atmosphere was dropping fast toward the zero mark. It would undoubtedly be the coldest night of any past.

Suddenly Lon was startled. Were his ears playing him a trick? No, there could be no mistake. This time it was repeated and alert ears caught the unmistakable sound of Tubs' gun being fired rapidly, one——two—three——four—five times, so far distant the shots were only distinguishable from the usual woods noises by close listening of acute ears. Only one shot remained. Then after perhaps fifteen seconds' pause, the remaining shot in his rifle was fired. Then deathly stillness reigned in the darkening woods. Even the wild life seemed to have heard with apprehensive forebodings the menacing shots, and hushed their noises.

Lon jumped to his feet. What could it mean? Surely Tubs would not unintentionally have wandered that far away, for if would have taken fast walking to reach that distance. Then he would not so suddenly empty his gun merely to inform the silent woods that he considered himself lost. No, Lon decided, even the non-experienced Tubs had had too much summer camping on the edge of the wilderness to act so rashly. There were no more shots; perhaps Tubs had ran into close quarters with a bear. Anyway, something must be wrong, he decided, and firing his gun twice in the air, Lon started off at a steady lope into the deepening shadows of the woods to reach his partner.

Saving Garden Plants for Winter Cheer

Potting and Re-potting Plants

Many people do not understand why they lose their plants after repotting. They simply know they become sickly and die, not realizing they have interfered with the resting period of the plant life. Foliage plants, in particular, always sustain more or less of a shock when repotted, and if not done at a time when the plant is putting forth new growth, there is no energy to withstand the shock. Authority on plant growth tells us that April or May are the best months for repotting. A little more latitude is possible in the repotting of soft-wooded plants such as heliotrope, geraniums, fuchsia, etc., but even with these, when repotting in winter is for the purpose of putting into larger pots, it is safer to feed with liquid fertilizer.

Another important point to be considered is the size of the pot. The amateur who has the idea that the more soil the healthier the plant, is working on the wrong principle. Too much root space is not conducive to vigorous growth. In selecting pots, use a size that prevents the appearance of top-heaviness, and for slips use a very small size and do not repot until the pot is filled with roots, and even then increase the size a very little for rapid growth.

Frequently it is years before a plant may require repotting if top fertilizing is understood, the necessity then arising from the soil becoming sour, and growing a surface moss. This condition will soon develop worms that will eat the roots.

In selecting garden plants that will give satisfactory results during the winter months, choose only those that are stocky and appear to be entirely healthy in color. Dig from the ground about six hours after the soil has been thoroughly wet, as it is then less likely to injure the roots. Place coarse charcoal in the bottom of pot and then a layer of prepared soil. Hold the plant in place and fill the pot to the rim.

In repotting, have the soil moist, hold the stem of the plant firmly between two fingers with the pot upside down. Now strike the edge of the pot against something wooden and the soil and plant will slip out in a whole mass. Carefully remove all old drainage from the roots, and replace with new in the fresh pot. Remove sour soil from the roots so far as it is possible without disturbing them too much. In repotting, tamp the soil well around the roots to prevent spaces through which the water and fertilizer will run. After potting, spray the plants from a watering pot and keep them out of doors in a shady place two or three days, bringing them into indirect sunlight for a few hours each day. Weather conditions will vary the process of acclimating the plants to indoor life, but the important point is, that all changes must be gradual until the roots have taken hold. It is well to sprinkle the leaves each day, which can be done by covering the soil with paper, but while out of the sun the moisture will evaporate slowly from the soil, and too much water will be harmful.

Growing Plants from Slips

Most house plants of the soft-wooded varieties may be started from slips which are cut from the mother plant the last of August or early in September, or any time before the nights become cold enough to chill the plants. But for winter blooms, they should be started fairly early. A stocky, well-grown stem end makes the best slip, and should be cut off with a sharp knife just below a leaf. Carefully cut away all the leaves except one or two at the very end. These leaves will usually fall anyway, and it is better to remove them as they retard rooting. Do not bruise stems while cutting. If sand is available, the slips can rapidly be rooted. Make a box deep enough for six inches of sand and the height of the slips. Bore a number of holes in the bottom and then put in a layer of coarse charcoal for drainage. Fill in the sand which should be wet and solidly packed down. It is a good plan to have the box of sand all prepared before the slips are cut, as any drying retards or may prevent rooting. Set the slips about one inch into the sand, first drilling the holes with something larger than the slip, then press the sand around them. Cover with glass and set in a warm place out of the sun. If the room chills at night, the box should have something thick wrapped about it. When the slips are well rooted, transplant to small pots filled with soil which is about one-third sand. Have the soil well pulverized. Hold the plant in the left hand in the center of pot, and with the right fill in the soil, settling and lightly firming the soil as you work.

Watering House Plants

A small-sized watering pot is necessary for spraying to wash the dust from plant leaves, as dust chokes the pores and prevents "breathing." All of this water used in spraying should not fall onto the soil as in time it will cause souring. Take the plants to the sink or over a tub. Cover the soil with a heavy paper cut in a circle large enough to hang well over the edge of the pot. Slash to the center and cut a round hole that will fit as closely as possible to the plant stem. Now spray thoroughly with tepid water, turning the plant from side to side. Many large foliage plants, such as ferns, are difficult to manage, but with assistance they can usually be placed on their side and sprayed in the sink. Glossy thick leaves can be washed separately with a sponge, but this is tedious. It is well to avoid raising a dust where winter plants are kept, so far as possible.

Too much watering of the soil causes a great loss of house plants; also the manner in which they are watered. Too much or too little water will cause the leaves to yellow and fall. As climate, temperature, location and atmosphere control evaporation of moisture from the soil, no rule for watering can be given, but over-watering is the most to be avoided. If the soil has become very dry, never water from the surface, but set the pot into a pail or tub of water and let it soak until the air bubbles stop rising. If water is given to the surface of very dry soil, it will usually make courses between the pot and soil, and run out through the opening, leaving the center dry. It can readily be seen how destructive this would be to the life of the plant.

Where the soil is kept evenly watered, giving it to the surface is satisfactory, providing the frequency and amount of water required has been determined. Never allow water to stand in the saucer as it prevents circulation of air and thus causes root-rotting. When plants are kept in jardinieres the pot should be set onto something that raises it from the bottom.

In potting plants use only clean pots as they contribute to the health of the plant. If they have already been used, scrub inside and out before using again. Soak new pots over night to prevent the dry pottery absorbing the moisture from the new soil.

Ferns and Vines

Of all the foliage plants most commonly grown, ferns require the most intelligent care. The fact that the natural abode of most ferns is in shady, damp places has led to a general idea that they should be kept very wet by daily watering, and it is through this error that many fail in growing them. If one were to hunt the woods for ferns they would always find them in loose, aerated soil, either damp or wet, but always well drained.

Soil composed of two-thirds sandy loam and one-third sand is the best for ferns. They will not thrive in heavy soil, neither must they ever become entirely dry. The most favorable exposure is a window where they will get plenty light but no direct sun rays. Under these conditions they will require a thorough wetting about every third day. Never give them "a little water for luck" as it hardens the top soil. It is a very good idea to occasionally water ferns by setting them in a pan of tepid water until the soil is moist, then drain. No water must ever stand in the saucer. Use liquid fertilizer about every two months.

If the air of the room in which ferns are kept lacks sufficient moisture, they are likely to be attacked by the red spider which attaches itself to the underside of the fronds. This fern is so minute in size that its presence is often overlooked until the upper side of the fronds show numerous tiny yellow spots. Thorough syringing with tobacco water on the underside of the fronds once a week will be found effective.

On page 17 is pictured a plant grown from a grapefruit seed, which has a thick, dark green, glossy leaf, almost rivaling the rubber tree as a house plant. The seed is planted in a small pot of sand, covered with glass and kept warm. As it begins to put forth leaves, give a little liquid fertilizer, but do not put into a larger pot until the small one is well filled with roots.

Ivies make beautiful vine plants which can be trained over a simple trellis, and then along strings until the effect is quite tropical. On page 17 is pictured an English variety, an old-time favorite, which is not oversensitive to moderate changes of temperature and will stand more or less neglect.

If one has a very warm sunny exposure, nasturtiums can be successfully grown indoors, and their cheerful beauty gives bounteous reward for the effort.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

I'm especially interested in child training for I have two sweet little girls to instruct and it is my aim not to do or say anything before them I wouldn't be proud if they said or did the same thing. I have three little ones in Heaven and the two little girls living are Gwendolyn, two and one-half years, and Obinelle, four months old. I am sending Gwendolyn's picture. Would like to see it in the corner. I find from my own experience that the more you praise the wee tots' efforts, the harder they'll try to please and you all know what a pleasure it is to see their little faces light up with smiles for a word of praise. I let my little girl help me brush. Of course she brushes trash and dust in all directions but she's so happy "helping Mamma." It is teaching her a lesson in Domestic Science.

I crochet in my spare time and enjoy it but I would rather sew, especially for children, for with two or three scraps of cloth the sweetest little garments can be made for them.

Irish, I imagine your little boy is of a nervous temperament. I would suggest serving his supper early and of food that is easily digested, and I wouldn't have him told fairy tales. It tends to make them nervous and I believe causes them to lose confidence in their elders.

I feel like I'd be lost without COMFORT for every department is interesting and helpful. The cooking recipes are unexcelled anywhere.

With love and best wishes to the whole family,
MRS. J. D. BRIDGES.

MONTANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I think COMFORT the best ever. I couldn't do without it.

Rosemary, I think the same as you do. I believe in growing up with my children. Often when I am playing with mine a stranger drives into the yard and says, "Little girl, is your father at home?"

Sisters, next time that husband of yours gets out of sorts and scolds, just keep still until he is his sunny self again, and then laughingly tell him what you think or ask if he never makes mistakes. I waited once after what would have been a serious quarrel had I joined in, then when he was quite happy I reminded him of a trait he possessed that was as bad as my fault and asked him why he didn't scold himself as he scolded me. He took me in his arms and kissed me and we have been much happier since. If you just can't keep still, say, "Well, I know I'm not perfect but I'll try and do better next time if you won't scold too much," or words to that effect and see how it works.

I am five feet four inches tall, have dark eyes and an abundance of dark hair. A MONTANA IMP.

CARIBOU, MAINE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you admit a sister from Maine?

I am married and have one of the best husbands ever. I teach school some of the time, and I expect to this fall.

Sada, teach your children the sounds. Teaching the alphabet first is fifteen years behind the times. He will learn those when he spells as I will explain later.

We use the Beacon Progressive and Educational readers for the first two grades. We teach the Progressive first by having him learn fifty or more words from the cards before he is given the book. You can make those cards yourself by printing the words on cardboard, large enough to be read across the room. We also print a word of two or more letters on the board for spelling. Not more than three letters for the first half year. We ask the children to spell this word frequently and take the words from their reading lesson. When it is time for their spelling the word is erased and they spell from memory. In this way they learn the letters rapidly although they do not associate them with reading. After a child has learned a few letter sounds to make a beginning, we teach the families for blend work, beginning with the easier ones, as "at, in, on, an, ake, ike," etc. With the sounds he has already learned we try to have him blend words that end in these endings, like "man, pan, cake, bake." If he can't seem to think of words, ask him questions to bring out these words: "What is papa?" "Man." "What do I wash dishes in?" "Pan." We do not print these words as they are for sound instead of for sight. Later he will find them out for himself.

But we do print the families and letter sounds, constantly keeping them before him until mastered. I put the new family in colored chalk usually.

My second grade this year were very quick to find out words of four and five syllables for themselves if I separated them as I wrote them on the board.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

HELLO, girls: You won't get scolded this month because I am on my vacation and not in a serious or scolding mood. Vacations are not supposed to be serious, you know. Running true to vacation form you will, doubtless, hear from me like this: "While on my vacation I met a handsome young man of 86 with a beautifully varnished wooden leg and a wonderful brown glass eye. How can I tell if he loves me?" Or, "He gave me three peppermint wafers, doesn't that prove that he loves me?"

Now see what your letters have done to me. I need a vacation.

MERLE, W. Va.—You are rather young to contemplate marriage but circumstances have much to do with it. Perhaps it would be well for you to marry, but wait until he can buy a home for you instead of just promising to buy it. Promises are all very well but very poor shelter.

OPAL, Missouri.—If he doesn't love you, he doesn't and that's all there is to it. Renewing a dead love is rather a hopeless task. Forget him and you will be much happier.

OHIO FLOWER, Ohio.—A Christmas gift of a box of chocolates from a boy to a girl is no indication of love. It's largely a habit. Don't give him a present next Christmas. It will look too much like "paying back."

MAUD, Michigan.—Why do you think people are looking at you and watching your every move? You may be quite important but not so important as that. Before you appear in public be sure there is nothing the matter with your personal appearance, hair, clothing, shoes, etc., and then forget about yourself. (2) Read what has been said to bobbed haired girls elsewhere in this column and profit by their experience. Of course if your hair is very thin it might grow better if it were bobbed. Talk it over with your father and don't go against his wishes. Fathers, after all, are entitled to a certain amount of respect and obedience.

ROSEBUD, Paradise, Kans.—Guardians are guardians and unless yours is cruel to you you can do nothing, and I don't believe that keeping a girl of sixteen from dances could be called cruelty. There's plenty of time for dances. If you have beautiful long hair you should be glad that they won't let you comb it in hideous ear puffs. It will look much better combed back in a simple manner, besides, ears are in style once more.

AUBURN HAIR, New York.—What do I think of your marriage? I think it is a terrible mistake or else a big fib. Rather inclined to think it is the latter. A girl of fourteen married to a man of thirty-eight does sound a bit unreasonable, and in New York, too. You read too many novels.

BROWN EYES, Oklahoma.—It was quite proper to ask if he received your letter but don't do it the second time. If you feel the least bit piqued at his behavior, don't call him up next time you are in the city, or else call a short time before your train leaves when there will be no time for him to see you. That will be a blow to his pride.

BERTHA, Nebraska.—If girls with lovely long hair are so foolish as to have it bobbed they've just got to wait until it grows again and I've read somewhere that hair grows at the rate of half an inch a month. Figure it out for yourself.

TWO MADCAPS, Mississippi.—Two more bobbed but sorry misses. My dears, if I knew how to make your hair grow real fast and curly I'd have the swellest hairdressing establishment ever and spend my spare time clipping coupons and figuring out my income tax. I've never tried it but I should think a diet of corkscrews ought to make the hair grow curly, and corkscrews are so cheap now. You try it first and tell me how it works. (2) You are too young to have boy callers unless they come during the day to play tag with you. No evening parties or dances for you, either, though I don't object to you having freckles.

WILMA, Oklahoma.—I can't tell you how to regain the love of a man, and if I could, would you really want him back again? If, as your fiance, he is so ready to believe false stories about you, he'd be a poor sort of a husband. A husband should have the utmost faith in his wife, just as a wife should have faith in her husband.

ADAH, N. Y.—Your letter reminds me of the fleas:

"So, naturalists observe, a flea
Has smaller fleas that on him prey;
And these have smaller still to bite 'em,
And so succeed ad infinitum."

Sweetheart No. 1 gets cross and jealous because No. 2 walks home with you from a dance. No. 2 gets cross and jealous because No. 3 walks home with you from the village, and doubtless No. 3 wouldn't like it if No. 4 should smile at you, and so ad infinitum—like the fleas. No. 1 really had the most cause to be jealous, since he was your "steady," but if you don't care for him, why bother with him any longer? I expect, though, you'll marry him and then write me a pitiful letter telling me of your jealous husband. Don't expect sympathy from me then.

DEWDROP, Texas.—Write to ask him to call and bring your letters and photo and get his in return.

MARY, Kentucky.—Legally you are entitled to a divorce. I know what I'd do in your place, but you'll have to decide for yourself.

TWO RUBES, N. Y.—It seems to you very smart to deceive your parents and then adopt as a motto, "What they don't know won't worry them," but take care you don't have to revise it to, "What you do know will worry you."

FOXY, Minn.—Lots of girls would be glad to have a home and a father to protect them even if they did have to work and weren't allowed many privileges. There's plenty of time yet for pleasures. It isn't as if your good time automatically stopped when you were 20, or 30, or 40, or even older. I expect to go on enjoying myself just as long as I live; in fact, I have a much better time now than when I was eighteen. It's a wonder I'm not roundshouldered from the responsibilities I insisted upon carrying then. Now I realize that the world managed to get along before I brightened it by my presence and that it will continue to roll along after I've departed hence—wherever that is—so I enjoy each day as it comes.

BLUE EYES, Ga.—Wait seven years before asking my opinion of your marriage. By that time you'll know enough to decide for yourself, if you are ever going to know enough.

VIRGINIA, W. Va.—I shouldn't wonder a bit if the seventeen-year-old boy really does love you. Children so often form sincere attachments for older persons.

O. N. WOOD, Maine.—Ever so many girls of sixteen think they are in love with men of thirty. Mine was thirty-two and I thought he was the only man in the world. It's a stage we all have to go through, like having measles and mumps and wanting to do your hair up (or have it bobbed) and usually no more dangerous. By and by when you are thirty-five and older you'll be falling in love with boys of twenty, so there you are. We are a funny proposition, we women, 'most as peculiar as the men. Be in love if you want to, but don't marry him.

M. B., Mo.—If you are deceiving your father you are doing wrong.

THELMA, Virginia.—If you love him "too much to give him up" in spite of his unfaithfulness, probably you will marry him and hope for the best. But I hope that if you do marry him you will continue to love him too much to be made wretchedly unhappy by his known faults. Consider well and be sure you won't regret it, before you take the fateful plunge.

Next month I hope to have heaps of interesting experiences to tell you.

THE SEWING SCREEN IN USE.

Planning Clothes for Fall and Winter Wear

By Clara Huntington

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

WITH the fall sewing piled high, the children to make ready for school days, the house to be cleaned of summer dust, fall pickling, the three meals a day and the care of baby, besides the "regular" house work, what if mother should join the union with Saturday half holiday and Sundays off? Well, mother must stay by her 16-hour daily job, for the future prosperity of her family is the dearest thing in life to her, and her work can never be called done just because the "shutting down" hour has arrived, or because her remaining strength tells her she has worked hours enough.

But even if mother doesn't strike, don't overlook the fact that she must have assistance. The family sewing and mending adds evening hours of work to an already full day, and both boys and girls must make it their job to help. Boys can patch their chore clothes, sew on buttons, and mend stockings, and it will teach them consideration. Girls can take the finer stitches and should learn how to cut and put a simple garment together. When they help mother about the sewing they are also learning to help themselves.

CAPE AND HAT FOR SCHOOL WEAR.

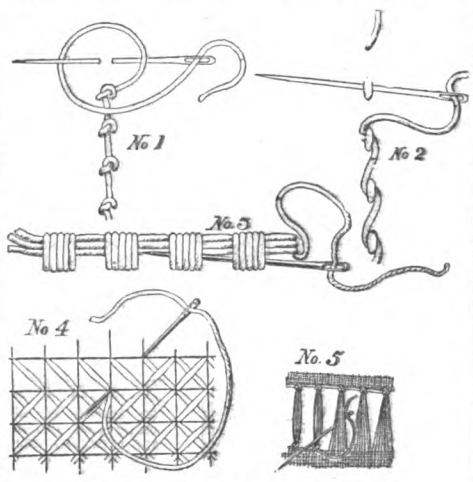
September seems to announce the commencement of all kinds of work, with the sewing uppermost. No matter how carefully plans are made, school days seem to catch us with dresses rather faded and outgrown, and with suits and blouses that son doesn't feel just right in when it comes to a matter of wearing them to school. Shoes look a little kicked out and stockings tell tales of tree-climbing and briers.

As the first day of school is rather a dress-up occasion, let us take time by the forelock and decide what can be done with the worn garments, and what among the new things it is most desirable to buy.

There are several weeks in the fall when ginghams for the girls and khaki for the boys provide ample warmth with a sweater to slip into during the cooler parts of the day. If I could have my own way, the outer garment for girls in the schoolroom in winter time would be an attractive tire with long sleeves, the teacher setting the fashion. Cut with round necks and finished with Dutch collars and tied back with half-sashes, all made as nearly alike as possible, a group of girls wearing such tires would make a lovely picture. They could be made from small figured calicoes and worn over a simple woolen dress that would last all winter. Boys would be less fortunate, for we can't put tires on young America.

Fabric and color combinations will offer some relief in trying to prolong the usefulness of ginghams during the remaining warm weather. Where the fronts of plaid or checked gingham waists are worn or stained, and the skirt is good, match some color in the gingham to plain material and put on a new waist, using collar and cuffs cut from parts of the old waist. Often a dress must be lengthened at the waist-line, leaving a space that shows the dress is somewhat faded. Cover this by using a sash made of different colored gingham in a dull shade. The sash material may be introduced into the collar and cuffs. Straight dresses that have faded fronts can be saved by setting in a broad, straight, panel front and back. On the shoulder seams it may extend to within one inch of the armhole, and from there straight to the bottom. These same ideas may be carried out in new materials.

Khaki for both boys and girls can be restored by washing and then rinsing in first a clear water, and then in a water colored with prepared dark brown dye. See preparation of dye in another column. If khaki is patched or too badly worn, it is economy to buy new and keep the old garment to slip into after school and mornings. Just for school use, a new suit will look well a long time.



It is not at all a question of spending a lot of money on school clothes, but rather a matter of sewing and good taste. Fortunately, frilly things have about disappeared for the present at least. Where a short time ago collars and cuffs were edged with lace, we now see bound edges, and, if anything more, coarse embroidery stitches. The style of children's dresses has changed little, if any, and one can safely follow these three fashions: the straight dress which hangs from the shoulder, and the one with a long waist attached to a gathered straight skirt, both designs being loosely confined at the waist with narrow or wide sashes, the narrow ones being in favor to wear under outside garments. The third style is the blouse and skirt, often made with blouse of plain color and skirt of plaid, which offers an excellent opportunity for making over. The blouse is cut with round, high neck finished with Dutch collar, and opens down the back just far enough to get into. The sleeves are long, either close fitting with smooth cuffs, or slightly loose and gathered into a narrow wristband, which may be decorated with cross-stitch in bright colors. Serge, as usual, is used for practical school dresses. Jersey cloth is also durable and stylish, and is trimmed with the same in contrasting colors. Petticoats have been practically displaced by bloomers which are made from heavy mercerized black cotton cloth. The colored bloomers are worn over knitted underwear and do not require frequent washings. All school dresses must be made with pockets.

Gray mixtures and brownish tones are the most durable colors for boys' winter school suits. Dark blue is becoming for dress-up wear.

Boots and shoes are often a source of wasted money because ill-fitting footwear will not give satisfactory results. Few dealers know much about fitting the foot, and if the shoe does not pinch anywhere they call it a fit. Shoes that are too short and wide, and do not fit the arch, have caused much suffering, not only to the feet but to the whole nervous system. A child is not supposed to know when a shoe is a misfit, but if the child answers "no" to the salesman's question, "Does it hurt?" parents are too likely to buy the shoes without personally seeing to it that the shoe hug the arch, that the widest point of the sole comes directly under the ball joint, that the toes spread when the child stands, and that the shoe be one inch longer than the foot, provided the toe is rounding. The width will usually take care of itself if the other points of fitting are assured. Shoes will frequently "grow" short after being worn a few days. This is because they do not fit, and therefore must be discarded, for they greatly affect a child's nerves, and, consequently, disposition. Children have frequently acquired the habit of turning in their toes because their shoes were too short. This kind of a misfit will cause shoes to break out at the side. If the ball joint of a child's foot becomes red and tender, throw away his shoes, for it is the beginning of a thrown-out joint from which he will suffer all his life.

Capes for School Wear

Capes are much in vogue for all ages, and are particularly useful for fall wear. Later on they must be worn over a heavy sweater or medium-weight coat, as they are sleeveless and cannot be relied on by themselves for warmth in cold weather. On this page is pictured one of the popular models which can be cut from description. Cut a shallow yoke from a high-necked waist pattern. Cut the bottom part of cape straight and about two and one-quarter yards wide. Plait or gather the top edge. Pin the yoke on the child. On holding the gathered edge to the yoke it will be found that a little more length is required on each side, which is allowed by bringing the yoke edge a little over the gathered edge, front and back. The fullness is about evenly distributed, except that a few inches is left ungathered at the center back. Line the yoke and hem the bottom. In cutting the armholes be sure they are not too low for if too low the cape will pull up from the bottom when the arms are used. Also be sure they are cut well forward. Instead of a collar, the neck is finished with a straight scarf eight to ten inches wide, which is made from a plaid material, lined, and finished with a wool fringe at the ends. Make the scarf, leaving the lining unfastened for the neck-length at the center of one side. Slip the neck edge of the cape between the outside and lining of scarf and sew both sides in place which makes a neat finish.

SOME STITCHES THAT TRIM.

The hat worn with the cape has a brim to match the scarf, and the crown is made of the cape material. It is not difficult to make one of these hats. Cut a strip of cloth long enough to go around the head, measuring well over the forehead and back of the head. The strip is wide enough to extend to the top of the head. Sew the ends together, gather the top edge to a point, and finish with a covered button. Cut a heavy cotton lining just the same, except that it is one inch narrower. Join the ends, gather the top edge and sew it to a circle of the material measuring two and one-half inches across. This makes a flat lining under the button. Cut two bias strips slightly circular for the brim, one of plaid and one from the plain material. Line the plain one with soft buckram, baste well and stitch in parallel rows one-half inch apart. On the buckram side sew small-sized, pliable hat-wire crossways about four inches apart. Put the crown on, roll the brim by the wires, place it around the crown and decide on depth. Trim outside edge, turn ends of wire back one-half of an inch. Trim the outer edge of the plaid facing to match the edges of the plain part, but it should be left a little wider to allow for roll. Sew the two outer edges together. Baste the plain side to the crown with seam inside, holding edges even, and stitch. Join ends of inside and outside parts of brim in a straight seam from crown to outer edge. Open seam and press flat. Turn outer edge together and baste evenly. Baste the two parts of the brim together, beginning just back from the outer edge. Make several rows, always working from the outside. Sew the inside edge of plaid seam to seam with the crown, then turn under the edge of the lining and fell evenly. Press outer edge and stitch just back from the edge. Long-wristed woolen gloves are worn to match the cape.

For the Infant

Our talk on clothes for children would not be complete without mentioning the garments to be prepared for the expected stranger, and what not to do is as much to the point as things to be done, because all the superfluous lengths and fullness, ruffles, fluting and tucking have been eliminated from the modern layette. In the days when an infant's dress was supposed to reach the floor as it laid in arms, no consideration was given to the dragging weight of long dresses and petticoats, and often both these garments were marvels of handwork such as is seldom seen nowadays, unless done by the convent-taught workers. In paying respect to the little one, you were supposed to give due attention to its dress.

All this, however, belongs to the past, and for some years considerable attention has been given to garments that allow full freedom for unrestricted movement of body and limbs. When once the changes and modifications began, the pinning blanket and tiny crocheted socks were discarded for the fine cashmere or silk and wool stockings that come well over the knees and are pinned to the diaper, for baby must be kept warm and still have a chance to kick. The tight belly-band which prevented rupture in case baby cried long and hard, was in itself found to be the source of tears, and certainly they must have hurt the tender muscles. In its place is worn the jersey band which slips on over the feet, providing warmth, physical comfort, opportunity for development of abdominal muscles that prevents rupture, and results in a marked decrease in throwing up milk. There is another style of band which has shoulder straps and is put on over the head. Over this is worn the long-sleeved shirt which should be amply large, of fine texture and partly made of wool. Bands must be pinned to diaper if at all inclined to slip and lie in ridges, which seldom happens if made of all or part wool and plenty large. A six-inch wide strip of flannel holds the navel dressing in place and should be pinned just tight enough for this purpose. After the navel is entirely healed, this band is discarded. It must always be remembered that infants are in a reclining position and subject to colds and drafts; also that they must have plenty fresh air, so judgment must be used according to weather and climate. For the first month baby needs only its band, shirt, diaper, stockings and outside plain slip, the latter not being really necessary. This month is only a matter of eating, sleeping and keeping warm with baby, but later on when she becomes a little more self-assertive, the petticoat and slip will be necessary, also an outside sack or wrapper if the house is cold or unevenly heated. The petticoat is a plain sleeveless slip which opens at both shoulders, and is gored under the arms. Wool or outing flannel is suitable material. The slip is a plain affair made of fine soft material, with a narrow lace edge at neck and sleeve-bands.

Bird's-eye cloth makes excellent diapers as it is soft and absorbent and does not crease when wet. The 24-inch width cut into squares with narrow hem allowance is a convenient size. Old soft table-cloths, or two old napkins sewed together, make the very best first diapers. Outing flannel is another material much favored. The number that should be made depends entirely on the facilities for frequent washings. Do not pin diapers tightly, and in putting on, place the folded diaper in position and roll the infant onto it, rather than lifting by the heels and placing the diaper under. Observation of a large number of cases has proved that lifting an infant by the heels may injure the soft spine and cause complaints later on when the child gets on its feet.

An ordinary clothes-basket makes all to be desired as the foundation for a bassinet. It is covered inside with some material to keep out drafts; the outside may be covered or not, de-

Scientist Discovers Skin Laxative

WOMEN, give thanks to Mr. McGowan—an English scientist, scarce out of his twenties. His discovery means that a beautiful skin is now a mere matter of personal cleanliness; made beautiful while you wait!

The element he has found physics one's skin. Its action is gentle, but positive. Its use is delightful, for it is applied outside. Put it on; slip into your easy chair; in less than an hour the skin pores move. Impurities clogging your facial pores are instantly banished; even the pores themselves are contracted and rendered invisible. The new bloom of color and velvety texture of skin are simply marvelous.

Cleanses Pores and Beautifies Any Complexion in Forty Minutes!

The scientific name of this new element is Terra-derma-lax. It is blended into a soft, plastic clay of exquisite smoothness. Place it on the face like a poultice. Soon, you feel this laxative working on every inch of skin. In half an hour wipe off with a towel—and with it every blackhead, pimple-point, speck and spot of dirt. That's all. Terra-derma-lax must be fresh, so every jar is dated and shipped direct.

AMAZING OFFER! NO LABORATORY CHARGE FOR FIRST JAR!

Prescription cost of this marvelous beauty clay has been $5. But so all may try it, just one jar (full size) will be sent for $1.95—the bare cost of materials, plus postage! See offer below:

With each jar (two months' supply) comes McGowan's own directions. Pay postman the small, actual cost charges of $1.95, plus the few cents postage on delivery; or if you expect to be out, $2 bill enclosed will bring jar prepaid. In either case, anyone whose skin and complexion do not receive instantaneous and astonishing benefits, may have money back.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

E. L. W., Kentucky.—We do not think the laws of any of the states of the U. S. prohibit marriages between second and third cousins; some of the states have laws prohibiting marriages between first cousins, but we do not think the laws of your state prohibit such marriages.

MRS. E. D. S., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the husband survives his wife he is entitled to receive from her estate one-third in value of all the legal and equitable estates in real property possessed by the wife at any time during the marriage, which have not been sold on execution, or other judicial sale, and to which the husband has made no relinquishment of his right, and that he cannot be deprived of this right by will. We think an examination of the instruments executed by yourself and husband would be necessary to determine whether he has legally released his interest in your real estate.

M. E. M., Georgia.—We do not think your will can be probated during your lifetime; we think it can be filed for safe keeping, but the usual practice is not to file a will until after the death of the testator.

C. W. G., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man or woman, leaving no will, and leaving more than one child, the surviving husband or wife, in addition to homestead rights, if any, and certain small allowances, is entitled to receive one-third of the estate, after payment of debts and expenses, the balance of the estate going in equal shares to decedent's children, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share.

MRS. M. V. W., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of an unmarried man, leaving no will, and leaving no lineal descendants, his estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go to his collateral relations, being of the blood of the first purchaser, whether such decedent derived the estate from the ancestor by descent, or by gift, devise, or settlement, but where the person last seized is the first purchaser, or the blood of such purchaser is extinct, then the estate would go to the collateral relation capable of inheriting the estate whether of the maternal or paternal line, with collateral relations of the half blood inheriting equally with those of the whole blood.

MRS. G. P., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that children have no interest in their parent's property during the lifetime of such parent, they, of course, have inheritance rights in their parents' estates upon the death of such parents, unless cut off by will; we do not think they acquire any interest in their father's property upon the death of the mother.

MRS. J. W. B., North Carolina.—If the present owners of the land you mention in Georgia went into possession of the same a long period of years ago, we think they could hold same by adverse possession in case there was a defect in their original deed to same, as under the laws of that state we think adverse possession gives good title to real estate after a lapse of 20 years, except as against the state and as against persons under disability.

N. F. P., Pennsylvania.—We do not think that the laws of Alabama, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas or Washington prohibit marriages between first cousins. (2) We think the consent of parents is necessary for the marriage of females under 18 years of age in the above named states except Kentucky and Rhode Island where such consent should be procured if the female is under 21 years of age.

R. B., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your adoption was a legal adoption under the proper judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, you should receive a child's share of your adopted parents' estates unless cut off by will, but if your adoption was not a legal one, we do not think you would have any inheritance right in their estates, unless some provision is made for you by will.

MISS M. J. C., Virginia.—We are of the opinion that the laws of your state require that the witnesses to a will be present at the time of the execution and that they sign as witnesses in the presence of the testator and in the presence of each other, but that they need not be informed as to the terms of the will nor are they required to have any knowledge whatever as to the disposition of the property provided for by its terms.

MRS. V. S., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, his surviving widow, after payment of debts and expenses, would be entitled to receive the real or personal estate, or both, to the aggregate value of five thousand dollars, in addition to her exemption allowed by law, and if such estate exceeds in value the sum of five thousand dollars, the surviving widow would be entitled to the sum of five thousand dollars absolutely, to be chosen by her from the real or personal estate, or both, and in addition thereto shall be entitled to one-half of the remaining real and personal estate, it being provided by the intestate act that these provisions as to said five thousand dollars shall apply only to cases of actual intestacy, entire or partial, and not to cases where the surviving widow shall elect to take against the will of the deceased husband.

MRS. J. L., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the signature of the husband is necessary for the conveyance of the real estate of the wife.

MRS. H. McG., Arizona.—If your debtor refuses to pay your claim against him, we think it will be necessary for you to bring a suit against him to enforce payment of the same; if, however, he has no property, it will be difficult to collect your claim.

MRS. R. C. McM., Iowa.—If, as you state, you have executed and delivered a warranty deed for your interest in the real estate formerly belonging to your deceased father, we do not think you can now recover your share of the property, unless such deed was procured from you in some illegal manner.

R. W., California.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and more than one child, his widow, in addition to her community rights and exemptions, would be entitled to a one-third interest in his separate estate, after payment of debts and expenses.

F. L., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that children may be disinherited by will, provided the will is legally drawn and executed, and provided testator possesses testamentary capacity, and provided no undue influence is exercised upon him.

MRS. O. C., Alabama.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the payment of the note you mention can be enforced against any property the maker or endorser of said note may own except such property as is exempt by law from levy under execution, but that such payment cannot be enforced against the property of others, even if such property is in possession of the debtor, provided the owner of such property can clearly establish his claim to the property by the proper evidence; we think that if the wife of the maker of the note also signed same, she would be liable for the payment in the same manner as her husband.

W. T., Pennsylvania.—We think that if the organizers of the company you mention conspired to defraud the stockholders thereof, they would be liable to punishment for their acts upon the proper conviction of such conspiracy charge; we think they would also be liable for civil damages in the proper action brought for the recovery of such damages.

L. B., Wisconsin.—We think that if the contract under which you purchased the books you mention provided that you should have the privilege of returning same without any charge for same to you in case you elected to do so, you would be relieved from payment for same, in case you returned the books within the time specified and in all other respects fulfilled your part of the contract; we think, however, it will be necessary for you to fully establish these facts in any action brought against you to enforce payment for these books.

M. R., Illinois.—We think that if the executor of your brother's estate refuses to pay your claim, it will be necessary for you to file same, and bring an action against the estate to enforce the payment thereof; we think you should employ a local attorney to attend to this for you.

MRS. E. C., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your uncle left no will, and left no child nor descendant, the real estate which came to him by descent from an ancestor would go to his surviving widow for the term of her natural life, with remainder over to his brothers and sisters of the same blood as the ancestors from whom he inherited such property or their legal representatives, whether such brothers and sisters be of the whole or half blood of the intestate. We do not think the expenses of the widow's last sickness would be a charge against this remainder interest in such real estate.

MRS. O. S. P., Washington.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a wife has no interest in her husband's separate real estate, if the same is not used as a homestead, during his lifetime.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

B. R., Ottumwa, Iowa.—To copyright a short story will cost you the sum of one dollar. Write to the Register of Copyrights, Library of Congress, Washington, D. C., and ask that an application for copyright and other particulars be sent you.

M. D., Cardenas, N. C.—It is not education that will get you into the movies so much as some dramatic ability or training, and the possession of features which will register well on the screen. Probably you know people of whom it can be said "they do not take good pictures"—well, it is just people of this kind who are forever barred from motion picture stardom. One must photograph well, and beauty of form or feature is not as essential as is the type of face that will register clearly and the type of temperament which, either through training or natural development, is capable of depicting emotion of various sort in the silent drama of the screen. To "get into the movies" means that if you first have the qualities above described, you can get a start as an "extra" in some large production where a crowd, a mob or some busy street scene is necessary to be screened. These jobs as extras are obtained either through direct application to motion picture studios in the big movie centers, or by being hired through agents who in these same centers have the work of supplying any number of extras for any sort of screen drama upon demand. You will see, then, that the main requisite is to be on the spot and gain some elementary footing in a studio where, if you have the features and talent you may be noticed by a watchful director and pushed forward. This has been the past career of practically all the present stars except those who went to the screen from acquired reputations on the legitimate stage. Hollywood, California; Chicago, Illinois, and New York City and its outlying districts, are now the chief centers of motion picture studio activities. You can gain addresses of the leading companies, as well as much other information that should prove helpful to your ambition, from the advertising columns and news pages of the motion picture magazines. Read these carefully. You certainly cannot make a start in the movies while in North Carolina—and your first step will be to get on the trail of your nearest studio where you might get a chance before the camera.

W. K. P., Rougemont, N. C.—You would not attempt to build a house without tools, or to study medicine without a knowledge of anatomy, yet you wish to begin a course in short story writing before you have any mastery of the English language, its spelling and its grammar. Everything needs to be done in order and you would be but wasting money now in taking what you call a "corospondent" course in story "writeing." You can, we are sure, by home study and proper and persistent reading learn to spell correctly and write grammatical sentences. When you have accomplished this and so supplied yourself with working tools, it will be time enough to apprentice yourself to the story-writing game and to take a correspondence course in plot-building and development.

F. L. B., Tarboro, N. C.—Wrapping your ice in several layers of newspaper will retard its melting, although you must expect that this will also lessen its cooling power in your refrigerator. The placing of your ice box in a cool place, as in a cellar, will also help you save ice.

D. E., Norton, Va.—We think the training given in the electrical schools of the U. S. Navy to be a valuable one. It is possible for an apprentice seaman in the navy to obtain certain transfers, although these changes take time and are not always easy to obtain—depending upon conditions in the service. Changes are being made in the navy's recruiting requirements through reduction in personnel, etc., and we could not tell you definitely what the present shortest period of enlistment is, although we believe it to be two years. Write to the Navy Department, Washington, D. C., for further particulars and the address of your nearest recruiting station—which is doubtless Newport News.

H. D. D., Missouri.—A position as railway mail clerk would be obtained through the U. S. Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C. Write to this address for particulars regarding future examinations.

E. S., Washington, Pa.—The old rhyme about choosing a wedding day runs:

"Marry Monday for wealth,
Tuesday for health,
Wednesday the best day of all;
Thursday for crosses,
Friday for losses,
Saturday, no luck at all."

But we think the happiness of the "happy day" depends more upon the bride and groom than upon the day of the week. An article on "Wedding Superstitions" appeared on page three of the June, 1921, issue of COMFORT.

G. C., Bartley, Nebr.—In most of the hospitals of which we have knowledge your eighth grade certificate would register you as having sufficient education to be received as a "probationer." Various institutions have various rules regarding the entrance to training school of would-be nurses. You should apply to the superintendents of these different hospitals direct.

I. N. M., Peru, Ind.—The Bureau of Standards of the Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C., has lately reissued what the Bureau calls Circular No. 120. It is entitled, "Construction and Operation of a Simple Home-Made Radio Receiving Outfit." This circular describes the construction, from easily-procured materials, of a radio equipment which will receive communications on wave-lengths of from 200 to 600 meters and from high-power stations within fifty miles. The Bureau states that the total cost need not exceed $10. Copies may be obtained of this circular by sending five cents to the Sup't of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C.

FRECKLES, Minnesota.—Surely a girl of fifteen may go to dances with her brother unless her parents object to her going to any dances at all. (2) It makes no difference who is the first to speak when you meet this young man on the streets of your town.

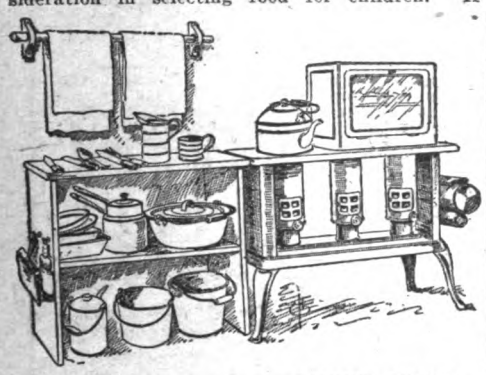
HOT SCHOOL LUNCHES

By Estelle Garland



Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

MANY school children who live in rural districts are handicapped by eating a cold lunch for their midday meal. On the other hand, it is quite beyond the possibilities of most mothers to provide other than a cold lunch without cooperation from teacher and child. What to put into the school lunch-box has ever been a serious problem to mothers, and it will be a welcome relief to enter into some daily school program whereby so vital a requisite as a hot school lunch for her children can be gained.

It is sometimes argued that a hearty nourishing meal at night makes up for an unsatisfactory lunch at noon; but this is not so with children, for children in school are exercising both mind and body between the morning and night meal, and for this reason require more, instead of less, food. A properly nourished child is by far less likely to contract contagious disease, and if he does fall sick his chances for recovery are far greater than with the child who is undernourished.

Bodily requirements must be taken into consideration in selecting food for children. If healthy, they have good appetites, but if they are allowed to eat the wrong things, the time may come when they cannot eat the right things. Growing children have certain special needs in the way of food. Like adults, they must be supplied with that which is necessary to sustain health and strength, but, unlike them, they should be given also that which is necessary for growth and development. No amount of care and good food in later years can make up for the lack of right food for the growing child.

What the Hot School Lunch Is

The hot lunch is that part of the noon meal which is prepared at school. Its purpose is to add something that will render the lunch brought from home more complete. If a lunch-box contains good bread and butter sandwiches, a baked apple to be eaten with a cookie or piece of sponge cake, the addition of a hot vegetable stew made at school provides a well-balanced meal. Suggestions for other combinations, and dishes that may be prepared at school are given in a subsequent section of this article.

Concrete Results of the Hot School Lunch

The advantages of a properly conducted school lunch are many and far reaching. A higher standard of school work is obtained through food that builds up muscles, carries on body processes and supplies heat and energy for work and play. The undernourished child does not maintain a high rank in scholarship, and far too frequently his deportment is affected by his physical lack. Every teacher who cooperates to introduce in her school the hot noon lunch finds in the improved scholarship, deportment and health of her pupils an ample reward for her extra effort, besides the consciousness of having rendered a mighty service.

As all schoolroom work is done by the tap of the bell, so will the pupils file in order from their seats when the lunch is ready, first by the table laid with the dishes where each one helps himself, and then to the table where the hot food is being served. After being helped, each pupil quietly takes his seat again, opens his lunch-box and waits until the tap of the bell announces that all are served and seated, and that eating may begin. In no event must any pupil commence eating before the bell taps. Here the teacher sets the example of slow eating and thorough chewing of the food, and under her supervision better table manners are encouraged. When the hot course is finished, at the tap of the bell the pupils begin their dessert, or the eating of whatever else they may have been provided with. There is no incentive to hurry, as no pupil is excused from his desk until all have finished. Mothers find that when a particular dish has been prepared at school from which all are served alike, that many peculiar food habits are overcome, for the group spirit allows no personal preferences. The hot school lunch is teaching self-discipline and self-control.

The teacher soon finds that the school lunch affords an enjoyment not found through any other channel, and together with the children senses a growing party spirit which is wholesome and lessens monotony. One of the most marked results has been a better school attendance. A certain amount of conversation and laughter stimulates digestion and prevents hurrying, and under the leadership of the teacher should be indulged in. A plan whereby each child may tell a story or repeat a joke once a week during the lunch period may be successfully worked out. Original rhymes and verse, prepared in advance, make excellent entertainment. "Table talk" of this character sharpens wits and encourages wholesome rivalry. Short stories of travel by the teacher, or any narrative which takes the children into unknown lands will serve as a basis for conversation and place the narrator in the light of a teacher-superior. However interested the children may be in the conversation, the time of bell tap for rising must not be extended, because it will take from the time to be spent out-of-doors. Days that are too stormy to play in the open would make them an exception to this rule. In case a narrative is too long for one period, it is left off at an interesting point in the story and continued the following noon.

If only for the educational value, the hot school lunch would be well worth the effort, for not only does it teach food values, practical working principles, punctuality and alertness, but it teaches that great lesson of service in the sense of assistance and kindness to each other. The hot school lunch gives an opportunity to develop the initiative in a child and to encourage competition.

Neatness is taught by example in many ways, such as clean hands, a square of oilcloth to spread over the desk while eating, so that nothing shall remain to soil papers and books. After lunch, the paper napkin may be used to brush the crumbs into an empty dish before folding the oilcloth away under the desk, where the lunch-box is also kept until time for going home.

Keeping tin food containers sanitary with plenty soap-suds and boiling water is a valuable lesson to both boys and girls. Rivalry in neat dish-washing will soon develop.

Children are very imitative and usually regard their teacher as one that can be safely followed in matters of form, and for this reason her manner of eating will become the standard for the schoolroom lunch. The teacher prepares her lunch at her desk the same as the pupils. She will eat slowly, taking care there is no clatter or noisy eating. Lunch is eaten in order, with the dessert last. Food is carried to the mouth with either a fork or spoon. Bread, cake or doughnuts are broken in small pieces before being carried to the mouth. As it is difficult to carry a cupful of water in the hand, the empty cups are set on the desk and two children are assigned to fill them. Water is taken as a drink, and not for washing down partly-chewed food.

Suggestions for Laying Out the Work

In preparing the hot lunch there is considerable detail to be worked out in which the teacher acts as organizer and leader. The workers may be formed into companies of soldiers with their teacher as captain. The change from study, the group work which may become contests at times, and the anticipation of the good lunch to come, makes helpers willing if not eager to take part in the work.

At the beginning of the week the helpers are appointed in small groups for the various duties, both boys and girls. Among the children will be found those who already have some knowledge of the work to be done, and they may be chosen to take charge of certain parts of the work with the younger or less experienced to assist. Each Monday morning will find the names of a list of helpers tacked in a conspicuous place where all may read, and it provides considerable fun to see who has been "drafted" into the hot lunch service.

Both boys and girls should be assigned to all parts of the work and in groups. Begin the preparation of vegetables or other foods necessary for the hot dish in the morning or forenoon recess. See that the cooking utensils are in order and laid out. Have the oil-stove ready for use and matches in place. Have the serving dishes, forks and spoons placed on the serving table and protected from dust by a cloth thrown over them. Paper napkins are folded and in a pile with dishes. Excuse such pupils as have to make the final arrangements a few minutes before the lunch hour so that it may be promptly served. Have plenty clean drinking water.

Have water and soap ready for the children to wash their hands. Each one has his own towel which hangs by a loop on a numbered hook. Children file by the serving table in the same order they are seated when studying, and at the tap of the bell when the lunch is finished, all rise, pick up their dishes, and in the same order file past the dish-washing table and deposit them to be washed. The children are here excused for the noon recess, except those who are "on duty" to wash dishes and put them away. Put all equipment in order for the following day. Carry the garbage where it can be buried so as not to attract flies. Care of schoolroom is assigned to the children physically fit to do it. The duties of each group are written on a sheet of paper and posted in a place convenient to their work.

In time, as the various details are mastered, a sewing class can be started for the purpose of making holders, dish-cloths and dish-wipers. Butcher's aprons, such as are worn by the girls in picture, can be made at school. Boys, as well as girls, will wear them in any capacity that brings them in contact with the food.

Equipment for the School Lunch

A modest beginning is the surest way to success in the hot school lunch, for the rural teacher with her many classes a day has not sufficient time to take on more work than she sees she can assign to others under her guidance. A cup of hot cocoa makes a practical beginning as it entails fire, hot water, cooking, serving, dish-washing and putting things to rights. A dish of hot oatmeal with milk may be the next step, and from this to cream or vegetable soups. A vegetable stew or a chowder, a large baking dish of custard, baked apples, pea and bean soups, or cooking prunes are some of the possibilities of advanced workers. Making molasses candy during a stormy noon hour is quite possible as is also popping corn.

Cooperation between parents and teacher is necessary for proper food equipment, and there are many ways of bringing it about. In some sections the school board finances the hot dish for the school lunch. In some communities interested patrons donate certain foods from their abundance. Another way is for each child to take home a list which states the kind of food required for the coming week, and also their proportionate share. Still another way is for each child to bring his or her share in cash which goes into a lump sum with which to buy supplies. Some schools have given community entertainments and used the proceeds for their school lunches.

A three-burner oil-stove with a one- and a two-burner oven is the largest outlay, but it will last for years with ordinary care. Each child brings the price for his individual cup, plate, soup bowl, large cereal dish, knife, fork, teaspoon and dessert spoon. Buying them all alike is better than each one bringing from home, as they "stack" better and give a neater appearance on the shelves. A teakettle, large double boiler for cocoa, cereals, etc., oven tins, large soup kettle, and other stew-pans, are necessary equipment. Large lard tins and cracker boxes with tight-fitting covers will keep the mice and dust from the food.

Dry-goods boxes make excellent tables for serving and dish-washing, and give the boys an opportunity to "show the world" what they can do. The girls will see that they are kept covered with clean papers until white oilcloth can be afforded, and they will make curtains to keep the dust from the shelves.

Food for School Children—Hot Lunch Recipes.

Fresh fruit is not obtainable through all the school year in many states, but so long as it is, a special effort should be made to make it a part of school lunch to be eaten raw. When fresh fruit is no longer to be had, a few cents a day will buy dried fruits such as raisins, prunes, figs and dates. These are washed at school and served uncooked in proper portions. The dried fruits must be thoroughly chewed, or not eaten at all. This rule also applies to nuts which are highly beneficial if properly eaten, and not too many at a meal. Neither meat nor cheese is eaten when nuts are served as they contain much the same food elements. Jellies made in season from fresh fruit juices are welcome donations and should be kept in tin boxes.

A sandwich made of good bread and thinly sliced cheese and eaten with a baked tart apple or tart jelly is wholesome and nourishing. Other combinations a child may take from home are thin buttered biscuits, a cup custard and cookies. Buttered bread, a cup of baked beans (which may be warmed in the oven), a little tart jam and sponge cake. Soft scrambled egg sandwich, baked apple and jelly roll. Fresh fish minced fine and mixed with a very little mayonnaise, thin slices of buttered brown bread or entire wheat bread, baked apple and cake. Meat sandwich, lightly pickled beets, gingerbread baked in muffin tins.

Fresh or dried fruit, vegetables, milk or eggs may always be added to the school lunch. Milk should always be a part of a child's daily food. If for any reason a child is obliged to go to school without his breakfast he should report to the teacher and be given milk or bread and milk before commencing to study. In many schools a special provision is made for children who arrive without having taken nourishment.

COCOA.—(Serves 12) Put two quarts of milk on to scald in a double boiler, or in a kettle set in a pan of hot water. In a smaller stew-pan stir together one-half cup of cocoa, one-half cup of granulated sugar and one-fourth teaspoon of salt. Add two cups of boiling water, stir and cook five minutes after it begins to boil. As soon as the milk is scalding hot, add the cooked cocoa and stir well. It is now ready to serve, or it may be kept hot in the pan of hot water, but must not set over the flame where it will continue cooking.

ROLLED OATS.—(Serves 12) Put six cups of rolled oats in the top of a double boiler, add three quarts of cold water and four level teaspoons of salt. Stir well, cover and cook three hours without again stirring. Put cold water in the under part of boiler, but not too much, as the less water the greater head of steam there will be. If there is no double boiler, prepare the rolled oats in a tin pail with tight-fitting cover, and set inside of another pail or kettle that will also cover tightly. Put about three small strips of wood in the bottom of the outside pail to keep the pail containing the oats from the bottom, and keep the water several inches deep. Serve with whole milk.

GRANULATED WHEAT.—Bring two quarts of water to a hard boil with one and a half teaspoons of salt. Very gradually add about two cups of dry granulated wheat, stirring constantly. As the wheat does not always swell the same, a little less wheat may be required or a little more water added. Stir until it appears to be well thickened and white; then add one cup of washed, seedless raisins, pour into the double boiler and cook one hour. Serve with whole milk.

SPLIT PEA SOUP.—(Serves 12) Pick over and wash three cups of peas and soak over night in cold water which should be as deep again as the peas are in the kettle. In the morning they are drained and covered with four and one-half cups of fresh cold water. Slowly bring to a boil, then turn the heat so the peas will only simmer until soft and dissolved, adding boiling water to make up for any that may have boiled away. The cooking will require all the forenoon. Rub through a strainer unless the peas have cooked very fine. Thoroughly cream three rounding tablespoons of butter with three tablespoons of dry flour, and slowly add it to the boiling soup with two and one-half teaspoons of salt, and two teaspoons of sugar. Cook fifteen minutes longer or until ready to serve, then add enough of either hot or cold milk to make the soup the right consistency. This dish is delicious and highly nourishing and should be eaten slowly and with bread.

VEGETABLE SOUP.—(Serves 15) In the morning prepare two cups of carrot, two cups of turnip, two cups of parsnip, two cups of onion, one quart of celery and one quart of potato by washing, peeling and cutting the vegetables into small pieces. Put three-fourths cup of butter in the soup kettle over a slow heat, and when it bubbles add the onion and stir constantly until the onion is partly cooked and lightly browned, then stir in two tablespoons of dry flour until butter and flour are smooth. Clean, sweet beef fat may be substituted for the butter. Add all the prepared vegetables except the potato, two teaspoons of sugar, and three slices of bread toasted brown and dry in the oven. Cover well with boiling water, bring to a boil, then turn the heat where the vegetables will just simmer all the forenoon. When half done, add the potatoes, one-half cup of washed rice and two even teaspoons of salt. Increase the heat until boiling again, then continue to simmer. Keep water at the desired point. Serve abundantly.

FISH CHOWDER.—(Serves 12) Do not undertake the use of fish unless you are absolutely sure it is fresh caught. Interest in the hot lunch is increased by the boys bringing their own catch. Skin and cut about six pounds of fish free from bones and into pieces about two inches square. Pare and slice very thin seven medium-sized potatoes and cover with cold water. Cut a two-inch square of pork into fine pieces and slowly fry out the fat, taking care the blaze is not high enough to cause smoking. Skim out the scraps, and add two sliced onions to the fat and slowly brown. Now add the potatoes, which have been drained, to the fat and onion, and enough boiling water to cover. Cook 15 minutes, then add three level teaspoons of salt and the prepared fish. When the boiling point is again reached, set the chowder back where it will simmer twenty minutes. The fish must not overcook. Add two quarts of hot milk and eight butter crackers broken into small pieces. Set into a pan of hot water until time to serve. More fish may be used. School lunch chowder should not be made from salt fish as it is hard to digest.

BAKED CUSTARD.—(Serves 12) Bring two quarts of milk to a scald. Beat 12 fresh eggs until they are well broken but not foamy. Stir into the eggs one cup of sugar, one level teaspoon of salt and vanilla or grated nutmeg to flavor. Pour into a shallow dish that will hold about three quarts, add the scalding milk and stir well. Set into a pan containing a little hot water and bake in a moderate oven until it thickens but is not hard. A good test is to occasionally insert a knife blade in the center, and as soon as it comes out clean the custard is done.

Asbestos mats should be part of the hot lunch equipment. When placed under a kettle food can be kept hot without cooking, and when cooking food will not catch on the bottom. They are necessary with an oil-stove.

Unclean Hands

Children will be impressed by the following extract, and teachers may find it advantageous to cut it out, paste on a sheet of paper and hang over the handwashing table.

Unclean Hands Are Dangerous

Hands washed in warm soapy water, by actual test and count showed 4,000,000 bacteria in a single washing in warm weather, says the Maine Department of Health; in cold weather this number was enormously increased to 240,000,000 bacteria to a single washing. The increased number in cold weather over hot is due to contamination from coughing and sneezing. Don't forget that dirty hands are not only filthy, but dangerous on account of these millions of germs they carry. Wash often!

An Electric Fish Stop

Up the land streams of the Pacific coast mother salmon rush to lay their eggs. The young salmon coming down enter irrigation ditches by mistake. These ditches are drained. Thus millions of salmon die. Mesh screens have proved futile for they become clogged with drift and waste and the water flowed over the top.

Across the head of the irrigation ditch was placed an electric fish stop. A small water wheel and a magneto furnished the power. Small iron bars were set four feet apart on the front of a device extending down into the water. By a system of wiring and a vibrator to regulate the current the water was charged with electricity for a distance of about four feet from the bass. Fish coming down-stream with the current struck this charged water and immediately whirled around and continued on their way instead of going into the irrigation ditch.

It is stated, the same device can be used to establish rearing ponds in any stream. It can be so placed as to make any size pond desired and the fish would be kept within the charged area. The invention is new and there is every indication that it is a success.

The Hard Milking Cow

SORES often form on the tips of a cow's teats and have to be picked off before milking can be done. This inevitably leads to infection which tends to spread and thicken the lining membrane of the teat so that the cow becomes hard to milk, or garget ensues and the quarter loses its function of milk secretion. The sores are caused by wet and filth from unclean floors and dirty yards, milking with wet hands without first cleaning the teats and effect of flies attracted by oozing milk. When sores start, immerse the teats for five minutes night and morning in hot water containing all the boric acid it will dissolve or in a hot 1-to-1,000 solution of chinosol; then dry the teats and apply a mixture of one part of compound tincture of benzoin and three parts of glycerine. A popular practice with some owners is to insert a new, clean clove in the orifice of the teat between milkings. Carbolized vaseline should first be smeared on the clove. Even then it will be likely to cause infection.

If a milking tube must be used when a cow proves difficult to milk it must always be sterilized by boiling for at least fifteen minutes and should also be smeared with carbolized vaseline before insertion else it will be sure to introduce germs and cause ruinous garget.

Teat plugs of lead, hard rubber or new, hard wood are employed to enlarge the openings of the teats of a hard-milking cow. These, too, must be carefully sterilized or they will infect the teat and make the condition worse or incurable. The best dilator is one of a glove-stretcher pattern which may be bought of any dealer in veterinary instruments. It is inserted in the teat two or three times daily and each time is opened part way, over and over again, to stretch the tissues and enlarge the opening or orifice of the teat. Each day it is opening a little farther until milking becomes easier. If that does not avail, the veterinarian inserts a sterilized teat slitter or bistoury and with it slits down through the stricture or obstruction in four different directions. Then a little milk frequently should be stripped out during the healing process.

RUPTURE.—I have a two-months-old male colt that has a navel rupture. It started small and is gradually getting larger. E. C. K.

A.—Colts, as a rule, outgrow rupture of the navel, but recovery may be hastened by applying tincture of iodine to the lump two or three times a week or keeping pressure upon it by means of a truss of sole leather kept in place by means of a harness partly made of suspender elastic to allow normal action in breathing. If the rupture continues to increase in size, a veterinarian should apply wooden clamps tightly to the sac and loose skin after returning the bowel to place. The clamps, if properly applied, cause sloughing of the enclosed tissues in about 20 days, leaving the breech closed.

OVERHEATED MARE: SUMMER ITCH.—What is wrong with my mare? She stopped sweating and will not sweat until she is in the barn, and not very much then. She has never been foundered or too hot and is in good flesh, (2) My mare rubs and scratches and little lumps come on front legs, and around lower part of neck and body the hair comes off where the lumps have been. G. W. D.

A.—Overheating or heat exhaustion is the common cause of symptoms such as you describe. The mare should do better if you have her clipped and then supply her frequently with drinking water while at work. Do not feed corn. Shade her head and lightly sheet her body if she must work in the sun. So far as possible work her in the cool of the morning and evening and never as the middle one of a three-horse team. (2) Clip the mare and wash clean with a 1-to-100 solution of coal tar dip. Afterwards, when dry, rub compound sulphur ointment into the sore parts as often as found necessary. You can buy the ointment at a drug store. Do not feed this mare corn, green grass or new hay or oats.

ABNORMAL MILK.—I have a cow that freshened last March. Her milk foams and seems all right until the cream forms and then there is a bad odor. Can you tell me the trouble? N. M.

A.—Give the cow at once, slowly and carefully from a long-necked bottle, one pound of Glauber salt dissolved in three pints of tepid water, adding a cupful of molasses. When this physic has operated mix in the feed twice daily a tablespoonful of a mixture of two parts of powdered wood charcoal and one part of granular hypopsulphite of soda. Perfectly scald all milk utensils. See that pure water is used for cooling the milk and washing the vessels. From the local creamery man procure a cream "starter" and take his advice regarding the best temperature at which to set, ripen and churn the cream. Do not feed cottonseed meal for a time, if it has been generously fed in the past.

KNUCKLING.—I have a mule that had one of the leaders cut in one of his hind legs just above the hoof. His foot has been a little bit stiff since then and for the last three months has been drawn so that he cannot straighten it. When he steps he only lets the front part of the hoof touch the ground. What will keep his foot from being drawn up? L. W.

A.—We fear it is too late to remedy the condition described unless you can have a qualified veterinarian perform the operation of tenotomy and direct the after-treatment. The foot and fetlock joint should have been kept in normal position by means of a special shoe and brace during the healing process.

LUMPY MILK.—I have a cow that gives lumpy milk out of one teat and when she does it is usually in rainy weather. She freshened about two months ago and gave five gallons of milk a day. She gives four and one-half now and appears healthy, though she looks rather poor. MRS. E. L. B.

A.—The cow has periodic attacks of mammitis (garget) in the affected quarter. They may be caused by chilling of the udder when the cow lies down on cold, wet ground. Keep her in a well-bedded box-stall in wet weather. At times of attack milk every two hours, massage the quarter well each time and in the evening rub in a mixture of one part each of pure turpentine and fluid extract of poke root and six parts of warm sweet oil or unsalted lard. Also mix in the evening feed, at times of attack, a tablespoonful each of powdered poke root and saltpeter. As tuberculosis is a possibility, it always is well to have the tuberculin test applied by a veterinarian.

POLL EVIL.—Is there any cure for poll evil? I have a four-year-old colt that had it all last spring, caused by striking neck against timber in stall. Her neck healed over and she looked as though she was getting all right. I worked her a day, her neck swelled and broke again. I haven't worked her for several weeks. B. H. W.

A.—Poll evil is a pus-discharging abscess located between and just behind the ears. Dead or diseased tissue is present in this condition and has to be removed by operation before permanent healing will take place. Have that done by a veterinarian. From your description we suspect that the abscess may be on the withers rather than the poll. That has also to be opened up and dead or diseased tissues cut out. Then the wound should be swabbed with tincture of iodine and the cavities packed once daily with a rope of teased oakum saturated with a mixture of equal quantities of turpentine and raw linseed oil. Let a tag of the oakum hang out of the wound and serve as a drain. Apply unsalted lard or cheap vaseline to the skin below the wound to protect it from the turpentine.

POLL EVIL.—I have a mare that has something the matter with her head and throat. Her throat swells just behind the jaws. After awhile the swelling leaves the throat and goes to the top of head, where a hard bone forms. After a time pus forms and discharges. The mare acts as though she could hardly hold her head up. She seems all right in cool weather but shows the above symptoms in the spring and summer, growing worse with every attack. MRS. J. N. L.

A.—We suspect from your description that the mare is afflicted with poll evil which heals for a time and then breaks out again. If so, it will be necessary to have a trained veterinarian operate, but we cannot prescribe the exact treatment necessary without examining the mare. Meanwhile, we should advise you to paint the lump or swelling with tincture of iodine two or three times a week.

GARGET.—I have had three cows with garget in the last three months. Is there anything to keep the remaining herd from taking it? C. H.

A.—You can get rid of the germs at once by isolating all affected cows then thoroughly cleansing, disinfecting and whitewashing the stable, including the floors and gutters. If the floor is of boards or dirt, a concrete floor should be put in as the other materials cannot perfectly be disinfected. For disinfecting purposes use a mixture of one part of compound cresol solution and 30 parts of water. Instantly isolate cow the moment anything goes wrong with her udder and have her milked by one who doesn't handle the other cows. Then cleanse, disinfect and whitewash the stall she has occupied. Cleanse the udder and teats of each cow before each milking. If a milking machine is used it must be sterilized before each milking as directed by the manufacturer. Immunization with mastitis bacterin may help. Consult your veterinarian about that.

CONGESTED UDDER.—I have a cow that will freshen in three months. One quarter of her udder is filled tight but not caked, the rest is just beginning to fill. There doesn't seem to be any injury of any kind. What can be the trouble and what the remedy? MRS. E. L. W.

A.—The condition described is often caused by calves sucking one another's teats when young. That should be instantly stopped when noticed. It is a common cause of garget when a heifer has her first calf. Twice daily strip away a little of any fluid you find in the swollen quarter of the udder. Also massage the quarter thoroughly each time and then rub in a mixture of one part each of pure turpentine and fluid extract of poke root and six parts of camphorated oil.

HEAVES.—I have a mare badly troubled with heaves and have not been able to drive or work her for the past six weeks. She eats well, but seems weak. G. S.

A.—Heaves is incurable when established but the distress may be relieved by letting the mare live on green grass, also feeding oats and bran and in each feed mixing one teaspoonful of a mixture of equal quantities by weight of powdered stramonium leaves and chlorid of ammonia. Do not give any bulky feed at noon if she has to work and do not work her immediately after a meal. In winter feed oat straw and corn-stover instead of hay. Wet all feed with lime-water.

CHOREA.—My dog, four months old, has spells when he doesn't have use of his forelegs in walking, and falling to the ground, his legs jerking. M. P. H.

A.—Chorea (St. Vitus' dance) causes the twitching and is practically incurable. It often follows severe attack of distemper or may be due to intestinal worms. Improvement may result in time if you have the puppy live an out-of-door life and feed it well. Give emulsion of codliver oil twice daily as you would to a child. If worms appear in the droppings or are known to be present, give, every other morning for three doses, two to four teaspoonfuls of a mixture of one-half an ounce each of fluid extract of spigelia, fluid extract of senna, simple syrup and syrup of licorice. This is for round worms of a dog of 40 pounds weight. Lessen or increase the dose according to size of dog.

This Free Book Tells How

Make Your Own Wireless Telephone

WIRELESS telephone receiving sets are comparatively easy to make. The man or boy with any mechanical ability whatever should be able to construct his own receiving apparatus by following the instructions in this book. The different parts that go to make up Radio receivers may now be purchased in almost any hardware or general store. Many of the parts can be made at home. This book shows you how to assemble them so as to make a receiving set which if purchased outright would cost many times what you pay for the component parts. It tells how to make not only one, but several different styles of receivers. It illustrates and describes every step of the process and the instructions are easy to understand because technical terms are avoided wherever possible.

Written by twenty Radio experts, this book is, for its size, one of the most authoritative yet published. It is 7½x5½ inches in size, contains one hundred pages and ninety illustrations and diagrams. Also in the back of the book is the official application blank of the Radio League of America and full instructions as to you becoming a member and receiving a membership certificate and button. We will send you a copy of this book if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you this book telling you how to make your own Wireless Telephone, free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8701.

Gate Top Mesh Purse

THIS is the new "Gate Top" mesh purse with a ten-inch wrist chain, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. "Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

AN ANXIOUS WAITER, Nebraska.—Although there is nothing improper in your having met this escort of yours at the gate, and it would be better to let him call for you at your house when he plans to take you to a dance. (2) Yes; we think 3 A. M. is decidedly too late an hour for a young girl to return from a dance. Do not your parents say the same thing? They should.

B. P., Pueblo, Colo.—The appropriateness of flowers which are sent is often varied as much by season as occasion. For a sick room, it is best to avoid sending such flowers as have a heavy perfume. Daffodils, in their cheerful yellow, would make pleasant and suitable blooms to send in spring, as would yellow crysanthemums in the fall of the year. Carnations we have never thought particularly attractive blossoms and, of course, lilies should be avoided. Often a flowering plant of some kind is welcome in a sick room. You will find your florist will be able to aid your choice.

E. S., Oklahoma.—This man who is a guest at your home would pay for theater tickets, carfares, restaurant checks, etc., in all such cases when he served as your escort during his stay. It would be perfectly proper for you to suggest any entertainment which you thought it pleasant for you both to attend. Your parents, of course would meet other suitable responsibilities and expenses in entertaining this guest aside from the cases where he served alone as your escort or when you both happened to be out together. Of course there are certain courtesies of discretion to be observed—depending upon your guest's financial status and your degree of friendly relationship.

BROWN EYES, Ohio.—A man of thirty-two is not at all too old for a woman of twenty-five to marry. The difference in age is most suitable. (2) Your fiance's jealous tendencies will not be so bad, we think, after he knows he has surely won you and you are bound together "until death do you part." We do not think you need worry about "future trouble" from this feeling of jealousy if you are careful to give no excuse for its exercise. Why not suggest to your fiance the sort of engagement ring you would prefer or tell him that your friends are asking you why you are not wearing one? His love and jealousy together ought to be equal to the price of a most attractive ring. Probably a hint is all he needs and you should not hesitate to give this.

M. N., Concordia, Kans.—If this girl whom you have escorted home asks you to come in for a while, you may accept the invitation if you wish. If the hour is a late one, it would be the better part of courtesy to refuse with thanks. In no event would you enter the house with her unless asked. (2) Yes; if you are on "speaking terms" with this girl, you are entitled to speak up at any time and ask to be able to take her to any evening entertainment. You will never get "better acquainted" by keeping silent or hanging back. The other fellows will be pushing forward, you know, while you may be biting your tongue or making up appropriate phrases in the rear. Step up and get in the race.

A. M., Pueblo, Colo.—Courtesy demands that a birthday gift or one received at any other time should be acknowledged by either spoken or written thanks given as promptly as possible.

BLUE EYES, Ohio.—You have a difficult task if you wish to avoid being rude to your prying neighbor who disdains your hints and keeps "running in" upon you several times a day—and even at mealtimes. We suggest that you discriminate between rudeness (which really means consciously or unconsciously being unpleasantly discourteous) and a little plain speaking done with a smile. Tell your neighbor that when your old friends drive out from town to visit you, it would make you much happier to be able to talk with them alone, about old times, etc., without having her so often "running in" to make one of the party. Tell her, too, that it disturbs you to have her always enter without knocking and ask her to please always knock in the future. The picture you draw of your neighbor's character would indicate that you can expect relief only through firmness and plain speaking. Keep your manner as deliberately pleasant as your meaning is deliberately clear and make her understand, once for all, that you have a share as well as herself in establishing the degree of intimacy and privacy between neighbors.

E. B., North Carolina.—You may love and trust this boy, but we think your love and trust is misplaced if he has left town and you have failed to hear from him for two months. The possibility is very strong that he has found another girl to love and trust him. If you have written him a second letter and still receive no reply, we do not see that there is anything more you can do except give up loving and trusting him. This may be hard to do, but at eighteen it should not be impossible. There are boys who can be loved and not trusted—and others that can be trusted—and not loved. The right boy combination is not always easy to find, but this little experience should not be all loss, as it will help you in your search. (2) You should know best if you still want to "go" with a boy who has broken dates with you and made denials which you know are untrue—to refer to them pleasantly. A boy who breaks promises and the truth might also break a heart just as easily. You have had one experience in the uncertainty of boy lovers and promisers, and you should guard against another. Try to pick out a boy who will at least do what he says—or when he has failed to do this will not lie about it.

SEVENTEEN SUMMER SISTERS.—Why not pay the expenses of your party yourself without accepting this boy's offer? You want it to be your party, don't you? If you let this boy friend pay part of the entertainment's cost, you should let it be known that he is doing this, so that he gets proper credit as host. We think some one of your seventeen winters should have taught you that an intimate friend cannot be an "intiment" one. (2) A boy should not take his seat between two girls whom he has escorted to church. His place would be at the end of the pew nearest the aisle. (3) A crowded car should not excuse a girl sitting on a boy's lap. Let the boys crowd together as much as may be needed to give the girls seats.

pending on the cost and amount of labor one cares to expend. A hair mattress, or one filled with layers of wool, is the most healthful for baby, but if it is necessary to use a pillow, cover it evenly with something firm, like a folded blanket, so that the body will lie straight and not sag downward at the hips. If it is necessary to keep light and wind from the head, arrange a large towel over the basket, making sure not to shut out the air. The covers must be lightweight, silkaline lined with a layer of wool; they are easily made and useful in many ways. The basket can be kept off the floor and carried from room to room and out of doors.

Plain nightgowns of light-weight outing flannel will wash easily and require little pressing. Petticoats and dresses must not be over 26 inches long when finished. Three bands, three shirts, three petticoats, five slips, three pairs of stockings, five slips and two dozen diapers make ample changes if washing is promptly done. A large square of rubber sheeting will be necessary for the basket, and a smaller square for the lap.

Spending and Saving at the Same Time

The one-piece dress has come nearer to standardizing dress for women and children than has any other style for a good many years. It began with the fitted waist lining and had the general appearance of a belted waist and skirt, but upon examination was found to be all hung together. Gradually the waist-line loosened and became longer, then the net waist lining was only used to hold the skirt evenly, to sew the sleeves into and for facings. Tunics were seen in most models and are still used, but the valued style of today is the straight, low-belted dress that slips on over the head. A glance at any fashion sheet will reveal the fact that no matter what the variations, the simple, straight lines are maintained. The waistcoat, a new name for the guimpe, is worn with the sleeveless dress, and it provides a way to wear out old shirtwaists. Often those of sheer materials may be closed at the front with an insert of lace and opened at the back, to be worn with dresses that open nearly to the waistline. The plain waists for children which button in the back and have long sleeves, round neckline with round turned-down collar are made of small checked ginghams to wear with sleeveless woolen dresses which may be entirely plain with faced or bound neck and armhole edges, which have the simple decoration of a line of fancy stitches done in brightly-colored wool or silk. Dresses with sleeves set in of the same material are generally a little flaring at the wrist which is gathered into a narrow band, or they are left bell-shaped, which is not so practical to wear under coatsleeves. Necks may be finished in almost any way that suits the wearer, and it is difficult to choose among them—the plain flat edge with its bright piping or fancy stitches, the square neck opening with long, narrow collar descending at each side to meet the straight-across top of the vestee, the plain round neck with decorated side front opening, the V neck with curved neckline collar that meets with pointed ends, or the high round neck with flat collar which, by the way, is so youthful as to be a little trying for grownups.

Among the variations most seen in the straight dresses are those with fullness let in over the hips for a distance varying from eight to twelve inches, with the lower edge measuring from one and a half to two yards. Sometimes the top of the dress is cut off at a long-waisted line and a straight lower part set on with gathers all the way around; but even with these, it is better to leave a plain space front and back. Another attractive style has a wide panel-effect front and back, with large square pockets, over the hips, which terminate at the front panel edge. The front is cut with a V neck extending down two-thirds of the distance to the waist-line. One side is decorated with covered buttons and the other side with simulated buttonholes. A vestee and collar are made of contrasting color.

With the straight-lined model as a foundation, more and more individuality is shown, bringing out new effects. It is no longer a question of how many dresses one has, but of how many ways one can wear the same dress by a change of collar and cuffs, a different vestee, or by different belts and sashes.

Dress for both women and children has been greatly simplified, and no matter from what angle you view it, there is a marked saving of labor. Shirtwaists and suits are unnecessary, and for outside wraps the long, loosely-fitting coats, and the long or three-quarter length capes answer all purposes for most people. Odd skirts require tailored waists, and many of the newest ones are made of pongee which washes as well as muslin and is ironed dry. With these skirts, which are straight and fulled into the belt, are worn the slip-on sweater which comes in all colors and weaves.

While counting the blessings brought to us through women growing less and less willing to follow the dictates of fashion unquestioningly, let us not overlook our release from high-heeled boots and shoes. One woman predicts that in three years from now one would be arrested for wearing them on the street, so great is the reform in this direction. While we do not have to accept this exaggeration, it is a fact that in fashionable window displays not a single pair of high-heels will be shown for street wear, and toes are wider as well.

Stitches That Trim

There is nothing new about all the fascinating stitches now used to decorate our waists and dresses, for they are simply a revival of old-time stitchery. If we could but sit at the knee of come Colonial dame, we would soon learn the "needle tricks" that produce such distinctive trimming effects on the gowns seen today.

Snail trail (No. 1) and the running whip stitch (No. 2) are used as finishing stitches for bound edges, or where it is desirable to make a line well defined. To make No. 1, hold the thread in a straight line, and at regular intervals take a short buttonhole stitch from right to left.

The group stitch (No. 3) is used where a heavier effect is wanted. Groups of stitches are evenly taken, and under them strands of a contrasting color. This is one of the prettiest stitches in use.

No. 4 is our old friend the cross-stitch popularly used on the hair-line checks.

No. 5 shows a section of double hemstitching on voile. This stitch is used on the fronts of waists, at the top of hems and in parallel rows in panel effects.

Sewing Screen

A sewing-room did not prove a practical arrangement when so far removed from other work that had to be going on at the same time; neither is it satisfactory to have the sewing kit scattered about in various drawers, bags and baskets. Hence the sewing screen which stands in one corner of the general living-room, and when not in use faces the wall and conceals the table-lap-board.

The frame should be made fairly heavy as it carries considerable weight at times. Oak staining was used on the frame. Heavy, light brown denim was used as a back for the pockets, while the pockets themselves were made of kiddie cloth, but any firm, heavy cloth will do. All three sections were entirely finished with pockets before the mounting was done, and then each section was tacked into place, care being taken that the side edges of the pockets were even with the frame. Over the denim is tacked a pretty piece of cretonne. The edges are covered with furniture braid which is tacked on with upholstery tacks. Across the top of each section of the frame is a strip of wood six inches deep. The hooks holding scissors and bags go into this strip, and on the face of the strip are good-looking brass hooks which are invaluable at times for holding various things.

A glance at the picture will show the arrangement of pockets which may be changed to suit individual requirements. The purpose of the shallow one is to hold knitting needles, crochet hooks, bodkins, tape needles, etc. Sheets of paper suitable for cutting out patterns are saved and kept in the large pocket. All patterns are kept in a box, as the screen pockets are valuable for things more frequently used. The bags are for buttons, cards of hooks and eyes, snaps, and others in small boxes that have been ripped from old garments, skeins of cotton and silk, etc. Other pockets meet present needs, and several small ones may be kept more orderly than one or two larger ones taking up the same space.

One of the best features of the screen is the use of curtain rods with curved ends, on which to hang cut-out work or partly finished garments. A place for the yardstick, scissors and tape-measure will be appreciated.

Tests of Floor Oils Show Their Darkening Effects

A study of the comparative darkening effects of different floor oils was made under the direction of the United States Department of Agriculture over a period of six months. Three types of mixtures were tested. The first consisted of equal parts of motor or engine oil and kerosene; the second was made up of one part boiled linseed oil to three parts of turpentine; the third was a widely advertised commercial oil. Separate mops, kept in separate wrappings, were used for the tests, and mopping was done about once a week. A five-room occupied apartment was used as the basis for the experiment.

The floors, which were of pine, were very old and dark from many coatings of shellac and varnish. Before the experiment was started, they were scrubbed with a strong solution of washing soda until they were of a light shade. After using different oils in different rooms it was found that the floor oil consisting of one part boiled linseed oil to three parts turpentine was the most satisfactory. This oil seemed to have a cleansing effect on the floors to which it was applied. It retained a high gloss and did not darken to any extent the floor on which it was used.

The commercial oil used in this experiment darkened the floor to which it was applied more than did the linseed-oil mixture, but retained more of a gloss than the mixture of motor oil and kerosene, which also darkened the floors.

26-Piece Table Set

Given For A Club Of Only Five

WE have made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a reward for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of five one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 7625.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor. Address, The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MISS F. E. H., Atbol, Mass.—Electricity and massage would benefit you, if properly applied.

MRS. R. B. M., Makanda, Ill.—You can reduce your weight by dieting and exercise. On alternate days use one quart of skimmed milk, and on the other days avoid sweets and pastries and eat principally meats and those foods that are free from starch. Spray the nose with Dobell's solution and have the ears treated by some good ear specialist for the head noises.

MISS N. K., Brenham, Texas.—Oleo-resin of aspidium is the one best remedy for tapeworm. This remedy must be taken only under the advice and direction of your family physician.

MRS. B. D., Denver, Ohio.—In most cases sties are due to need of properly-fitting lenses. Better have your eyes examined under atropine by some good specialist and see if this will remedy the eye condition and the formation of sties. You can also apply to the lids at night a one per cent. ointment of yellow oxide of mercury.

MRS. J. S., Brookville, Ohio.—For high blood pressure take ten drops of a saturated solution of iodide of potassium, well diluted, after meals.

MRS. R. A. K., Columbus, La.—One of the latest remedies, and one of the most valuable ones, is succinate of soda tablets taken in five-grain doses after meals. This is probably the best medical treatment for gall-stones to date. You should also use all the olive oil you can digest with your meals.

MRS. L. L. O., Grandview, Wash.—The only way to be sure you have a tapeworm is to see a portion of the worm in the stools. If you find out in this way that you have a tapeworm, a remedy will be recommended for getting rid of the same.

MRS. I. O., Gonzales, Texas.—There is no known cure for tuberculosis. Change of climate, full diet, the use of some good arsenical preparation, and general hygienic conditions, are all that can be done in a given case.

MISS H. C. M., Richmond, Va.—Kindly give full name and address, if answer is expected in this department. Headaches, if due to functional disturbance, can be relieved by taking five-grain tablets of bromide of sodium after meals, keeping the bowels free, and eating only such foods as one has found will not cause formation of gas in the intestines. Headaches mostly are due to eyestrain. Have your eyes examined for correcting lenses.

MISS A. M., Aland, N. C.—The only remedy for the enlarged bones of your feet, due no doubt to faulty footwear, is to have some shoes made to order and thus avoid irritation and pressure due to poor-fitting shoes. Locally, you can apply, at night, a twenty per cent. ichthyol ointment.

MRS. A. M., Madisonville, Ky.—You got up too soon after being confined and are suffering from this indiscretion. You need a tonic. Take, after meals, well diluted, a tablespoonful of Basham's mixture. This tonic should help you in every way.

MRS. H. J., Glencoe, Minn.—Basham's mixture, which is indicated in your case, is an iron tonic that is very easily assimilated and has also a wholesome action on the kidneys. It should be made up fresh and kept on ice while being used, as it is unstable and easily sours. Cannot tell why doctors do not prescribe asafœtida pills, as they are very beneficial in all forms of nervousness, especially those due to "change of life." The name of ovarian substance will explain what it is. In two-grain capsules it is very useful in climacteric conditions.

MR. M. R. C., Woodville, Texas.—You have a chronic rheumatic condition. Keep the painful joints wet with a saturated solution of Epsom salts. Drink plenty of water, and take ten-grain tablets of sodium salicylate, well diluted, after meals.

MISS T. K., Healing Springs, Va.—The best and most satisfactory way of removing warts of any kind is by having them cauterized with the actual cautery. Trichlor. acetic acid will also remove them, but this remedy must be used with caution, as scarring may follow its use.

MISS G. C., Spiceland, Ind.—One who has goiter must avoid excitement of all kinds; rest in the recumbent position for long periods daily and take, internally, five drops of a saturated solution of iodide of potassium, well diluted. Of course the bowels must be kept free and only such foods eaten that are easily assimilated. Meats, and all protein foods, must be avoided also.

MRS. S. W. H., Chapala, Mo.—There is no sure cure for goiter. You might take a five-drop dose in water after meals, of a saturated solution of iodide of potassium for some weeks. Of course avoid excitement and rest in the recumbent position as much as possible.

MR. R. L. S., Starkey, Oregon.—Operation is indicated if the leg veins are very large and troublesome. In the meantime you can wear an elastic bandage during the day. Remove the bandage at night, always.

MRS. V. B. M., Mountain Air, New Mexico.—The heart trouble and the nervous jerking are both due to a nervous indigestion. Take, after meals, a five-grain asafœtida pill.

MRS. M. M. B., Kingston, N. Y.—Maybe you are asthmatic. If so, take a teaspoonful of pertussin after meals. Avoid sweets of all kinds and eat sparingly at all times. Also exercise in the open. Your other questions must be referred to other departments.

MRS. J. L. E., Daytona Beach, Fla.—To remove tapeworm, follow explicitly the following directions: The day before you take the remedy prescribed fast, eating only a small quantity of soup at night. Also take a good saline cathartic the first day. The following day take eight capsules of oleoresin aspidium as follows: four early in the morning and four one hour later. Be sure to remove the caps from the capsules before taking them. The quantity of the aspidium in the capsules should be sixty grains divided in eight capsules, or about seven grains to each capsule. Two hours after taking the capsules, take two tablespoonfuls of Epsom salts dissolved in a glass of hot water. If you feel faint, take a small cup of black coffee without milk or sugar. While undergoing the treatment you should remain in the recumbent position and also should have a nurse with you, or take the treatment under the direction of your family physician. This remedy and treatment will get rid of the worm in most cases.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

Next year I shall have grades three and four, the same children that I had this year and I love every one of them.

Now for the rainy day. Why not have a Rainy Day Box for rainy days only? In it have material for carts made out of match boxes, hay wire, milk bottle tops or round pieces of cardboard; brads with two ends to bend back after putting into pasteboard. Also save walnut shells and glue onto cardboard that will bend but not break. When dry, show the children how to make dolls by painting faces with ink. Have clay pipes for soap bubbles. Make puzzles by pasting a pretty colored picture on cardboard and cutting into irregular shapes. Use putty for moulding objects. Fill a wooden box, six inches deep, with tight bottom, with sand. When this is dampened the boys like to make miniature farms like papa's, or a village, Indian wigwams, etc. Make the lake or brook of glass with blue paper under it.

I wish Worried Mother would read St. John, 8th chapter and 3rd verse to 13th, and First Cor., 13th chapter and put the word "love" in place of "charity."

I believe if we try to make someone happy every day that the blessing will be returned to us sometime. I especially like this verse:

"Cast your bread upon the water,
Ye who have but scant supply;
Angel eyes will watch above it,
You will find it by and by."

Best wishes to everybody.

MRS. MARGIE C. GOODRIDGE.

BAY CITY, MICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND THE COMFORT FAMILY:

I suppose I am in the wrong pew but I wish you would admit me for a few minutes.

If it wasn't that I was afraid of shocking the sisters of this corner I'd be tempted to use a few expressive words, after reading letter from Worried Mother.

Before going any further let me say if her son had been a man he would have married the girl and the mother would have accepted her as a daughter instead of giving her away to every reader of COMFORT. I'll wager quite a bit that her son was 95 per cent. to blame. A girl seldom goes wrong and then only on a promise of marriage and who wouldn't condemn the man that can't keep such a promise? If it wasn't for the wiles and ways of us men there would be few girls go wrong. I don't want the readers of this department to think that I am any worse than other men. Most of us are alike, if we would admit it, but if I made a promise I would make good at any cost.

A FRIEND TO THAT KIND OF A GIRL.

MAYBURG, PA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

We have had COMFORT in our home for a long time. This is my first attempt to write and I come for help.

I am to enter State Normal this fall and am puzzled as to what my wardrobe should be. I am fifteen years old, five feet, six inches tall and have a medium complexion.

I want something simple and serviceable.

No doubt some of the mothers who have daughters in school can help me. I will try and return the favor.

Sincerely, HAZEL HOGUE.

VERMONT.

HOWDY EVERYBODY:

May I step in for just a moment? I have been reading the letters since I was twelve years old (and that was ever so long ago) and this is the first time I have ventured to even knock.

I have just finished reading the letter by "Contented Wife" in March COMFORT and I felt that so long as I couldn't speak to her personally I should like to write my view on the question of teaching children at home before starting in school. By all means, do so! Tell them stories often. There are many good story books to be found. Teach them "Mother Goose Rhymes" and other good selections for little folks. Most children like Stevenson's "The Swing." Be sure they understand the meaning of this before they try to memorize it. As soon as the kiddies can handle scissors, help them to cut out pictures. This is a great help to secure control of the muscles needed later in writing. Tracing objects such as apples, flowers and animals helps to accomplish this also. If you start the children in reading, be sure to visit school first and acquaint yourself with the method being used and follow that one. It is confusing to the child to be started one way and then to be obliged to change. Personally, I prefer a phonic method. I think six years old is a good age for a child to begin school.

Parents, do you realize that your attitude towards the teacher has a great deal to do with the progress your child makes in school? Can you expect your child to respect a teacher whom you criticize in his presence? Even though you know she is wrong do not tell the child so.

Why do we not see letters from Vermonters? Surely, many must be able to tell us some interesting or helpful things.

Here's hoping Mrs. Wilkinson will not close the door in my face.

Most sincerely,
A friend and well-wisher of all,
"SCHOOL-MARMS."

KANSAS.

DEAR EDITOR AND SISTERS:

I have taken COMFORT for years and always read every page of it. I find the recipes good and the letters interesting.

I wonder if the sisters can advise me in my trouble. I have been married seven years and have had happiness as well as trouble. My worst trouble is a disagreeable sister-in-law. She is one of those bossy women who thinks if things aren't done her way they aren't done right, unless the person happens to be well to do, then she is different. She has always tried to run our affairs and has practically told me, and told my husband, that I didn't know how to raise our children, a girl and a boy. They do many naughty little things and I try to correct them. Her child, a little girl, gets mad and rushes at the one with whom she is mad, scratching and kicking them, but her mother teaches her "not to let anyone put anything over on her," to use her own words. Everything I do is wrong and everything that happens is my fault and she has got my husband thinking the same way, therefore my life is becoming unbearable. I make mistakes, we all do, but there is never any excuse for me. If it weren't for our children I would leave. Sometimes I think it is because of the difference in religion. I am a Protestant and my husband and his folks are Catholics. We have had our children baptized and I attend church with him and keep their fast days with him but keep my own rights as to joining. That may not be the cause for my sister-in-law is disagreeable to those of her own faith unless they happen to have money. Friends and relatives have advised me to join her church but if I joined it would be for the sake of peace in the family and not because I believed and that seems like a sin to me. My husband and I have never had any quarrels over religion. I have tried to get him to move away but he won't do this. He thinks I should put up with it because we have a good home and it is near for his brothers to help him with his work. He doesn't see that it is ruining my life and the lives of our children. He and his people have endured her ways and have found it easier to give in than to assert their rights, but I think a woman should do as she pleases in her own home. I appreciate all his father and mother have done for us but I do resent his sister's interference. She always has tried to boss everyone's affairs.

I hope to receive some good advice from someone. Thank you for listening. TROUBLED.

HAWARDEN, R. R. 2, IOWA.

'LO EVERYONE:

A Southern sister opened the door real wide to come in so I skipped behind her.

COMFORT has been in our home for nearly twenty years and I read it from cover to cover and consider it a comfort indeed. Lately I've noticed that the critics (men writers) have been absent and I wonder why. Perhaps they've grown tired of criticizing the sisters. We must admit that they do criticize. Haven't I five brothers, and I ought to know.

In caring for ferns, water them only every third day, then the soil should be well soaked. Every six or eight weeks soak them with manure water.

To remove chewing gum from clothing, put a little kerosene in a basin of water, dip article in this until gum will roll up and come off, then wash in the regular way.

To remove indelible ink from cloth, put it in sweet milk and boil till all stain is removed, changing milk if necessary.

If you will launder your filet crochet inserts before sewing in material, they'll not pucker when the finished piece is laundered.

Now may I ask a favor?

I wish to hear from someone who can give me directions for making organdy flowers. Why not send them to be printed in COMFORT so all may see?

I am five feet, two inches tall, dark blue-grey eyes, medium brown curly hair and weigh 101 pounds and am between eighteen and twenty-two years of age.

A friend, MISS NAOMI LANSDOWNE.

EAST SUMNER, MAINE.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I am sure there is no other paper so good as COMFORT and I look forward each month to its coming.

I wish some of the sisters would write letters to our corner telling how they furnished their boy's room. I think boys should have a comfortable room of their own, where they can have their boy friends visit them and play as much as they like. I don't believe we can love children too much or be too good to them.

I am a little more than five feet tall and weigh 125 pounds. Have been married two and one-half years and am nineteen years old. We have a dear little baby boy, sixteen months old. He is all the world to us.

With best wishes to all,

MRS. ALICE J. RUSSELL.

MRS. RUSSELL.—Your inquiry should bring forth interesting letters for much can be written about furnishing a boy's room. The furniture should first of all be substantial and not so grand that scratches are regarded as a calamity. Boys can't remember to be careful and if they are obliged to have parlor manners all the time their room will lose much of its charm for them and defeat the purpose for which it was intended, that of making them happy and contented at home.—Ed.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

To remove iodine stains, wet cloth in cold water and hang beside fire until dry. The stains will have disappeared as if by magic by the time the cloth is dry. —MRS. M. B. BURKE, Rock Falls, Ill.

HOW TO WASH WOOL FLANNEL.—(Requested) Use lukewarm water, "neither cold nor hot." Use any good soap, make suds and wash as much as possible by dipping the material with the suds and squeezing with the hands. If very soiled and dirty I use the washboard and rub rather vigorously. Do not boil, but rinse thoroughly in clean, warm water without soap and dry indoors if in cold weather; otherwise, dry in air but out of direct rays of the sun.

HOW TO REMOVE SWEET PEAS OR GREEN FLY.—(Requested) Boil chewing tobacco in water and strain, dilute with about half water and spray the vines thoroughly with this tea. While vines are wet, sprinkle with soot from kitchen stove where wood has been burned. This acts as a fertilizer to a certain extent and there are a number of destructive insects that dislike it very much. This same treatment is fine for any plants or garden stuff.—MRS. GEORGE C. NEWMAN, Little Rock, Ark.

In packing cut flowers for shipment, line a cardboard box with several thicknesses of newspapers, dip flowers in water; wrap in wet paper, care being taken not to fold flowers or stems under, but use paper wide and long enough to fold over at ends. Place in box, cover with dry paper and they are ready for a long trip and will keep for days.

Mix a teaspoon of pulverized alum with stove polish to give the stove a high luster and one that will last a long while.

If the woman who wanted to know how to clean a velour coat will sponge it with borax and water, one teaspoonful of powdered borax to nearly a quart of water, she will be pleased with the result. Use a very soft sponge for the purpose.

To wash blankets, cut half a cake of soap into small pieces and dissolve in hot water. Pour this into enough cold water to cover the blankets, add two ounces of borax and let the blankets soak over night. In the morning squeeze the water from them and rinse thoroughly in cold water in which a little borax has been dissolved. Put through a second rinsing water, without borax, and then through bluing water.—N. R. BURDETTE, Reynolds Station, Ky.

Make extra money by learning to cut children's hair. —MRS. J. M. RILEY, Dunn, N. C.

Kerosene and salt are excellent for cleaning bathtubs and sinks.—MRS. E. A. SCHRADER, Springfield, 529 Homeview Ave., Ohio.

If feathers stick through the ticking, remove them and wash, starch and iron the ticking and note the results.—MRS. FANNIE MCCARROLL, Wilburton, Okla.

Shave a little laundry soap into the starch and the clothes will be easier to iron.—COUNTRY MISS, Elizabeth, W. Va.

Put a small piece of adhesive plaster on the finger when crocheting or sewing. This will keep the finger from getting pricked by the needle.—MRS. G. D. HAYNS, Sagerton, Texas.

Requests

I would like to secure a pattern for portieres in filet crochet.—MRS. OLON MAKADANZ, Ocheltree, Kans.

How to prepare barbecued meat and sauce.—MRS. ETHEL D. JOHNSON, Goodenow, Ill.

Wanted: To hear from people living in Idaho and Oregon, as to climate, work and whether there is a Salvation Army or Y. W. C. A. organizations MRS. FRANK BURKE, Philipsburg, Montana.

Will some reader of COMFORT please send me the poem, "Clock of Destiny," published in Richmond College Messenger about 1890.—MRS. ALICE HIDER, Milburn, Okla.

CORNS.—Paint corns with iodine to relieve soreness. —MRS. H. B. G., Stratton, Colo.

SNAKEBITE.—Beat or grind one large red onion to a pulp. Mix with one ounce of pulverized tobacco snuff and one teaspoonful of saltpeter. Place this on the bite made by the snake, and renew every two or three hours. Comfort's League of Cousins stove; but for anybody who likes the game of woodland lovemaking, Colorado, I'm sure, can furnish the best of home grounds.

I was sorry to hear you could not speak or read Chinese, Earl. I was going to send you a laundry check I have been patiently holding for fourteen years. This was given me by a wily Oriental in Hancock Street who disappeared overnight with three boiled shirts of mine, nine collars and some assorted socks. I thought the pink slip, if translated, might tell me his name and what part of China he hailed from. I would like to write him about this or see him if possible. He had a complexion resembling an unstarched and scorched neckband and eyes that ran down a slope of forty degrees into a nose like a window-wedge. His hair was black and rather stringy and he tied it up in back with a blue cord. You would recognize him by this description. Do you remember seeing a chap like this about the streets of Shanghai, Earl? I want to get track of him and argue a little about his rapid way of moving about.

I hope you enjoyed your view from the top of the Pyramids, Earl, and that you chatted a bit with the Sphinx. Well, you have a pretty good sort of a pyramid right to home now in Pike's Peak—and it is a darn sight cooler to climb. When you write us again tell us about the Fiji Islanders and if the girls there bob their hair. We expect good stories from our globe-trotting cousins to cheer our stay-at-home ears, Earl. So pick up your mudhook again and spin us a yarn or two.

STANWOOD, ROUTE 1, BOX 84 A, WASH.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Throw a ladder over the side and I will come aboard and spin my yarn. Sounds salty, does it not? When I said ladder I meant a Jacob's or accommodation ladder such as big ships have aboard.

It's best to describe myself as I am a new cousin. I was born in Norway 23 years ago, am five feet, ten inches tall and weigh about 175 pounds. Like the Vikings of old, I am blond with fair hair and have blue eyes. I speak, read and write the Norwegian language fluently. I would like to hear from cousins who write Scandinavian.

I have read COMFORT for many years. I may write again about my travels to Europe, the Hawaiian Islands or the Orient.

Who celebrates his or her birthday on the same day as myself—October 5th? I shall be 24 years old then, the oldest of six boys and one girl. Some yarn! Best regards to all from

Your new cousin, BERGER CHRISTENSEN.

Come right up on the bridge, Berger, and have a first look over our big ship, the U. S. COMFORT and her crew of Cousins. The Jacob's ladder is always down and we're always ready to listen to the spinning of yarns.

Yours is a sea-going race, Berger, if ever there was one and your Viking blood must be uneasy when you are living where the dust blows. Your native country has a glorious history of which too little is known, I think. That the Scandinavian countries keep out of the newspaper headlines today speaks for their own peace, happiness and prosperity. The governments of Norway and Sweden seem to think that people can live successfully without fretting about the ownership of oil fields, Russian concessions, chunks of China or the bossing of darker races. I believe our virile, self-contained people to be the healthiest and happiest of the European nations. So I say, "Skoal to the Vikings!"

You must sing us a saga or two some day, Berger, of your cruises in the Orient, to these south countries so far from your own northland in customs and tradition. I'll give you a good place on the bridge and gather all the crew about to hear.

VIVIAN, LOUISIANA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I was just reading the COMFORT and thought I would write to dear old Uncle—or dear young Uncle, just either one. I don't care if you are 300 years old. I'm only just sixteen and I feel like 45 tonight.

I will describe myself to you: I have blonde hair, gray-blue eyes fair complexion and am four feet, nine inches tall. I weigh 125 pounds. So you can imagine I'm rather cute and attractive.

Uncle Lisha, we have taken COMFORT for six months and I sure like it.

I will tell you how this place looks: We live in front of the Bayou. Through the spring and summer the trees are always so pretty. I always long for the warm weather. I wish you would come to see me and we would walk over the mountain near the Bayou. Oh, we would have a nice time!

Now I will change the subject and tell you all about my school. Oh, I can't tell you much about school, for I've quit. I had to do all the work here and I wish you would come over and help me, for a girl only sixteen ought not to have anything to do at all. I sure hope my letter will be printed.

Your niece, DOLL S.

I think you are very unfeeling, Doll S. You may not care if I am 300 years old, but I certainly do. I don't want to be 300 years old at all and I'm sure you would not love me as much if I had put three centuries behind me and had to hobble lamely when we hiked over the mountain above the Bayou. Also I don't think it's fair for you to pick out any such advanced age for me and at the same time keep yourself down to such a comparatively juvenile number of years as forty-five. I have done my best, Doll, to imagine you as "cute and attractive" as possible, but it is hard for me to think of a forty-five year old doll as being real cute.

You did not tell us just what made you grow from 16 to 45 so quickly, Dolly, and why you picked out so grouchy and ancient an evening to write your letter. Perhaps it has all come about from this strange heresy of yours that a girl of sixteen should not "do anything at all." Of course I don't want you to work all the time or too hard, Doll, but there are plenty of useful and happy things a girl of sixteen can—and should do—besides looking out on the Bayou and the green trees and thinking of celebrating her forty-fifth birthday. Just let your hands keep busy and your heart will be lighter. You may not be so cute, but I'm willing to bet any sane Louisiana jury would declare you more attractive. I'm willing to go down and help you, Dolly, you poor little 45-year-old, but I won't agree to do all the work while you just naturally don't "do anything at all."

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for September

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Henry J. Summit, Sims, Montgomery Co., Ark. This father of a large family has been crushed to poverty and overwork through serious illness of children and himself. A well-recommended case where second-hand clothing or cash will ease sick and burdened shoulders. J. M. Brown, Chattanooga, 1105 Market St., Tenn. Age and consequent ill health have made this poor old man an object of charity. He would support himself if he could. Let's help him now that he cannot help himself. Miss Callie D. Barefoot, Four Oaks, Box 66, R. R. 2, N. C. References testify that this poor woman has been confined to bed or a chair for thirty-five years. She has struggled hard to aid herself. Physically her case is hopeless, so aid her with cheer and financial hope. Mrs. J. L. Minter, Sandy Level, Va. Helpless day after day on a lonely bed of pain, this woman asks for help or cheer of any sort to make her lot easier. Walter Blackman, Imperial, Nebr. A crippled boy of nineteen years who seeks aid to get medical attention. If he can get help it should not be withheld from him. Mrs. Elizabeth Parlier, N. C. Her daughter struggles to support this worthy sufferer who asks that the "hard places be made easier" for her. Second-hand clothing or anything else will be welcomed. Mrs. Sadie Williams, Huntingburg, Ind. A widow supporting as best she can three small children—the oldest but seven. Any help that comes to this woman before winter sets in will aid her through the struggle she fears. Mrs. Bertha Mulliner, Grand Junction, Colo., sends an earnest letter expressing gratitude to all who sent help and cheer.

Again we have urgent calls and painful needs this month. Many of these poor sufferers send letters that would melt the hardest of hearts—even if we had any hard ones among our Big and Helpful Family. Give clothing, cash or cheer. Every word, dime or dollar you send counts—and just how much it may count we cannot really understand, we who are not in pain nor shut away from the happy workaday world.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Japanese Walnut Makes Valuable Tree for Shade

The Japanese walnut offers possibilities for landowners who are seeking to plant nut trees for shade or other purposes, say specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture. It is nearly as hardy as the black walnut and is by no means uncommon in Northern and Eastern States, where it is especially appropriate for farm and dooryard planting. For the present, seedling trees will have to be relied upon almost entirely, as very few budded or grafted trees are available.

This nut has been confused with the Persian or so-called English walnut, although the two are quite unlike. The Japanese is a dwarfish species, with dull green rough leaflets, often as many as 15 or 17 to the leaf, and bears nuts in racemes of a dozen or more.

The shells are thinner than those of the black walnut, but thicker than those of the better Persian walnuts. The flavor of the kernels is much like that of the American butternut.

One Wheel Chair in August

650 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

Only one wheel chair do we send out in August. That is a regretable slump below the three that we sent out in July; but it is always the case that wheel-chair subscriptions and contributions dwindle to mere driblets in mid summer. Is it because the weather is too hot, or are people too busy or too much occupied with seeking out-door pleasure that they show so little activity in behalf of our Wheel-Chair Club at this season? But experience has established the cheering fact that with the advent of cool fall weather active interest in our wheel-chair work revives.

CLARENCE TUTHEROW ENJOYS HIS WHEEL CHAIR.

The one August wheel chair goes to Mrs. Joseph P. Kerr, 1341 N. Jefferson Ave., Springfield, Mo., whose good friends and neighbors have sent in 131 subscriptions for her. Mrs. Kerr is 45 years of age, and for the past four years has been confined to her bed, being crippled from her waist down by a nervous trouble. This wheel chair will mitigate her suffering and be a help in caring for her.

Don't forget that we have a large number of poor, crippled shut-ins on our waiting list who are suffering for need of a wheel chair, and as they can't get out and about to solicit subscriptions for themselves they are largely dependent on others to do this for them. Will you not do something to help the Wheel-Chair Club this month? Every little helps

The happy faces of the two crippled children whose pictures appear on this page express better than words the pleasure that their COMFORT wheel chairs give them.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

How Happy He Looks in His Wheel Chair!

Lincolnton, N. C., R. F. D. 2, Box 51,

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I am sending you a picture of my son Clarence in his wheel chair so that you may see how happy he looks in it, and I hope you will print it in COMFORT so that all his friends may see it. I want to thank you and all the good people who helped to get him the chair—it is so nice for him. I will get you some more subscriptions to help on the good work you are doing through COMFORT and the Wheel-Chair Club. With sincere gratitude, I am Very truly yours, (Mrs.) Will Tutherow.

Bumper Crops that Can't Be Marketed if the Railroad Labor Strike Continues

THE season is, at the present writing, so far advanced that the crop report recently issued by the Government may be relied on as a substantially accurate forecast of this year's harvest. According to information given out by the U. S. Department of Agriculture most of the principal crops are unusually large and some of them are record-breakers. Coming down to figures the Agricultural Department's estimates are: wheat, upward of 805,000,000 bushels; oats, 1,200,000,000; barley, 192,000,000; rye, 79,000,000, or more; sweet potatoes, 112,000,000 bushels; buckwheat, 13,000,000; rice 38,700,000; sugar beets, 5,080,000 tons; apples, 202,000,000 bushels; peaches, 56,000,000; peanuts 679,000,000 pounds; tobacco, about one and one-half billion pounds. For the fourth time in the history of the country our corn crop will exceed three billion bushels; our potato crop will be the second largest ever grown, while the hay crop is larger by more than a million tons than ever before.

Nevertheless in this great land stocked, as it is, with an abundance and even a superabundance of food there is grave danger that millions of our people may have to go on short food rations or even be subjected to famine conditions because of inadequate railroad freight service caused by the present railroad labor strike. Already have the railroads become so crippled by the strike that scores of passenger trains have had to be cancelled in order to give necessary preference to transportation of coal which is overstraining the diminished capacity of the great trunk lines; and yet the moving of the principal crops, which always puts the railroad freight service to the most arduous test, has not begun for this year. One needs no great degree of imagination or gift of prophesy to foresee a seriously aggravated situation when the chief food staples begin to contest with coal for preferential transportation privileges on the overburdened and strike-crippled railroads—it means, of course, a food-and-fuel famine in this land of plenty, unless the railroad labor strike should be ended very soon, and even so the business and industrial interests will suffer for some time after, as they are now suffering, no small detriment.

It is estimated that, if trade, industrial ana transportation conditions were normal so that this year's bumper crops could be marketed at present prices, seventeen of the leading crops would bring the farmers well over seven billion dollars and increase the farmers' purchasing power by more than a billion dollars. In commenting on what should be the beneficial effect of the present bounteous harvest in promoting general prosperity The Wall Street Journal remarks that "out of the soil Nature has taken and handed to the American people the first fundamental for good business", and the Minneapolis Journal pointedly expresses a well established truth by saying that "when the farmer prospers, all other forms of industry and business march to the same happy tune." But the trouble is that this rosy prospect hangs on that all-important and dubious if in the first line of this paragraph.

Trade and industrial conditions are far from normal and are daily growing worse because of partial paralysis of transportation which is becoming more extended and acute with each day's continuance of the railroad labor strike. Never, not even during the late war, has the need for the utmost possible freight service of our railroads been more pressing than now. The country being direfully short of fuel in consequence of the coal miners' strike, which has just ended, puts an unusual strain on the railroads to transport the millions of tons of the much-needed products of the mines that have resumed operations, for fuel is about as indispensable as food. There is no doubt that if the railroad strike continues its ruinous career it will be extremely difficult, if possible, to provide the fifty-two per cent. of our population which lives in cities and large towns with even a meager supply of necessary food, and added to this are the needs of millions of farmers in the Eastern States who raise little corn and no wheat and therefore depend on the West for flour, corn and cattle feed. Under such conditions what prospect have the farmers of being able to market their bumper crops which but for the railroad strike would spread prosperity throughout the land?

This year's production of foodstuffs in the United States, notably of corn and wheat, is considerably more than the American people could consume even under favorable conditions, leaving a large surplus that must either be sold in a foreign market or carried over unsold. Obviously the effect of the continuance of the railroad strike would be to reduce American consumption of foodstuffs, thereby increasing the surplus for export, and at the same time prevent this surplus from reaching a foreign market because of the inability of the railroads to transport it to the coast. With the supply of agricultural products exceeding the demand for domestic consumption and the foreign market for the excess cut off, another probable result would be a drop in the prices received by the farmers even though the famishing city consumers might have to pay as high or higher prices than at present—leave it to the middlemen and speculators to see to that. You see the importance of the if. If the railroad labor strike continues not only will the farmers and the country at large be robbed of the prosperity which the big crops should bring, but will be afflicted with business depression and discomforts too numerous and distressing to mention.

Government Acts to Stop Lawless Interference with the Railroads.

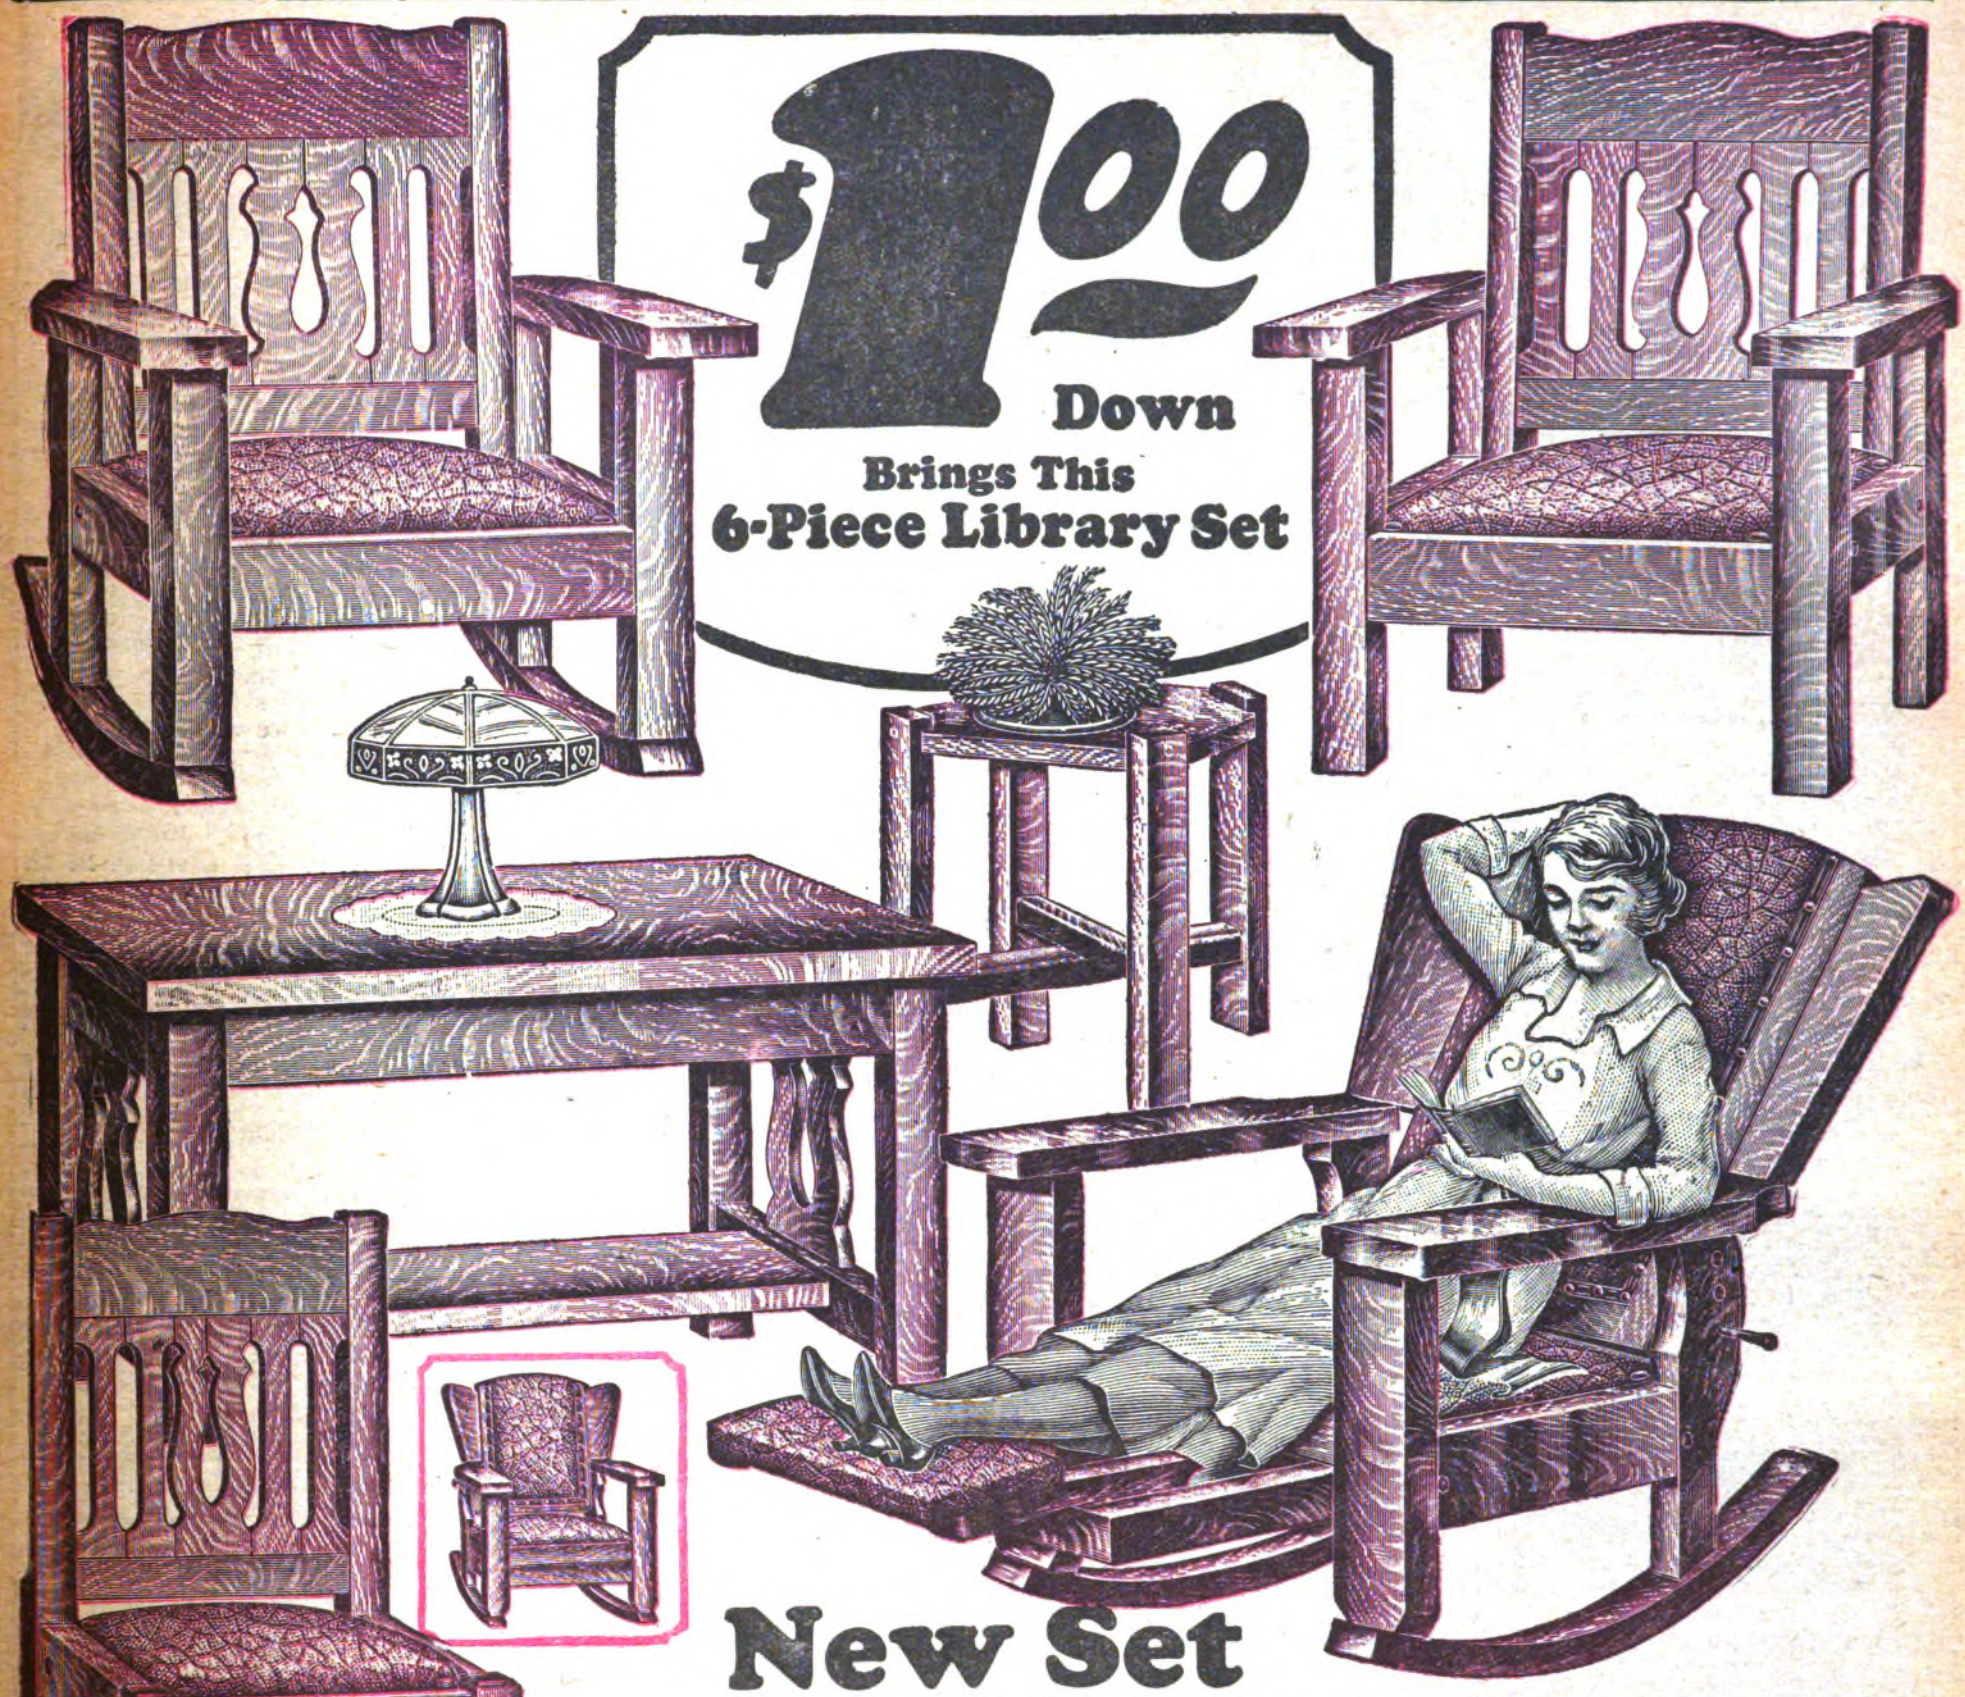
Assuming that there may be rational grounds for a difference of opinion as to the right of railroad employees to strike in defiance of the decision of the Railroad Labor Board, no person imbued with a sense of common decency, respect for law or regard for the rights of others will try to justify or excuse any of the very many acts of lawless intimidation and violence in the form of threats, assaults, bodily injuries, murders, destruction of railroad buildings, cars and engines and the wrecking of trains, and numerous unsuccessful attempts to blow up bridges, burn buildings and wreck trains, throughout the country, perpetrated or instigated by the strikers, their sympathizers or friends in furtherance of the purposes of the strike. This lawlessness is of three distinct classes, each aimed at the accomplishment of a definite object.

When the strikers walked out a considerable number of the railroad shopmen, although members of the union, refused to obey the strike order and stuck to their jobs, and under promised protection by the Government the places of the strikers were being filled at a rate that indicated that the railroads would be able to maintain their freight and passenger service without serious impairment, which, if permitted to go on unchecked, meant the failure of the strike. When this became apparent the lawlessness began, first in the form of threats, personal injuries to and murders of men who stuck to their jobs or took the places of strikers, the manifest purpose being to force them to join the strike and to frighten would-be applicants from seeking employment; next came ditching of locomotives, injury and destruction of cars, burning of roundhouses, repair shops and other railroad property, aimed at crippling the physical equipment of the railroads; then followed the wrecking and attempted wrecking of trains by pulling the spikes from rails and by tampering with signals, resulting in several deaths and intended to terrify the public. After the strike had run into the second month scarcely a day passed without tidings of one or more shocking crimes perpetrated, attempted or plotted in connection with the railroad labor strike.

Thus had the situation become intolerable when, on the first day of September, the United States Government, acting through the Attorney General, began a resolute effort to end this reign of terror and restore law and order for the protection of life, property, personal liberty and the right of the people to travel and have their goods transported in interstate commerce without molestation or threatened interference. It was only after President Harding had gone to the limit of propriety in his repeated endeavors to bring about a peaceful settlement of the strike and had reached the point where "patience ceases to be a virtue" and further forbearance would have been unfaithfulness to duty, that he directed Attorney General Daugherty to take the initial step by applying to the U. S. District Court in Chicago for an injunction commanding the strikers, their agents, associates and all persons acting in aid or in conjunction with them to abstain from in any manner interfering with, hindering or obstructing railroad companies, their agents or employees in the operation of their respective railroads in the performance of their public duties and obligations in the transportation of passengers and property in interstate commerce and the carriage of the mails, and from attempting to prevent any person from freely entering into or continuing in the employ of the railroad companies.

Judge Wilkerson, before whom the petition came for preliminary hearing, on facts and argument presented by the Attorney General, issued the injunction as a temporary restraining order to remain in force until September eleventh, which date he assigned for a full hearing to determine whether the injunction should then be dissolved, modified or made permanent, and he ordered all parties interested to be notified accordingly. On that day, which at the present writing is still in the future, the parties defendant and any and all other persons whose rights are affected will have an opportunity to appear before the Court in person or by attorney and object to the injunction and present such evidence and arguments as they may wish to offer in support of their objections. In presenting his petition to the Court at the preliminary hearing Attorney General Daugherty stated that he did not appear as the representative of the railroads, but representing the people of the United States. He asserted that the Government of the United States is not opposed to labor unions if they obey the law, and that the requested injunction was not aimed at, and would not affect, any labor union that limits its activities to legitimite acts and lawful pursuits.

Mr. Daugherty has since explained that the purpose and effect of the injunction are not to compel any man to work who does not wish to work, but to protect those who desire to work from any form of interference in the free exercise of their natural and legal right to work when, where and for whom they choose. And President Harding has added his assurance that "the injunction will not be used to abridge personal liberty, and that its only purpose and the only use that will be made of it will be to restrain violence and compel obedience to law and order."



In reply to critics who denounce the injunction as infringing on the right of free speech and of freedom of the press Mr. Daugherty points out that in this respect it goes no further than to forbid what can not lawfully be spoken or published in print. To advise or instigate, in speech or in print, the commission of murder, arson or any other crime or transgression of law is unlawful and if uttered or printed in violation of the injunction would subject the author or publisher to a penalty—and why not? Judged according to moral standards the master mind that incites to crime is guiltier than his credulous satellite whom he induces to fire the shot, explode the bomb or apply the torch in execution of an atrocious villainy.

Stella Rosevelt

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

Without sound or warning, she slipped from her chair to the floor.

"Miss Gladstone!" he cried approaching and holding out his hand to her.

She started as if some viper had stung her.

CHAPTER XXXXIX.

A CRUSHING BLOW.

THE next morning when the company met at breakfast Josephine experienced a feeling of intense relief upon learning that Lord Carrol had been called away to London at an early hour on "important business."

After breakfast was over, and as Josephine was passing through the hall on her way to her own room, she espied the morning papers lying on the table.

Mechanically she took up one, glancing carelessly over the columns, when almost the first thing she saw was a notice of the arrival of a steamer from New York two days previous, with a list of the passengers below.

A lurid light shot into her eyes and an angry exclamation burst from her lips as she read; for, among the other names in that list, she read those of Jacob Rosevelt, Miss Star Gladstone and maid, from New York.

She took the paper and went upstairs to her mother's room and showed the notice to her.

"It seems as if that girl was bound to be the ruination of us. They are continually crossing our path, and I declare it is more than human nature can patiently bear. I wonder what has brought them to England?"

"I suppose Uncle Jacob thinks he must give his charming protegee every advantage possible," Josephine sneered, bitterly.

"Well, I'm sure we do not need to mind them now," Mrs. Richards said, with a sigh of satisfaction. "Even if she gets every penny of his money, your position will henceforth be far superior to hers."

"I don't know about that," the girl retorted, with a painful flush. "If Lord Carrol meets her, and they make up their quarrel, I shall still be rather in the background, I imagine."

"True; I had not thought of that," her mother replied, with a blank look. "I wish you could have managed to entrap him, Jo."

"Lord Carrol is a fool!" she said, passionately.

Her mother looked up at her searchingly, mistrusting that her daughter had more reason for her pale face and heavy eyes than she knew of.

"If only that marriage last night could have been a real one, I should have been the happiest woman in England this morning," she said, wistfully.

"With one exception," Josephine thought, with a bitter sigh and a hard glitter in her eyes; but she said nothing.

They did not leave Sherbrooke house that day, however. A sudden storm came on during the afternoon, too violent to admit of the departure of any one, and Lady Sherbrooke would not allow any of her guests to mention such a thing. And so the long, dreary day was spent in rest and quiet.

But the next day broke bright and pleasant, and just as the company were sitting down to the morning meal, Minnie Shelton came dancing into the breakfast room, her cheeks glowing, her eyes sparkling, and her lips parted in the brightest of smiles, while a paper fluttered in her small hands.

"Such fun!" she exclaimed, merrily. "Here is a description of your ball, Lady Sherbrooke, in the Cheshire Gazette—the mock marriage and all; and the best of the whole thing is, they have written up that event so that at a first glance any one would naturally suppose that a real wedding had occurred. Listen."

She held up the paper and read:

"MARRIED.—At the country residence of Lady Sherbrooke, on the 10th instant, Sir Archibald Sherbrooke and Lord Carrol, of Carrolton, to Miss Josephine Richards, formerly of New York, U. S. A., but recently reported to be the heiress presumptive to the Thornton estates in Devonshire. The fair bride was lovely in her bridal robes, not the least noticeable of which was the exquisite point lace veil, which was also of great value."

"There—isn't that too rich for anything?" the gay girl cried; "and do look at the mock bride's blushes!" pointing at Josephine, whose face was crimson from varied emotions; "what a pity it is that our handsome groom is not here to see them; and one would almost imagine she was a real bride by her confusion."

"Then there follows a long account of the ball, which explains everything," she added, laying down the paper; "but I'm so out of breath that I can't read any more, and you'll have to peruse it for yourselves."

There was an awkward silence for a moment after she had ceased speaking.

Josephine, watching her opportunity, when some of the guests were leaving, sought and found that paper, and slipped it unobserved into her pocket.

* * * * * * * *

In one of the rooms of a beautiful suite of apartments looking out upon St. James Square, a young girl sat by a window, looking out upon the passers-by in the street below.

It is our Star, fresh and beautiful as ever, but with something more of maturity and dignity in her bearing than when we last saw her.

She has been in London just one week, and is enjoying every day, despite the proverbial rain and fog, for she has returned to her native land ence more, and every inch of ground is replete with interest for her.

As she sits there in her handsome parlor, looking out upon the street, a door opens, and Jacob Rosevelt enters.

He looks younger and in better health than we have ever seen him before, while his face is animated and genial, as if life was at its brightest with him.

Star looked around as he entered.

"How quickly you have entered, Uncle Jacob," she said, rising, and going to meet him, and taking his hat.

"Yes; I knew you would be impatient for your letters, and, as there is quite a budget to be gone through with, I thought it best not to keep you in suspense."

As he spoke he drew from his capacious pocket half a dozen letters, and as many papers, which he had just received from the American Legation, and half of which he gave into Star's own hands.

She laid the papers, which, of course, were of minor importance, upon the table, and, sitting down in a low chair, carefully cut the ends of the envelopes, and was soon deep in the contents of her news from beyond the sea.

It took her nearly an hour to read them all.

After reading the letters she took up her papers in a listless way. But all at once she noticed that one was not a home paper; it bore the London postmark, and was addressed in a hand she did not recognize.

"It cannot be from Ralph Meredith," she said to herself, "for he does not know that I am here. Besides, it is not his handwriting. I wonder who could have sent it?"

She opened it with considerable curiosity, and yet with a feeling of foreboding at her heart.

The Cheshire Gazette, she read, as she espied the heading, and then her eye glanced down over the columns underneath.

Suddenly she started.

There is a paragraph marked.

Her eyes dilate—a look of horror comes into them; her lips grow pale, and she feels as if she is suffocating as she reads:

"MARRIED.—At the country residence of Lady Sherbrooke, on the 10th instant, Sir Archibald Sherbrooke and Lord Carrol, of Carrolton, to Miss Josephine Richards, of New York, U. S. A., and heiress presumptive to the Thornton estates in Devonshire, etc."

Could it be true? The paper dropped from her nerveless hands. Was the deed really done at last, and Archibald Sherbrooke lost to her forever?

She had not realized until that moment how much of hope had lived in her heart during all this time.

But these dreadful words had suddenly cut it down, as the sharp sickle cuts down the tender grass.

Had she really read them, or had her imagination played her some terrible trick?

Feeling as if she were turning to stone, she picked up the paper and compelled herself to go over the horrible sentence again.

"Yes, it was all true—it was as plain as print could make it. But what was this?

A new terror seized her—something that she had not thought of until now, she had been so stunned by the bare fact that her lover had married.

"Sir Archibald Sherbrooke and Lord Carrol, of Carolton!"

A mist comes over her eyes; her heart drops like a thing of lead in her bosom.

In an instant a suspicion of the truth flashed upon her.

Had she done her lover an irreparable wrong? she asked herself, with a feeling of despair. Had she driven him from her, taunting him with treachery and cowardice, and refusing to listen to his defense, when perhaps he had the best in the world to offer her?

Oh! if she had but heeded Mr. Rosevelt when he begged her to let him see him and learn the reason of his mysterious conduct. Oh! if she had only answered that advertisement and allowed him to come to her as he had entreated.

She had been cruel, unjust, wicked; and now it was too late to atone for it.

She felt as if bands of ice were being bound about her heart—as if coals of fire were heaped upon her brain, and branded upon it, in letters which would haunt her till her dying hour, those two names, Sir Archibald Sherbrooke and Lord Carrol, of Carrolton.

Familiar as she was with English customs, she could understand readily enough how he had become possessed of them, and it was so strange that she had never thought of it before.

In all her suffering upon learning, as she had supposed, that she had been betrayed, she had never endured pain like this; and, with her sight failing, her senses reeling, without sound or warning, she slipped from her chair to the floor, where she lay white and still in a lifeless heap at Jacob Rosevelt's feet.

CHAPTER XL.

STELLA'S MENTAL AGONY.

"Bless my soul! what does this mean?" Jacob Rosevelt cried, as, looking up from his own letters, in which he had been deeply absorbed, he saw the beautiful girl lying so white and still at his feet.

He rushed to the bell and rang it violently, then back again to Star, whom he lifted tenderly in his arms and laid her upon a sofa, where he began chafing her cold hands vigorously.

Mrs. Blunt soon made her appearance in answer to her master's summons, and looked as alarmed as himself to find the girl she loved so devotedly in such a critical state.

But Star's insensibility did not last long.

All too soon she awoke to a consciousness of this new misery.

"What is the matter?" she asked, as, opening her eyes, she found her fond friends bending anxiously over her.

"You had a fainting turn, dear; but you are better now," Mrs. Blunt returned, holding a glass of wine to her lips.

Star passed her hand across her forehead and sighed heavily, as she began slowly to gather up the broken threads of memory again.

"What was it, Starling?" Mr. Rosevelt questioned, with a troubled look at her white face; "did you have bad news in your letters?"

"No; there were no ill-tidings in my letters," she answered, avoiding his eye, and wishing to conceal, if possible, the cause of her swoon from him. "I read them through," she added, "and was opening my papers, when I began to feel queerly. I believe I never fainted but once before in my life."

But she shuddered as she remembered how Josephine Richards had been the cause of that ill-turn, also.

She sat up and tried to collect herself.

She still felt as if those icy bands were encircling her heart, and as if her brain was on fire; but she was anxious to get hold of that paper once more, and go away by herself.

She did not mean that Jacob Rosevelt should ever know that she had seen the notice of her lover's marriage; she meant to keep her secret locked close within her own breast, and not even let him suspect that she was still grieving for the man whose name had not been mentioned between them for over a year.

"I am afraid you are going to be ill," he said, noticing the great blue circles under her eyes with alarm.

"No; do not be anxious about me, Uncle Jacob," she returned, trying to smile. "I shall be all right again in a few minutes."

And she was, apparently.

She called all her will to her aid; she drank a full glass of wine, and soon felt much stronger, but oh! still so wretched and heartsick.

She arose after a while and began to move about the room, although both Mr. Rosevelt and Mrs. Blunt insisted that she was not able—that she ought to be still and rest all day.

But that paper was still lying upon the floor, with that marked paragraph staring her in the face.

She must get it and hide it, or they would learn all her trouble, and know how weak and foolish she was—how lacking in pride and self-respect to grieve thus after another woman's husband; and her lips curled with scorn at her own folly, while all the time the pain at her heart was growing more bitter.

Very quietly she gathered up her letters and papers, which had slipped to the floor when she fell.

With trembling fingers she folded that fatal sheet into the smallest compass, and tucked it slyly into her pocket; then laying the others on the table beside Mr. Rosevelt, she said:

"I do not think I will read any more now, Uncle Jacob; but perhaps you would like to look over these home papers. I will go and lie down for a little while, and try to sleep off my weakness."

He took her white face between his hands and looked anxiously into her eyes.

"My dear, my dear," he said, earnestly, "I hope you are not going to be sick; what should I do without you? You must take care of yourself for my sake, as well as for your own, my Star."

She smiled, and, taking one of the hands that held her face, touched her lips to it.

She was anxious to get away from his questioning eyes, and soon releasing herself from him, she sought her own room and locked herself in.

All day long she battled there with her tortured heart; all day long she fought with the love which she still bore Archie Sherbrooke, for it rose up stronger by a hundred-fold now that she had discovered that he was innocent of any wrong toward her, and realized her own cruel injustice to him.

If she had but opened and read more of that paper, she would have learned her error; but the moment she found herself alone, she took it from her pocket and threw it upon the glowing coals in the grate, and watched it while it burned to ashes. She was determined that Mr. Rosevelt should never see it.

All day long she lay upon her bed, and thought bitterly of Josephine as the proud and happy wife of Lord Carrol—as the mistress of his elegant home, the sharer of his position and title.

Oh! it was too cruel, when she had loved him so; when she knew that she could have made him so happy, while Josephine had only sought to win him from selfish and ambitious motives.

Five days they had been married.

It almost seemed as if she would have given as many years of her life to have saved him from such a fate as she believed would be his with that vain and heartless girl for his lifelong companion.

She had known nothing of the Richards coming abroad; that notice of Josephine's marriage had been the first intimation that she had had of it.

She wondered if she had not sent her that paper—if, having seen their names and address registered at the American Legation, she had not, from a spirit of cruel triumph, sent it to her to wound and humiliate her.

But she should never know how fully her vile purpose had been accomplished. She would hide her anguish deep within her own heart. Wherever she went she would appear with a bright face and smiling lips, and no one should dream that her heart lay like a withered thing in her bosom.

Mr. Rosevelt came in to see her several times during the day, and she always smiled and told him she was resting so as to be fresh for the evening.

Nine o'clock came, and Star Gladstone, a vision of bewildering beauty, entered the drawing-room of the United States minister's elegant residence, leaning on the arm of her distinguished-looking attendant.

There was a buzz of admiration as she crossed the threshold, as there always was wherever she appeared, for it was not often that even that place was graced by the presence of one so wondrously gifted with beauty.

"American ladies are noted for their beauty, I believe; but though I have met many, I have never yet seen a more exquisite face and form than that," said one gentleman to another, who stood leaning against the frame of the door through which Star and Mr. Rosevelt had passed but a moment before.

"You are right; but Gladstone, which is the young lady's name, sounds more English than American," returned the gentleman addressed.

"They are registered as Americans, however, and she has the peculiar beauty of one," said the first speaker. "They have a way of enhancing their charms, too, by their perfect taste in dress. Our English ladies, as a rule, do not understand the art of dressing well, though there are, of course, exceptions to the rule, as Miss Vivien Sherbrooke's charming costume over there testifies. By the way," he added, with more animation, "they say that that handsome young American—Meredith, they call him—is going to win our Cheshire beauty away from us."

He glanced, as he ceased speaking, across the room to where Miss Sherbrooke was sitting, while Ralph Meredith, in an attitude of devotion, was bending over her chair.

He was talking to her in a low tone, a smile on his handsome lips, a new light in his fine eyes, while she listened with drooping lids and flushed cheeks.

But chancing to glance up suddenly, Ralph started and uttered a low exclamation of surprise.

"Excuse me a few moments; I see friends," he said; and then leaving her hastily, he made his way quickly across the room.

"Miss Gladstone!" he cried, approaching and holding out his hand to her, his face all aglow. "I never was so happily surprised in my life! And here is Mr. Rosevelt, too! How does it happen that you are here? It seems almost like home to see home faces."

Star and Mr. Rosevelt greeted him most cordially, while Vivien Sherbrooke sat and watched them with wondering eyes.

"We hoped we should find you somewhere on our travels, for a familiar face makes the heart of the stranger glad, you know," Star said. "I received a letter from Grace today, and she writes: 'Be sure and hunt up Ralph, who is, without doubt, in London now.' But who is that pretty young lady across the room with the blush roses in her hair, and with whom I saw you talking as I came in?"

Mr. Meredith flushed again at this; but his eyes kindled as he glanced over at Vivien, and replied:

"Oh, that is an acquaintance that I have made since coming here. Come, and let me introduce you."

He purposely avoided mentioning her name, wishing to see how Star would receive the introduction.

"Miss Sherbrooke, allow me to make you acquainted with Miss Gladstone, a friend from beyond the sea; also Mr. Rosevelt. Miss Gladstone, Mr. Rosevelt—Miss Sherbrooke."

Ralph Meredith watched Star closely while he introduced and she exchanged greetings with Archibald Sherbrooke's sister; and although she might have appeared self-possessed to the casual observer, he noticed the quick catching of her breath as she heard the familiar name, and remarked the flush which leaped into her hitherto pale cheeks, and which, although pain had caused it, enhanced her loveliness tenfold.

"It is Archie's sister," Star said to herself, as their two white-gloved hands met, and a thrill of keenest pain shot through every nerve.

"How lovely she is!" she added. "Her eyes are like his in their expression, although not in color. Oh! I should have loved her, I know; and how rashly I have thrown all my happiness away!"

It needed all the power of her will to sustain her as she stood there beside Miss Sherbrooke, apparently so calm, and chatted with her for the next fifteen minutes; and Vivien never mistrusted the wild emotions which were surging in the heart of her new acquaintance, with whom she was exceedingly pleased.

"How perfectly charming she is!" she thought, as for a moment Star turned to speak to Ralph, and she studied her face more closely.

Then she started violently.

Surely she had seen that face somewhere before—those great, earnest blue eyes—that white forehead gleaming through a golden mist—that straight, delicate nose, and those beautiful red lips.

Yes, surely it was the face that her brother had painted when he was in America; only there was a look of pain in those eyes now that there had not been then; there were tense lines about the small, sweet mouth, and a seriousness about the whole countenance which told that the passing years since then had not been full of unalloyed pleasure.

It was the same, nevertheless, she felt convinced, and she resolved that she would find Archie, point Miss Gladstone out to him, and ascertain if she were right in her surmises.

"Perhaps," she thought, light suddenly break-

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

FOR several months I have wanted to say just a few words on the care of cemeteries, neglected, country cemeteries, but, somehow, the opportunity never presented itself. It is rather a difficult subject to bring up. One can't say, "Speaking of cemeteries," for people seldom speak of them. They may be willing enough to talk about their neighbors or their appendicitis or tonsils operation or the fact that when they go shopping they just naturally select the best things, "before I even ask what they cost,"—you know the people I mean—but cemeteries are not on their conversation list. A letter from Mrs. Knapp of Cameron, N. Y., opens the way for a plea for better cemeteries. Read her letter. It is worth while. What has been done in her town can be done in any town, and a well-kept cemetery gives strangers a better impression of a town and its people. The burial of loved ones is something no one likes to think about but since it must be it is comforting to know that you can make their resting place beautiful for them with a monument of grass and flowers.—Ed.

CAMERON, R. R. 2, N. Y.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a silent reader of COMFORT for many years and always turn to the Sisters' Corner first and read the letters from all over the United States but it seems to me there are more letters from the western states than from the eastern. I have never seen a letter from our town or any nearby towns, so will try my luck.

I want to tell you something of what the women in this place have done in the past year. As you drive through the country you will see so many cemeteries that are neglected, grown up to bushes, berries, etc. Well, that was just the way with our North Cameron cemetery, known as the French Cemetery, because in the first place it was part of a farm owned by a man by that name. Our ladies formed a society known as the Ladies' Aid. We went to work with a will and now we are known as The Work and Win Society. We meet the last Thursday in each month and serve dinner for fifteen cents each and in the last year we have done wonders to our cemetery. We hired a man to remove the wild rose bushes, berry bushes, weeds, etc., grade in and seed where needed and keep it mowed. We bought a lawn mower and this year it could be mowed with the lawn mower. We are proud of what we have done and what we have done others can do. We have good times at our dinners and good dinners so everyone is interested. At each meeting we have a grab bag and articles donated are worth five cents. We then pay five cents and grab. This furnishes a lot of fun. One man got a paper of safety pins and another a pair of earrings while one lady got a pipe and another a paper of tobacco and another a man's necktie. The money we get from the grab bag is put into our Sunshine Fund and used to purchase flowers, fruit, etc., for the sick. Our officers consist of President, Vice-President, Secretary and Treasurer and we work together with a united spirit and that means success.

I live on a farm two miles from the railroad station. We have many hills here but they are beautiful. My health is not very good. I have been sort of an invalid for years though scarcely ever sick in bed. Would be glad to receive letters and cards.

Sincerely, MRS. MARY G. KNAPP.

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

IT is the usual thing, I believe, in awarding a prize, to announce the conditions first and give all a chance to try for it, and that opportunity is now open to you, but for this month the prize, a COMFORT Sisters' Pin, goes to Mrs. Esther Miller, Belwood, Box 138, Nebr., for the best recipe. By "best" is meant the recipe that an inexperienced cook can successfully follow, the recipe that has the exact quantities given and minute instructions for putting together. Last month there was a recipe for pickles, giving correct quantity of tomatoes and spices and method of combining. That was all very well, then the writer went on, "add to cucumbers and onions," quite forgetting that she had not mentioned the required quantity of either. An experienced cook would just naturally know how much of each to use, but it isn't the experienced cook who uses this column the most. She doesn't need to, and for the benefit of the inexperienced cook everything must be as accurate and plain as possible. So many recipes have to be thrown into the wastebasket, or else tried out first in order to find out the correct quantity of the various ingredients, and all because the writer was a wee bit careless or perhaps she didn't understand the need for accuracy. Write your recipe as you would want it written if you didn't know a single thing about cooking. Who wins the pin next month?—Ed.

CREAMED BAKED POTATOES.—Take sliced potatoes, as for frying. Put a layer of potatoes in baking dish, sprinkle with salt, pepper and dots of butter, then more potatoes and repeat until dish is full. Cover with rich milk and put on top of stove until it begins to boil, then put in oven and bake. Stir occasionally. Bake until tender and then let brown on top.

MEAT BALLS.—If you have only a small quantity of meat, grind it with equal amount of crackers, add milk and beaten egg until soft enough to form balls. Fry. Leftover chicken can be used this way, and we like salmon and other fish prepared in this manner. —MRS. M. H. G., Illinois.

CHILI CON CARNE.—Cut one pound of round steak into very thin strips about one inch long and brown in beef fat. Skim out the meat into a baking dish, and add to the fat three small onions sliced thin, and cook until softened and slightly browned, stirring frequently. Add to the onion one can of tomato, two cups of stewed kidney beans drained from their liquor, one scant teaspoon of salt and one-fourth teaspoon of white pepper, and pour it over the meat in the baking dish. Bake three hours very slowly, adding a small green pepper cut into thin slices half an hour before it is done. Cover the top with hot mashed potato, and return to the oven until it is well puffed. Serve at once.

CHILI CON CARNE.

BEET SOUP.—Take two large or three medium-sized red beets, peel, wash, slice and cook in two quarts of water to which one teaspoon of vinegar has been added. Remove beets. Beat one egg, add one tablespoon flour, one teaspoon salt, one tablespoon vinegar, and one-half cup cold water. Stir so there are no lumps, pour into the boiling soup and let cook one minute. Serve with a little sweet or sour cream. A soup bone or scraps of leftover ham may be used for foundation. This is especially good for weak people.—MRS. G. GERHARDT, Hesperica, Mich.

CANNED MEAT.—Late in fall when the weather becomes cold, or during the winter, a porker, beef or sheep may be butchered. A portion of beef may be kept fresh by allowing to freeze and remain frozen. This improves it for frying. Slice thin and roll in flour and fry in hot fat. To cut the meat, cut it into cubes of size to go into fruit jar. For one-quart jars fill but half full and add one teaspoon of salt and pepper to suit taste, then fill jar with meat. Place an old jar ring on while cooking is going on to avoid wasting a good ring as new ones must be put on after cooking. The cooking process renders the ring unfit to keep the meat. Turn on a cover, just so the jar isn't sealed tight and there is a little play as you endeavor to lift up by the top. If sealed too tightly the jar is likely to burst. Arrange enough jars into holders or onto rack to cover bottom of boiler. Now pour cold water into boiler until it comes within two inches of jar rings. This gives boiling room. Place boiler on stove, keeping a good fire. When boiling point is reached, time it. It requires three hours boiling and as water boils down, more boiling water should be poured into it from teakettle to keep the same amount of water. If beef is an old one, four hours should be allowed for cooking. At this time remove cover of boiler and cap of one jar. Test with fork to see if meat is tender. If not, replace cover and cook until it is. Take out one jar at a time, remove old ring, replace with a new one and turn cap and seal tight. When cold, fat will rise to top which keeps it air-tight. Wash jars on outside and place in cellar for future use. To serve, I simply open a jar and empty contents into pan and set it in oven to brown. It is delicious. It can be warmed in frying-pan on top of stove. For small family it is best to use one-quart jars. Two-quart jars are desirable if one can use up the contents immediately in hot weather. If beef and pork are butchered at same time a mixture of beef and pork may be canned together and all trimmings which are not too fat may be put into sausage. What is too fat for sausage can be cut up for lard. Season the ground sausage meat with sage, salt and pepper and mix well. Fry a sample to taste. If not seasoned properly add whateyer is necessary and mix thoroughly again. Make into little flat cakes and fry. Put these into fruit jars or gallon syrup pails. Pour the hot fryings over it and add enough more hot lard to cover all. Seal jars or cover pails closely. When cold, remove to cellar for future use. This sausage and canned meat will come in very handy in such busy times as harvest, threshing or when unexpected company arrives, and is very good.—MRS. ESTHER MILLER, Bellwood, Box 138, Nebr.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Have you room in your circle for a lonely sister from this large city? I can hear a sister from some lonesome farm exclaim, "How can you complain of lonesomeness when you are living right among people? What would you do on our farm, miles from anyone?" Well, little farm sister, I am ready to exchange places with you any time you are. My father is a farmer preacher and my husband a city preacher and all I ever get of the farm is about one month a year when I visit my folks and how I do enjoy that month, and I don't only visit either. I work as well.

But let's forget our troubles here and enjoy each other's company while we can. Let's give a cheer for Mrs. Wilkinson and our great paper, COMFORT. I enjoy it immensely and can hardly await its arrival, and my husband enjoys it too. And isn't it great to have a COMFORT Pin. Let's all have one.

I like to read letters from sisters, telling what they do. I help my husband by having a sewing school for girls from eight to sixteen years of age. My school now has an enrollment of eighty girls. Then I have a girls' club of twelve; they get religious instruction, learn music and we read good books together and usually surprise the church with an entertainment given by them (their ages ten to sixteen), and the money taken is used for benevolent purposes. And when these girls give an entertainment the church is always crowded. Then I have the Ladies' Aid, teach the choir and act as church organist, besides doing my own work and being mother to two baby boys. You may wonder why I have to do all this. It is because we are working with Hungarian people and we have to teach them everything. I learned the language (am German born) and I love the people. Pay us a visit some Sunday. We have a band that my husband directs, two cornets, two altoes, two slide trombones, one baritone, one bass and tenor drum. If it weren't for the work I'd be mighty lonesome but as I am kept busy I get lonesome only occasionally.

To the little lady who asks about love at first sight, I'd like to say an emphatic Yes! The second time I saw my husband was on our wedding day and there isn't a happier couple than we are.

To the sister who signs herself "Troubled" my heart aches for you. But my dear, be patient. Be a good mother to your children and I am sure you will be repaid some day. Have you ever tried to pray? I'm a firm believer in prayer and I am so sure if you pray in Faith your prayer will be answered. Don't let this make your life bitter, surely you can find some joy in your babies. And I don't agree with you on remarriage. I know that it is hard for you to see differently from your own hard experience. I know of many second marriages that are happy.

If Mrs. Wilkinson cares to have them I will send some good Hungarian recipes.

Love to you all. MRS. ELISA S. MATUS.

Mrs. Matus.—Such a busy, helpful person as you are surely has no time to be lonesome. We'd like ever so much to have the Hungarian recipes. Thank you.—Ed.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

COMFORT Sisters' Corner is the most helpful, cheerful place I've found yet. It's just like a big family circle and reading the letters is like getting letters from home. Some of you won't like my letter but if we were all of the same opinion and wrote just the same the letters wouldn't be very helpful or interesting.

I like to have a neat house and I like real cleanliness and comfort. But we are not all situated so we

SALMON CHOWDER.—Mince fine one can of salmon. Have ready leftover potatoes, sliced thin. Put a layer of crackers, broken into small pieces, on bottom of pan, cover with a layer of potatoes, then a layer of salmon, salt and pepper each layer, until pan is full. Pour milk over until it covers salmon, dot with butter, and bake in hot oven one hour or more.—MRS. RIGGLE, Nebr.

TOMATO DUMPLINGS.—Put one pint of canned tomatoes in a stew kettle. Add one-quarter cup sugar, one-half teaspoon salt, butter size of an egg and a pinch of soda. Let cook while the dumplings are being made, while boiling drop the dumplings in quickly, place cover on kettle and do not remove it for twenty minutes. Have ready one teaspoon corn-starch dampened with milk and when dumplings are removed stir the corn-starch into the remaining tomatoes; when thick pour over the dumplings and serve while hot. Dumplings: one-half cup milk, a little salt, one egg, well beaten, one teaspoon baking powder and enough flour to make dough stiff enough to drop from spoon.—MRS. M. B. C., Arizona.

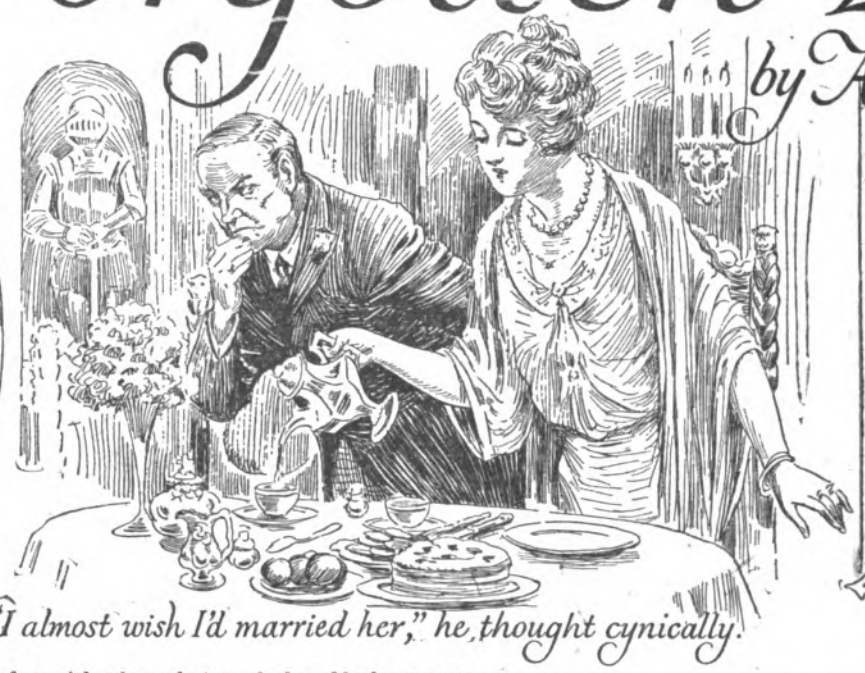
BAKED RICE PUDDING.—One-half cup rice, one-quarter teaspoon salt, one-third cup sugar, sprinkling of grated nutmeg and one quart of hot milk. Scald the milk. Wash the rice and put it with salt, sugar and nutmeg into a buttered baking dish and pour on the hot milk. Bake from three to four hours in a moderate oven or until rice is soft and pudding is creamy. Stir it with a fork every five minutes until the last half hour, then allow it to brown.—ERMA MORGAN, Sanford, Miss.

BRAN MUFFINS.—Two cups bran, two cups white flour, two teaspoons salt, two cups sour milk, or buttermilk, one-half cup sugar, one tablespoon shortening, one egg, one-half teaspoon soda, two teaspoons baking powder and one-half cup water. Beat shortening, egg and sugar together until creamy. To sour milk add the soda dissolved in hot water, then the bran, flour, salt, baking powder and the egg and sugar mixture. Mix thoroughly and put into buttered gem pans. Bake in hot oven for twenty minutes.

SUPPER PUFFS WITH SYRUP.—Measure one even cup of flour after sifting, add one quarter of a teaspoon of salt and sift again. Measure one cup of milk, add part of it to the flour very slowly and stir until a smooth paste is formed. Beat the yolk of one egg until a light yellow and then beat in the remainder of cup of milk. Lastly add the white of one egg which has been beaten to a stiff froth. Bake in hot buttered cups or gem pans in quick oven for half an hour, or until well puffed and brown.

SUPPER PUFFS WITH SYRUP.

SYRUP.—Melt one cup of brown sugar (granulated will do) with one tablespoon of water in a frying-pan, and stir until it becomes a rich brown color. Add one cup of boiling water and simmer three minutes with stirring. When cold add half a teaspoon of vanilla.



BAKER'S CUSTARD PIE.—Beat the yolks of three eggs to a cream. Stir thoroughly one tablespoon of sifted flour into three tablespoons of sugar; this separates the particles of flour so there will be no lumps. Add this to beaten yolks of eggs with pinch of salt and one teaspoon of vanilla, and a little grated nutmeg. Add next the well-beaten whites of eggs, one pint of milk, scalded but not boiled, then cooled. Mix the milk in slowly. Have ready a deep pie tin lined with pastry. Fill with custard and bake twenty or twenty-five minutes.—MRS. M. WIDMAN, Cleveland, Ohio.

CHAPTER I.

A PACKAGE OF LETTERS.

THE November storm drove hard at the shabby old house set in its few acres of sodden fields, which had been all the home the two motherless daughters of Tom Hamilton had ever known. Tom Hamilton, who had been born to a princely estate in the next county, and had died in the streets of London, drunken and in rags, having long ago turned over his two girls to the care of Miss Jane Archer, once a housekeeper at his father's house.

Miss Jane, as the children called her, did her best by them, having always idolized "poor Master Tom." She had money, and she spent it royally on her charges, sending them to school in Cheltenham, and teaching them in the holidays to make wax flowers and embroider handkerchiefs—poor accomplishments to face the world with—when death came suddenly for the old woman and left two grown-up girls to live as best they might.

For, at Miss Jane's death came a thunderclap. Her money had been sunk in an annuity; the very house that sheltered Tom Hamilton's daughters was only held on a lease that in two months would expire. All they had in the world was forty pounds a year, the last dregs of that great fortune which had been their father's. He had died before he could spend that, or they would have been beggared indeed.

The prospect was not a gay one, even for Jacqueline Hamilton, whom Miss Jane always considered indecently brave for a girl and unlikely ever to get a husband, since she had "no little confiding ways, such as being afraid of cows!"

As for Gillian, the elder girl by two years—the wiser by a terrible six-months' stay with her out-at-the-elbows father in London, when rheumatic fever had him by the heels—a terror of the future had overmastered her. It woke her up at night in a cold sweat of panic.

Two half-educated, wholly useless girls, and only forty pounds a year between them and the nightmare streets of London! Not nearly a pound a week to throw to those gray wolves of hunger and cold that would crouch sternly at their door. Night after night the girl thought desperately while Jacqueline slept calmly by her side. Day after day she walked the low, ugly valley by the river, where the cattle shivered in the autumn fields. And in one of these aimless walks a solution of her problem came to Gillian Hamilton; in the daytime she thought it fell from heaven, in the night she was not so sure.

She grew thin in those days, and got a queer look in her eyes. She said to herself that it was because her sister hotly and scornfully refused to have anything to say to the comfortable, easy life that had been offered them; that was quite enough to make you wake up crying every morning. But Gillian knew more of life than Jacky. When Mr. Marchmont, whom she had seen sometimes at her father's—a strange associate for that untidy wreck—had met her in the dripping fields and told her that he had bought her father's old home, Hamilton Place, and was willing and anxious to adopt both his daughters, the girl dared not say no.

Jacqueline said no outright; but in the conversation she let out that the desire of her heart was to go to London and learn indexing. There was a fortune in it, and she could live with a school friend who was at it already. That settled it for Gillian.

Jacky should have all their fortune, and she would go and live with Mr. Marchmont. It was not the comfort, nor the house, nor the money that decided her; but that was the only way she saw for her to live without dragging Jacky down to the awful poverty she had seen enough of in London to fear and dread. She thought of the presents she could give her little sister; the home that would always be open to her—once Gillian was installed in it—if the indexing plan failed.

As for Mr. Marchmont, fifty years old, intolerably well dressed and handsome in a small, old way, she thought of him as little as possible. It was out of the question, of course, for a girl to feel a hidden terror of a small, elderly man, with polished manners and a fashion of kissing her hand when he met her.

Tonight was their last night in the old home. Gillian rose from her packing of the fine, new dressing-bag which had been one of Mr. Marchmont's many gifts, and wondered why she had no pleasure in its silver fittings.

The room, as the girl looked round it for things which might have been forgotten, was almost empty. They had sold all the furniture by auction the day before, and most of it had been taken away. By this time tomorrow there would not be a stick remaining, but it did not matter; she and Jacky would be gone. One to hard work and scanty fare, the other to idleness and ease. Gillian for one moment thought that Jacky had chosen the better part; then she stamped her foot sharply.

"You fool!" she said to herself. "You know you can't work. Would you go and be a burden on Jacky? You dare not do anything but go with Mr. Marchmont. To refuse his offer would be madness—wicked, selfish madness!"

She moved hastily to the rattling, drafty window, where the last daylight was wan. There was one thing more to do before the old life should be dead and buried—only one thing.

She pulled a packet of letters from her pocket, and as she looked at it her strained, young face changed horribly, till it was the face of a woman bidding good by to love and life rather than that of a girl whom fortune had suddenly remembered. With both hands she crushed the letters to her lips, while tears poured down her cheeks.

"Oh, my love!" she cried sharply, under her breath. "Oh, my love!"

She read the notes through, as if she did not know them by heart, crouching in the rainy twilight. They were only notes; they might have been read on the housetops and a listening world would have laughed at the idea of their being love-letters. But to Gillian, who knew what was behind the everyday sentences, they were the round world and all that therein is.

She dropped her head on the window-sill, and was deaf to everything but the echo of a careless voice she would never hear again. She never stirred as Jacqueline came in and stood gazing at her.

"What are you doing?" asked a high, young voice full of wonder. "Tea's ready! I made muffins, because it was our last night, and—— Why, Gill, my Gill, you're crying! What's the matter?"

"Nothing," sobbed Gillian, but the old, old lie was useless in the sharp ears of Jacky Hamilton. She knelt down and got both her strong, young arms round those quivering shoulders.

"Gill," she tried, "tell me quick! Aren't you happy? Don't you want to go with that nasty, old man. For you shan't stir a step, if you don't want to. We'll go out and scrub sooner."

"Don't talk nonsense!" A sob seemed to tear at Gill's very heart. It isn't that. And how do you know he is a nasty, old man? You've never even seen him."

Jacqueline had obstinately refused to meet Mr. Marchmont on the two occasions on which he had visited their house.

"I have seen him," she returned slowly, unexpectedly; "I saw him through the crack of the drawing-room door the last time he was here, and I think he is a bad, horrid, old wretch. I don't believe in his kindness one bit! Why does he want to burden himself with you, if he has no need to? You aren't an heiress; you can't do anything for him?"

"He doesn't need it; he's rich," wonderingly.

"All the same, there's something behind his kindness," Jacky mused aloud. "I saw him look at you when your face was turned away, and I didn't like his eyes. You don't know anything about him, either! Oh, Gill! Think again. Don't go with him!"

"I must, now. And I do know about him. He used to come and see father——"

"Every disreputable man in London used to go and see father. You said so yourself."

"He wasn't like them. I wondered why he came always; and I know he is rich and has bought Hamilton Place, for it was in all the papers when he bought it. There isn't anything against him, Jacky, really; it's only that you don't like him."

"I hate him, and I wouldn't sit in the room with him! But if he turns out kind, and you like him, I'll go and see you, if he asks me. Anyhow, Gill, if you're not happy, you won't stay, will you? You promise me to send for me at once, or come to me? You won't let any nonsense about making me poor stop you? It isn't leaving me that makes you cry, is it?"

"I hate leaving you—but——" She had stopped crying; her face was self-contemptuous and very hard; "I was crying because I'm a fool!"

Jacqueline's keen, blue eyes fell on the crushed letters in Gillian's hand.

"There was someone then, when you were in London. "I thought so always," she said shrewdly. "Oh, Gill, if Mr. Marchmont is coming between you and anyone else, let him go—stick to the man you care for!"

Gillian, who was always so gentle, caught her sharply by the arm.

"Hush!" she cried; "hush, Jacky! You kill me. I can't—stick to him—he doesn't want me."

Jacky sniffed.

"How do you know?" she asked, looking incredulously at the lovely, bent head, though it was too dark to see the copper light in the heavy brown hair; "I don't believe it."

"Oh, it's quite true! He did not give me any room to doubt it. He came often to see father. He loved me. I was"—she stopped as if the word choked her, and went on—"engaged to him. But father didn't know it—no one did. I came home, and he wrote to me; but he kept saying it was a secret, and I only minded because of you. I begged him to let me tell you, and he wrote," a slow crimson covered her set face, "that it was all done. He could not have me—for his wife." Afterward Jacky remembered the odd wording of that sentence. "I was to forget him. That's all, Jacky. I never heard from him again."

"Then he was a beast! The sooner you forget him the better."

Gillian laughed, and the sound of it was not good.

"He was all the earth and all of heaven to me," she said deliberately. "You may as well hear the truth while you're about it. Tomorrow I'm going to begin a new life, and forget him; you see, going to Mr. Marchmont had very little to do with my crying. Come on down to tea."

"What was his name?" Jacky Hamilton's eyes were curiously dark.

"His name? It doesn't matter; he has no name for me, any more," her sweet voice was dull. She held out the letters. "Burn them for me," she said piteously, and led the way downstairs.

Jacky shoved the letters into her pocket distastefully, and stood whistling a tune; she always whistled when she was angry.

"If ever I meet that man he shall pay for his hatefulness to my Gill," she thought, frowning. "I hate him, and when I hate people it isn't good for them."

She went down, whistling still, for her heart was very heavy.

As for the letters, it was months before she thought of them again; and then they wrung her heart long past tears.

CHAPTER II.

A GOLDEN CAGE.

Three months after Gillian Hamilton stood once more by a window, staring out into the chilly dusk. She was changed, as by a miracle, from the girl who had parted from her only sister in bitter tears. She was a fine lady now; but her eyes looked years older. Life at Hamilton Place with Mr. Marchmont was a very different thing from what it had been in her thoughts.

"I'm a slave; an expensive adjunct to a gorgeous house!" she thought. "I wish I were starving, and free. I can't see why on earth he adopted me. He doesn't like me. I wish there had not been that burglary at Lord Hollis.' It frightens me to think of burglars in this huge, lonely house."

She pushed back her veil impatiently.

Oh, Jacky had been right to keep out of Mr. Marchmont's sight. He was a bad man, cruel to the core, kind though he was. If only she had listened to Jacky!

To her surprise, no one in the county knew any more of him than she did. He was rich and appeared from space, that was all. But invitations were showered on them; and Gillian never imagined that the great reason of Mr. Marchmont's easy acceptance in county society was his much-talked-of kindness to Tom Hamilton's daughter. Mr. Marchmont knew, and smiled contentedly at his own cleverness.

Gillian started as he came into the room. He liked to find her at this hour seated in a gorgeous tea-gown, ready to receive visitors, a lovely sumptuous figure in the light of the silver lamps.

"I beg your pardon. I thought you were ready," Mr. Marchmont was standing in the doorway with an air of polite surprise. You are not going out, surely?"

Gillian glanced quietly down at her heavy velvet gown, her sealskin coat. Her picture hat suddenly weighed on her head like a discovered crime.

"Out?" she stammered. "Oh, no! I'm sorry, Mr. Marchmont; I was thinking and I forgot the time. Please pour out your tea. I will just take off my things."

"Please take the time to change your dress." He drew out his watch. "I can wait ten minutes." He crossed the room and rang the bell. "We can have fresh tea."

"I wish you would scold me, or let me have my tea as I am," she said with a lump in her throat.

"We are not coster-mongers, my dear Gillian," he said, with that neat, polished accent which was grating on her nerves. "I shall, of course, wait for you."

Gillian vanished, like a cowed dog, to reappear in an incredibly short time, the folds of her old-rose gown floating behind her, its lace collar cut to show her round, white throat encircled with the rows of pearls which Mr. Marchmont never liked to see her without after five in the afternoon. His fondness for jewels was a passion.

He looked at his adopted daughter as she poured the tea into the gold-lined Sevres cups, her smooth, white hands heavy with rings.

She was more than pretty as she sat there, the smooth waves of her dark hair full of copper lights, her lovely, chiseled face bent down a little as she looked at the teacups. Her delicate, dark eyebrows pleased him with their exquisite line, and her lashes, dark against her cheeks. She was more lovely than when he had first seen her, though it was a pity she did not smile oftener; few girls had such teeth.

"I almost wish I'd married her," he thought cynically. "Then I should not have to be so damnable careful about keeping my temper. She is more of a fool than I imagined; if she was only level-headed—we could make millions. Who could have thought that Tom Hamilton's daughter would be—conventional!" his upper lip quivered in a wondering sneer.

Gillian shrank a little under his eyes. If only he would be less punctiliously kind, more human, she could like him. And yet, she did not know. There were things about the house as well as the man himself that frightened her—small, inexplicable things that gave her a feeling of being a prisoner in a sumptuous jail.

"You seem languid. Was your drive too much for you?"

"My drive?" hastily. "No; oh, no!" How she hated those stately drives in the smoothly-rolling Victoria, while every drop of her young blood pined for exercise! Yet with Jacky to talk to, she could have loved them.

Mr. Marchmont had a way of sitting in silence, leaning back with closed eyes; she had soon learned that he did not want her to speak to him.

She took up the handkerchief she was embroidering for Jacky, and began to sew nervously.

Poor, little, brave Jacky! working hard at her indexing in London, with sometimes only bread and butter for dinner! If it were not for taking half that scanty bread and butter, Gillian would have turned her back on Mr. Marchmont and his money forever.

She looked at the untouched cakes on the tea-table—if only she could send them to Jacky! For it had been all a dream, that thought of sending Jacky presents; she never had a penny.

All her dresses were ordered for her. She could not even buy a stamp, and she sometimes wondered if those letters she laid on Marchmont's table to be stamped ever went to Jacky at all.

"You work very well," Marchmont said suddenly. "Let me see your monogram." The handkerchief was in his quick, dexterous hand almost before she knew it.

"It's a name, not a monogram," she flushed quietly—for, had she not picked her initials out of her best handkerchiefs to mark them over for Jacky?

"Jacqueline," read Mr. Marchmont; then he handed back the handkerchief. "She has fine linen for a girl with her income." His voice was quite as usual; but she saw he knew what she had done. She took her courage in both hands.

"I've so many," she pleaded, "and she has so few."

"She could have the same," he returned indifferently; "it is her own fault that she is poor."

"I know"—a little wildly—"you would have been good to both of us. But I'm so unhappy without Jacky. Could I have her here to stay, only for a little while, or might I go to her?"

Mr. Marchmont put his hand over his mouth; it was a way he had when he was displeased.

"Considering that I am quite aware of your sister's opinion of me," he said stiffly, "and why she refused my offer to adopt her, perhaps you can see why I have no desire for her society, any more than she has for mine. Kindly let that be final, my dear Gillian! In everything else, you know, I am only too pleased to give you your own way."

"Do you mean I am never to see Jacky any more?" She stood up, aghast.

"I mean I see no necessity," firmly, "for her coming here." Two girls would not suit his book at all now; one was boring enough, well as she was serving his purpose.

"Then let me go to her," her proud lips trembling.

"And live on her, and her forty pounds a year," he said slowly. "Do you realize what that would mean, Gillian?"

She shivered; she knew too well. Jacky might keep her head above water alone, with Gillian to keep—never. She was caught hard and fast in this gorgeous cage she had made for herself; a cage some instinct told her hid something hideous, wicked, ordinary as it looked.

"You see?" he said gently. "And if I were you, I should not imagine horrors about your sister. A girl with the brains I suppose her to have will never starve in London."

She flung up her head at the deadly significance his voice lent the words; staring at him in horror, her eyes blank, her lips white with sudden passion. He saw the first only, not the last, and felt he had dealt well with this fit of rebellion.

"If you want to please your sister," he continued affably, "you can send her that prune-colored gown that does not suit you; though it is properly a perquisite of your maid's."

"I will send her nothing of yours." Her voice was even dull. "But as for my maid, that gown does not concern her. She is going to leave me. That burglary the night we left Lord Hollis' has frightened her."

"Has she perhaps a diamond tiara?" Mr. Marchmont started angrily. "The robbery did not worry her any more than if it had happened in London. Our visit was over; we were at home, out of the way—thank goodness!—for there is nothing so thoroughly abominable as to be in a house at the time of a jewel robbery. Let the girl go at once. I won't have her shaking your nerves with penny-dreadful stories."

"Who do you think did it?" Gillian said nervously. "You don't think they'll come here, do you?"

"Tramps, who are certain to be caught," shortly. "The whole affair was ridiculous. They only stole a few two-penny half-penny rings."

"Because Lady Hollis was brave, and struggled and screamed——"

"A foolish, hysterical thing to do," he cut her short; "better lose all you have than risk your life like that. If your maid has nothing better to do than enlarge on such topics, the sooner she goes the better. You can get another maid."

For a moment she looked at him, her eyes no longer blank.

"I can get another maid," she repeated with a curious intonation. "I have heard of one, if her references are satisfactory to you."

"Settle that with Mrs. Gibbs," he returned shortly. He let everything to the smart, showy housekeeper, who scarcely took the trouble to hide her dislike of Gillian. "Only do it at once."

He rose with that manner which always seemed mocking, as well as deferential, to open the door for her as she passed out; but he did not look at her or he might have seen a new strength in her face.

"I will have a new maid," she said to herself as she went up the wide, polished stairs to her room; "someone Mr. Marchmont never saw. I must—I can't bear this any longer! If only I had not signed those papers giving him legal guardianship over me till I'm twenty-one, I would go away. But he would get me back again. And I have no money, anyhow. I can't go!"

She passed an unshuttered window, and stopped to close and bar it. The robbery of the house where they had been staying had shaken her nerves.

Lady Hollis had been at the point of death after a desperate struggle with a masked man, who had got but little, thanks to her courage. She was a kind woman, Lady Hollis; and Mr. Marchmont had not even seemed sorry for her.

"I wonder if he would be sorry for me," Gillian thought, with a little shiver. She did not care a straw for her own jewels, but the great house was curiously lonely at night, and her own rooms very isolated.

She wondered afresh why Marchmont had adopted her, as she stood in front of her glass taking off those pearls and laces for which she had sold her birthright and freedom. For her-

USING THE FALL APPLES

By Violet Marsh

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IT is during the autumn season that the finest flavored apples are obtained for cooking and canning. The fall apples are also very juicy, and their tender, spicy skins will cook as soft as the rest of the apple.

The old saw, "An apple a day keeps the doctor away," is not without merit, for the apple, besides its nutritive value, possesses tonic and regulative properties that have a positive health-sustaining action. Raw or cooked it is especially valuable to be eaten with meat, fish, eggs, beans, peas, lentils or other nitrogenous foods. The apple can well take its place as a nourishing tonic, for among all the dishes made from fruits none other so well fills the need for something both refreshing and appetizing, or is so dependable as well made stewed apple sauce, or apples properly baked and pleasing to the eye as well as to the taste, or one of those jellied apple pies that melt in the mouth. There are also numerous other dishes wherein apples are used for little more than a flavoring, for they give a winy, pleasant taste that blends well with many other flavors.

SOUTHERN SWEETS.

I cannot too strongly urge the housewife to fill her empty jars with early apples, both whole and sliced, for you will have a product that possesses a fine texture, color and flavor not to be obtained from storage fruit. For drying purposes the later varieties are preferable as these have a higher content of sugar and less starch.

To Detect Spoilage in Canned Food

The time is not far off when we shall begin to use the canned foods with which we have filled our shelves and to wonder if they have "kept" as we intended they should. Since the method of cooking the food in the jars has come into use, most failures are caused by a defective seal, usually due to the covers not fitting the jars or having uneven surfaces that cause tipping. Rubbers that do not fit properly are also a source of defective sealing. The rubber that fits goes into place readily, but if it is a little small and must be stretched into place, the rubber will lose in thickness and elasticity and may cause an imperfect seal.

Very often spoilage is accompanied by the formation of much gas which is plainly visible through the glass jar, or which, if it occurs in tin, causes the ends of the can to bulge, or "swell." In other cases, however, there is no gas formed and the product may appear to be in good condition as far as the inspection of the closed container is concerned, but upon opening it may be found that the flavor is unduly sour, or disagreeable in some other way, so that the product cannot be safely used at all. Those types of spoilage in which there is formation of acid without gas or bubbles is called "flat-sour."

APPLE WHIPS.

When opening a jar it should require the application of some force to remove the top, for the sealing of the jar while the contents are boiling hot results in the formation of a partial vacuum, and if the seal remains perfect the pressure of the surrounding atmosphere holds the cover down. Similarly, the tin can should be flat or slightly drawn in at the ends when cool. Any canned food which has conspicuously softened or has become mushy to an extent not warranted by the cooking process to which it was subjected should not be eaten.

Autumn Apple Recipes

CANNED BAKED APPLES.—Wipe and core tart apples of uniform size. Make a syrup, using two measures of water to one and a half of sugar, and boil it fifteen minutes. Arrange a layer of apples closely together in an agate pan, and use sufficient syrup to come about half way up the sides. Bake in a moderately hot oven, basting frequently to prevent the apples from breaking. When done, carefully lift into sterilized jars, first a layer of apples and then enough syrup from the pan to fill all crevices. Repeat until jars are filled. If the syrup in the baking pan is insufficient to fill jars, finish with the plain syrup used boiling hot. It is well to estimate about how many jars the apples and syrup will fill so as to use the same amount of plain syrup in each jar. Partly seal, place in hot water bath and cook fifteen minutes after the water begins to boil. Seal and set in a dark, cool closet.

Apples may be pared and cored and stewed in a syrup until clear and transparent, and then canned as above described.

APPLE PIE FILLING.—Select firm sound apples. Take off a thin peeling, then cut into halves and core. Drop the apples into very cold slightly salted water to prevent tarnishing. Cover the peels and cores at once with cold water, cook twenty minutes and strain. While the peels are cooking remove the apples from the salted water and cut the halves in two, put into a preserving kettle with a small amount of water, cover closely, quickly bring to a boil and set back where they will steam cook while the syrup is being prepared. Take the strained juice, bring to a boil and add an equal amount of sugar and cook eight minutes. Pack the steamed apple closely into sterilized jars and when all are filled divide the syrup evenly between the jars, using a knife blade down the sides to make sure the syrup fills all vacancies. If the syrup is insufficient to fill the jars, finish with plain syrup. Using a syrup made from the peelings and cores adds a rich flavor. Cook 30 minutes in a hot water bath.

CANNED APPLE SAUCE.—Wipe and cut apples into slices without peeling or coring. Add water to just cover and cook rapidly until soft. Press through a wire strainer and add sugar to taste. Cook ten minutes, adding boiling water if too thick. Pour boiling hot into hot jars, and cook ten minutes in a hot water bath after the water begins to boil. Seal.

APPLE GLACE.—Select large red apples that are firm and tart, core and peel them about one-third of the way down from the stem end. Place the apples in an agate dish that can be closely covered. For eight apples make a syrup by boiling one and a quarter cup of sugar with two cups of water for five minutes, pour it over the apples, cover and bake in a fairly hot oven until tender but not broken, basting frequently. Remove the cover, sprinkle about a teaspoon of sugar over the peeled portion of each apple, increase the oven heat and bake uncovered until the tops have browned, basting occasionally.

JELLIED APPLES.—Into a stew-pan put one and a quarter cup of sugar, one slice of lemon, one-half teaspoon of cinnamon, one-fourth teaspoon of ginger and two cups of cold water, and simmer ten minutes. Add one rounding quart of tart apples, measured after they have been peeled, cored and cut into eighths. Simmer closely covered until tender, then carefully skim out the apple and place it in a serving dish. Add to the syrup one tablespoon of lemon juice, a very little of the grated rind and two tablespoons of granulated gelatine that has soaked in half-a-cup of cold water while the apples cooked. There should be about one pint of syrup, but if not, add hot water to make this quantity, remove the slice of lemon and pour over the apple. Set away to stiffen. Serve with whipped cream.

APPLE WHIP. Soak two level tablespoons of gelatine in five tablespoons of cold water twenty minutes and then beat it into two cups of hot apple sauce to which a little extra sweetening has been added. The apple sauce should be creamy and fairly thin. Beat the sauce and gelatine frequently until cool, then add one tablespoon of lemon juice, a little grated nutmeg and about three drops of extract of rose, beat and set away to stiffen. Before serving, fold in one cup of whipped cream. Sprinkle shredded cocoanut over the top that has been previously steamed until soft.

APPLE KUCHEN.—Scald two and one-half cups of milk and let it become lukewarm. Take one-half cup of the cooled milk in which to dissolve one yeast-cake, then return to the whole with one teaspoon of sugar. Beat in three and one-half cups of sifted flour until the mixing spoon will leave the batter clean. Let rise, taking care it does not fall in center, then add four whole eggs and the whites of two well beaten, one tablespoon of sugar, one teaspoon of salt and one-third of a cup of softened butter. Beat well and add flour until the consistency of a cake mixture. Cover and set in a warm place until double in bulk, cut down and spread thin in shallow tins. Cut apples into eighths, cover the cake uniformly with them, sprinkle with sugar and a little cinnamon and bake in a fairly quick oven.

APPLE AND CORN-MEAL PUDDING.—Pour boiling water over two cups of corn-meal until it is thoroughly wet. Stir in one-third cup of molasses, one-half teaspoon of cinnamon, one-fourth teaspoon of ginger, one even teaspoon of salt and half a teaspoon of soda dissolved in warm water. Thin out the mixture with warm water until it will pour from the dish. Cut three tart apples into eighths and remove the cores but do not peel. Put mixture and apples into a well-buttered pail in layers, cover tightly, set into boiling water on a holder that will keep it off the bottom of kettle and boil three hours. Do not allow the water to stop boiling as it will make soggy rings in the pudding. Serve with thin cream.

Baker's Cocoa

is the ideal drink for growing children

Not only does its delicious flavor and aroma appeal to the palate but it supplies the body with a considerable amount of pure, wholesome and nutritious food.

Children, owing to their almost ceaseless activity, frequently require as large an amount of nourishment as adults, and good cocoa is a valuable aid in the carefully arranged diet. But its quality must be good and no cocoa can quite so well meet the requirements of dietitian, physician, nurse or housekeeper as "BAKER'S"

APPLE CUSTARD.—Pare and core six or seven tart apples. Fill each cavity with sugar, add about one-eighth teaspoon of butter and half a teaspoon of lemon juice. Bake in a fairly hot oven. Beat the yolks of three eggs, add three tablespoons of sugar, a very little salt and beat again. Now add to the egg mixture two cups of scalding milk, stir and pour it over the baked apples and return to the oven to thicken which will take but a short time. Cool. Beat the whites of three eggs until foamy but not stiff, gradually add three tablespoons of sugar and beat until stiff. Spread over the apples, set the dish on a board in the oven to prevent further cooking of the custard, and cook the meringue about seven minutes in a moderate heat.

APPLE PIE.—Line a deep pie tin with good pastry which should hang over the edge one inch. Wash and wipe apples, cut into eighths without paring and core. Arrange the pieces of apple around the edge and then over the bottom of plate, heaping the plate considerably if a thick pie is desired. Mix one teaspoon of flour with one scant cup of sugar if the apples are juicy, add a few gratings of nutmeg and a little cinnamon. Pour over the apples and dot with bits of butter. Roll the top crust quite thin, set the pie plate onto it and crease the exact size of the outer edge and cut. Fold once and cut openings for the steam to escape. Place over the pie, moisten the edge with cold water, and turn the under crust over the top, gently pressing it into place. Place the pie in a hot oven, gradually reducing the heat to moderate, and bake one hour. Apple pies require long cooking and should be made thick.

VINEGAR FROM APPLE CORES AND PARINGS.—Put all the trimmings in a stone crock as they are made, covering with cold water and adding one cup of molasses to each gallon of water. Keep in a warm place covered with a cloth. When the desired amount is obtained, soften a yeast-cake with a little cold water, spread it on a slice of bread, then tie it in a piece of white cloth and place yeast side down in the crock. After fermentation ceases, strain and bottle.

October Recipes

OVEN-BROILED CHICKEN.—Split chicken down the back and clean. Have a good head of steam in your steamer kettle, and lay the chicken in the steamer and steam half an hour. Remove from steam, baste thoroughly with butter, sprinkle lightly with salt and dredge with flour. Lay in a large shallow baking tin and cook in a very hot oven until tender and brown. Turn frequently and baste with melted butter if necessary. Steaming prevents the thin layers of meat from drying, and the whole chicken will be juicier.

BREADED VEAL CUTLETS WITH SLICED TURNIP.—Trim the skin from the veal. Lightly beat an egg and add to it four tablespoons of milk and a pinch of salt. Roll the cutlets in fine dry bread-crumbs, then in the egg and again in the crumbs. Quickly brown in good cooking fat, turning from side to side, then set the frying-pan back, cover and cook slowly until tender. Cut new tender turnips into slices and boil until tender. Dip the slices into melted butter and set in a hot oven for five minutes.

LIVER SAUSAGE.—Select nine pounds of fresh pork with fat and lean quite evenly mixed. Cut into two-inch pieces, put into a baking dish without water, and bake two hours closely covered in a moderate oven. Drain from the fat while hot, then grind through the food chopper, using the fine cutter. Cut three pounds of fresh liver into strips and grind through the food chopper. Mix pork and liver with one-half cup of salt, two tablespoons of finely-sifted sage and one tablespoon of white pepper, and again grind it. Fill skin three-quarters full, boil one hour, hang to dry in a well-screened place, then smoke four days. For immediate use, the sausage meat is delicious made into flat cakes and fried brown in plenty of fat. Liver will not keep many hours off the ice, so there must be no delay in handling. After smoking, these sausages are cooked, and to serve need only to be heated in boiling water, or, better still, steamed hot.

BAKED ONIONS.—Peel and quarter ten good-size onions and arrange in deep baking dish. Dot with two tablespoons of butter or four tablespoons of very thick cream. Sprinkle with one scant tablespoon of sugar, one scant teaspoon of salt, one-eighth teaspoon of paprika, or a dash of cayenne pepper. Cover closely and cook in their own steam until soft and tender which will usually require about one and a half hour.

POTATOES WITH BACON.—Select medium-size potatoes. Cut off about an inch-thick slice from the top, and scoop out a cavity large enough to hold a slice of well-smoked breakfast bacon. Add a sprinkling of paprika, a little butter, and then replace the top, holding it in place with a toothpick through each side.

SOUTHERN SWEETS.—Scrub five good-size sweet potatoes and boil hard until soft. Peel and cut into lengthwise slices half an inch thick. Arrange in a well-buttered shallow pan, sprinkle with salt and half a cup of brown sugar. On each slice place a bit of butter, and over all squeeze the juice of half a lemon. Brown in a hot oven.

TOMATOES STUFFED WITH BAKED BEANS.—Cut a small slice from the stem end of the tomatoes and scoop out the soft part of center. Take baked beans with juice well cooked down, add a little scraped onion and fill the tomatoes. Top with fine bread-crumbs moistened with melted butter, sprinkle with paprika and bake in a hot oven.

RIPE CUCUMBER KETCHUP.—Pare the cucumbers, remove seeds and soft centers, and cut into two-inch pieces. To each quart of prepared cucumber add three-fourths cup of sliced onion, one stalk of tender celery and three green peppers. Put through the food chopper and cook until tender, using just enough boiling water to prevent catching on the bottom. Stir frequently. When done, add two cups of hot vinegar, one and a third cup of sugar, a little cayenne pepper and salt to taste. Cook to the right consistency and seal boiling hot in sterilized bottles.

MIXED PICKLES.—Carefully rinse one quart of small martinoes in cold water so not to bruise them. Peel one quart of small button onions, holding them under cold water. Rinse and drain until dry 160 small cucumbers. Separate one medium-size cauliflower into individual flowerets. One rounding quart of small green string beans, and one pint of small yellow butter beans. The beans should be young and entirely free from strings. The rind of half a medium-size watermelon pared and cut into small strips. Into a cheese-cloth bag put one rounding tablespoon of stick cinnamon broken into small pieces, one tablespoon of whole cloves, one tablespoon of white mustard seed, one-half tablespoon each of whole allspice, peppercorns, and whole mace, one teaspoon of celery seed, and one-fourth pound of scraped horseradish root. To allow for swelling, the bag should only be half full when tied. Dissolve three scant cups of salt in two quarts of boiling water and when cold add two quarts more of cold water. Put the prepared pickle into a stone crock and cover with the brine. Cover with an earthen plate held down with a stone, and if the brine does not come over the plate, add cold water. Let stand 48 hours, then drain, wash in cold water and return to crock. Slowly cook the bag of spice and one tablespoon of alum in two quarts of good vinegar about eight minutes, or until it can be skimmed, add two quarts of boiling water and pour at once over the pickles. Again cover with the weighted plate. In six weeks they are ready to use. Remove bag of spice when pickles are of the desired flavor. If a sweet pickle is desired, add two cups of sugar to the vinegar before it is boiled.

CHOCOLATE CAKE.—One cup sugar, one-fourth cup butter, one egg, one-half cup sour milk, one-half teaspoon soda, one tablespoon Baker's cocoa sifted in one cup flour. Last of all, one-fourth cup boiling water, one teaspoon vanilla.

CHOCOLATE FILLING.—Into a double boiler put one square of plain Baker's chocolate, and as soon as it melts add one-half tablespoon of butter, one tablespoon of rich milk, one-half cup of light brown sugar, a small pinch of cinnamon, and a slice of orange rind about two inches square. Stir well and cook ten minutes, then remove orange rind and add one-third cup of chopped walnut meats. Spread on lightly buttered bread.

DOT CHOCOLATE FUDGE.—One twenty-five cent cake of Baker's chocolate, one cup confectioners' sugar, a pinch of salt, whites of two eggs beaten stiff, one cup chopped walnut meats, one teaspoon vanilla. Place chocolate in dish over a kettle of boiling water to melt. Mix sugar, eggs and salt together. Pour melted chocolate over this mixture; add walnut meats and vanilla. Pour into buttered plate and let stand over night.

COCOA RICE.—Bring one pint of milk to a boil in a double boiler. Add a pinch of salt and half-a-cup of brown rice. Cook until rice is soft, and then pour into a baking dish. Pour over the top, but do not stir in, one cup of cold milk to which has been added two tablespoons of sugar, and let it stand one hour. Stir together two tablespoons of Baker's cocoa and one tablespoon of sugar and add to it one-half cup of cold milk. When smooth, pour it over the rice and bake in a moderate oven about twenty-five minutes after it is heated through. Serve with milk or thin cream.

Cubby Bear's Hallowe'en

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

A LOUD knocking was heard on the door. Again and again it came. Mamma Bruin dropped her knitting and sprang from her chair to answer the knock, but before she had time to cross the room, the door burst open from without. In rushed Wollie Woodchuck, Squilly Porcupine and Racky Coon, pell-mell, tumbling over each other in their hurry.

A rush of chill air from the October night outside followed them.

"Whatever is the matter?" cried Mamma Bruin, for their faces wore a look of terror, and their eyes were staring wildly.

"Oh, such a dreadful monster!" panted Racky Coon. "It chased us everywhere, and we ran for your house as soon as we could."

"I shall not go home tonight," declared Wollie Woodchuck. "Nothing would tempt me to stay alone while that creature roams at large."

"It is a case for Policeman Bobb Catt—but who will have courage to go for him I do not know," said Squilly Porcupine, trying to smooth down his quills, which were bristling in all directions, from his fright.

"You are safe here," Mamma Bruin told them. "I will let nothing harm you. Now be calm, and tell me all about it."

"Well, then," began Wollie Woodchuck, "we were out there taking a walk this starry night. The farmer when he cut his corn, just left it standing in great bundles in his field. Strange he did not care enough about it to carry it into his barn! But since it was left there to waste, we thought we might as well have some. So that is where we were going."

"You will never tell the story if you are so slow about it," broke in Racky Coon. "We were crossing the pasture on our way to the cornfield, when, starting up from nowhere, it seemed, a frightful creature came toward us!" Racky shuddered, and Cubby Bear, who was listening, crept close to Mamma Bruin's side.

"Such a creature!" It was Dr. Squilly who took up the tale. "Nothing like it was ever seen before in the Pleasant Forest. It had a round, yellow head, great eyes, a three-cornered hole for a nose, and a monstrous mouth, stretched in an enormous grin!"

"It was all a-fire inside!" gurgled Wollie Woodchuck, glancing fearfully toward the door.

"Did you all three see it?" asked Mamma Bruin. "Sometimes when only one has a strange story to tell, it is only a dream, which seemed very real."

"Oh, this is no dream," Racky assured her. "We all three saw it plainly. Too plainly ever to doubt it. Its great eyes were blazing, and the fire shone through its nose, and its mouth, too. It had great ugly, uneven teeth——"

"Its grin was horrible," put in Squilly; and his quills, which he had smoothed down, began to rise again at the memory.

"This is strange, indeed!" said Mamma Bruin. "What was its body like?"

"We could not see its body, for it was all in shadow behind the fiery light that shone from its face," said Racky. "We turned and ran, and—now this is the strangest part of our story—there, again, ahead of us, we saw the same creature! How could it have been in both places, both before and behind us? I ask you that?"

"There must have been two of them," Mamma Bruin told him.

"Indeed, I should think the woods were full of them! This was Wollie's opinion. "For we darted this way and that, trying to run from them, and turn whichever way we would, soon we would see that blaze of light, and the glaring eyes and grin."

"If the thing was grinning, it couldn't have been meaning to harm you, could it?" asked little Cubby Bear.

"I think it was glad to be frightening us so," said Squilly.

"Strange, strange! I never heard the like of it!" mused Mamma Bruin, and old Grandma Bear, when the story was told to her, said the same.

"I am not afraid to go for Policeman Bobb Catt," said Mamma Bruin. "Something must be done! We cannot have our Pleasant Forest spoiled, and if such frightful creatures have come here, they must be driven out!"

"How brave you are!" exclaimed Wollie Woodchuck admiringly; and when she started out, they all went with her, finding comfort in her courage and strength.

"Please go to Bunny Rabbit's house first," begged Cubby Bear, "and see if he is all right. He is so timid, he would be frightened out of his wits if he saw the monster, alone!"

So to Bunny Rabbit's house, which was near by, they went.

They all crowded into the little house, and were just closing the door, when one of the Bunny Babies gave a shrill cry and hid his little face under Bunny Rabbit's arm!

"There, there, at the window!" cried Cubby Bear. "It is gone now, but oh, I saw it! A grinning face, all fiery, just as they told us!"

AGAIN, NEARER THIS TIME, THEY SAW THE FIERY FACE, GRINNING AT THEM FROM AROUND THE THICKET OF LOW HEMLOCKS.

"I will not stand this!" declared Mamma Bruin boldly. "I shall follow this creature to his lair, if need be, and I shall not wait to find Bob Catt. I am big enough, and strong enough, to settle this thing myself. Frightening Baby Bunnies, indeed! You may all follow me, if you like, but if not, I shall go alone."

"Oh, we will go, too," said Racky.

No one dared to be left behind, it seemed, and the Baby Bunnies were hastily packed into their little cart for the fearsome night ride.

Mamma Bruin strode valiantly in the lead while the others kept as close to her as they could.

"Where shall you go?" whispered Cubby Bear.

"I do not know," answered Mamma Bruin. "We are as likely to find what we seek in one place as another."

As the little procession moved along a broad path in the forest, Bunny Rabbit suddenly gave a startled shriek, and threw both his arms around the cartful of Bunny Babies.

"Over there!" cried Wollie Woodchuck, pointing. "And there is another! You see, there were two of them!"

For a few moments they all stood still, huddled together.

Again, nearer this time, they saw the fiery face, grinning at them from around a thicket of low hemlocks.

Mamma Bruin dropped on all-fours, and made a dash into the darkness.

"I missed it!" she said, scurrying wildly around the hemlocks. "I wish I could be on all sides of the thicket at once! It is in there somewhere, I am sure."

Cubby and Racky plucked up their courage.

"We will help you," they said, and took their places on guard.

Mamma Bruin bided her time, keeping a keen eye ready for any movement of the enemy.

Suddenly she gave a spring into the midst of the thicket.

An angry snarl from within showed that she had caught what she was after.

"Ah, ha! I have you," she growled. The boughs of the little hemlocks were shaken by the struggle which followed.

Cubby Bear and Racky Coon hurried to Mamma Bruin's aid. The timid ones watching drew nearer.

With startling suddenness, a round yellow object was seen to roll on the ground. A light flared up, then went out, followed by a thin trail of smoke.

Squilly Porcupine bent over to examine it.

"A pumpkin, a pumpkin!" he cried, in huge disgust. "We were scared of a pumpkin, with a light inside it."

"But I do not understand," said Wollie. "How could a pumpkin chase us everywhere, and look through Bunny Rabbit's window?"

"It could not. Someone had to carry it, of course," explained Squilly.

Just then Mamma Bruin backed slowly out of the hemlock thicket, dragging by the neck a long, struggling reddish form.

"It is only Foxy Reynard!" Cubby Bear shouted joyously.

"Foxy at his tricks again!" repeated Racky Coon.

Mamma Bruin gave Foxy a shake, and pulled him to his feet.

"Speak up, Foxy Reynard," she said, "and tell us all about your cruel joke. Where did you get your pumpkin face, all fire inside, to frighten babies with?"

But Foxy was sullen, and would make no answer. His red coat was rumpled, his fun was ended, and Mamma Bruin had not been gentle with him. She still held him by the shoulder with a grip like iron.

The Bunny Babies, in their little cart, were squealing with laughter. "Oh, the funny, funny pumpkin!" they said. "We were all goosies to be afraid!"

"Look out, there! Look out!" shouted Squilly Porcupine. The little animals scattered wildly, wondering what new danger was upon them.

Another pumpkin came skimming through the air, and a howl of pain broke from Foxy Reynard, for the big, flying yellow ball had hit him squarely on top of the head.

Mamma Bruin was so surprised at this, she let go her hold on her prisoner's shoulder, and staggered backward; while Foxy Reynard lost no time in seizing his chance for escape, and was off like a shot.

"The other pumpkin-face!" cried Cubby Bear in amazement. "Where did it come from?"

"I threw it!" called a voice from the darkness beyond the hemlock thicket; a thin, high voice, which they all knew to belong to Woozie Weasel. "I threw it, but I did not aim well, for I meant to hit someone beside Foxy Reynard with it. You were all so stupid you did not know that tonight is Hallowe'en, but Foxy and I knew it, and started out to see how we could celebrate. We found the children at the farm making what they called Jack-o'-Lanterns out of pumpkins. We watched them around the corner of the house. They put lights in all the pumpkin-faces, and they made a brave showing, I can tell you. Then the children left these two on the piazza while they went off down the road with some others, and while they were gone, Foxy and I took these two. We have had such a good time."

"Be off with you," warned Mamma Bruin, "or I shall give you such a shaking as I gave Foxy Reynard!"

"And you had best see to your friend," called Dr. Squilly Porcupine after him, "for you gave him a bad wallop on the head when you threw your pumpkin."

"See, the pumpkin is all broken to bits," said Cubby Bear, as he picked up a piece of it from the ground. "Where has the other one gone to?"

"Here it is," answered Wollie Woodchuck, speaking in a thick voice, for his mouth was full. He had been making good use of his time, and had eaten nearly half of Foxy Reynard's Jack-o'-Lantern.

"Have some!" he offered. "It is still good, even though it tastes a little of smoke."

IT'S the harvest time of the year again. As you perch up here on my knee we can look over millions of acres where the days of growth and greenness are over, and where summer's task has been brought to a splendid close, rightly celebrated by banners of leafy red and gold blazing in the sunlight. It's a great sight, isn't it? Beautiful enough to keep Billy quiet and to be enjoyed by even Cousin Gus Trick as he removes a powder puff from his eye and revels in the brilliant scene as much as clouds of scattered talcum will permit. For this is the season of the year's fruition; Nature dwells quiescent through still weeks of hazy, lazy sunlight, before winter comes to put a frosty seal of sleep upon her eyes and set her to dream through the white months of the apple blossoms and the spring rains that are again to be in the good and eternal circle of the seasons.

With Nature her harvest time is always sure, but she must work through her appointed round, have her months of growth and her days of rain and sun. I often think of how much of our own waiting, of how many of our unsolved and solving problems, we could bear patiently and confidently if we would remember this slow certainty our great earth mother uses in attaining results. Always there must be a seedtime, a period of growth and budding, before we can have a harvest of any sort—whether it be of the soil, of the mind or heart, or even of such slow-growing things as social progression and communal law.

Nothing, perhaps, moves more slowly than Humanity—that million-and-billion-seeded plant, but we know it moves. With our unaided eyes we cannot see the plan and movement by which the bare gray twig of the apple tree will, months later, give us bud, leaf, blossom and finally its full-fleshed fruit, but we know that the process is sure. So we should know that in man is planted something that will yet come to a full fruitage of world happiness. More than doubting ourselves, to doubt this would be to doubt the Great Planter and Harvester. Our fault is that we are always too ready to doubt; too ready to question every movement forward of the creative heart of man—to think the weeds too thick or the soil too poor for Humanity's tender leaf-buds of heart and spirit to spring forward. Yet in spite of cold doubt, critical storms, crowding weeds of world-evil and the thin seed-beds of weakness and unfaith, the plant of man's future pushes onward and upward. We need as much patience through the world's winter months as we need of rejoicing in the sun and rain which speeds all that is good. Today we stand in want of no better and unceasing prayer than "Increase our faith." With what we know of the growth wrought in the past ages and what we see being wrought today, there can be no greater blasphemy than that of the mocker of the unconquerable spirit of man, than that unfaith of him who is ready to sneer at the accomplishment, or hope of accomplishment, of aught beyond his sight and touch—or the taste of tongue.

There are many who are ready to question our own great system of government because to them its faults seem more evident than its future, its mistakes than its gains; who jeer at prohibition because it has not at once and in this generation made our land an abode of wingless angels; who make dark prophecies of further slaughter because we have so lately seen millions of men die at the hands of their fellow men. Yet our own government today gives a higher standard of individual happiness than has ever been seen in the world before; the mighty step forward of prohibition will not be turned to a backward footprint and has already marked a fine and astounding gain, and as for the black and old evil of war, there are rising up in every country remedies of reason—and the feelings and emotions more powerful than reason—which must yet bind this world-scourge and draw its blood-stained teeth.

But the fullness of all these gains at once and quickly? Most certainly no—as certainly as that I could not have eaten the Northern Spies I will soon be munching if I had craved them a few weeks after the orchards were white and pink. There must be hurts, delays, arrestments in Humanity's growth and our spiritual evolution. Think of the cataclysms registered in the past ages in that natural world so sturdily faithed and vaunted by our material-minded critics and scorners! Yet the old world survives, has twirled on, healed its wounds and is beautiful before us this autumn. And more than the world which contains him and which he contains, man himself is in truth a world of spiritual growth. As slowly as triumphantly he must overcome all evil, pass through his appointed round of seasons, and finally emerge to a fruitage and harvest worthy of the seed that was sown in him.

I feel with a certainty which is more than any knowledge, that under the asters and goldenrod spreading the fields this October, under the far stars of the clear autumn nights, under the fields of ripened grain and the full boughs of orchards, there dwells a Power which will yet make the spirit of man as serene and beautiful as the fall landscape and give us hearts as glad as the pageant of the red and yellow woods. Every harvest is a promise. Every spring is a prophecy. Let us love our world because Someone once loved it and made it beautiful for us. It will be better and more beautiful because we must and shall patiently and faithfully work to make it so. Though these perfect October days must give place to grayer months and the coming winter, with just as much certainty as we know that spring and another harvest will come again, let us cling to a belief in man's indwelling, overcoming spirit—whose progress can only be limited by our unfaith, and made slow by our weakness.

Here's wishing you a happy harvest time this year and happier ones to come! I would like to eat a big red apple with every one of you and help in the husking of every ear of corn that may stand on any of our Family fields so far from Brooklyn corner groceries. Billy is a wonder at a husking bee. I wish all of you could see him in operation and watch him blush behind his whiskers when he finds a red ear.

And now for the letters:

PARKSVILLE, R. R. 1, BOX 109, KY.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I was just reading the cousins' letters and I am wondering if you will let me come in and talk just a little while. As I am the only child, grandchild and niece in my family, I get pretty lonesome sometimes. I will first tell you how I look: I have dark red curly hair which is eighteen or twenty inches long. Even if I am seventeen years old, I still wear it in curls down my back. I have dark brown eyes, eyelashes and eyebrows; very fair complexion with a whole heap of freckles; a big nose and a double chin—but not the kind of double chin fat women have. I am five feet, four inches tall, and weigh 115 pounds.

I live beside the L. & N. railroad which divides the bluegrass region from the knobs. When I want ferns, flowers or huckleberries, I don't have far to go after them. I went with four of my cousins (I have 144 cousins) to gather some huckleberries this morning. They had never seen any growing on the bushes. We got a great many, but I believe we got more chiggers than berries. My cousins said they would never go to the knobs again in summer.

Our house sets on a little hill. In front of the house, across the road or pike, there is a wheat field, and in the rear a pasture. Back of the pasture the forest sets in.

I am learning to sew and cook. I have made several garments. I have crocheted caps, scarfs, booties, yokes and lace. Mamma and I have embroidered a bedroom set and I am embroidering another by myself. I have baked pies, cakes, corn bread, biscuit and sweet potatoes; also light bread. The cost of five loaves of bread is 15½ cents, besides the work of baking it, which is easily done. I can cook a few other things, too.

I have 200 strawberry plants of my own and I tend papa's grapevines and fruit trees. I have thirty or forty raspberry vines I brought from the woods and set in the garden and I have sage, horseradish and rhubarb growing in the garden also.

Like Martha Buckle, I think that city folks believe themselves better than country people. I have some city cousins, and when they come out here they seem to think it an honor to them to know nothing about the country or farming, but when we visit them, they think we haven't any knowledge at all if we don't know about city ways before we get there. Most of them are even ashamed to be seen on the street with people from the country. I wonder if Uncle Lisha would speak to one of us if we should meet him in Brooklyn. Would you, Uncle? Martha, I guess your age to be eighteen or twenty. Am I right?

Don't you girls think it would be nice for each of us to have a COMFORT kodak album, so we could know each other better? I have a kodak and would like to receive pictures from all who cared to send them. Will try and return all, if I do not get too many. I wish the boys would not send any, as I would not return one of mine for theirs.

Who has my birthday—May 5th?

I have never owned a goat, but I believe I could make a pet of Billy; as I have owned three dogs, seven cats and one white rabbit. Also I have herded a hundred or two hogs for papa at different times and I made pets of them all—and most of them were wild when I got them. I don't mean I went to the forest and caught them like our grandfathers did, but most of the hogs came from big farms or ran out in the woods where they did not see many people, so they were just a bit wild. The dogs were given to me and the cats just came from I don't know where. So if you will send Billy out here I will make a pet of him, even if I have to part with my red hair and freckles to do it.

Now, Uncle Lisha, as soon as I see this in print I will send you one of my pictures. I will choose now, as I have been four days writing this letter—writing a few minutes each day.

Lovingly yours, RUTH MAE PRICE.

Ruth, I have given you a place of honor in our Read-Headed Division, Curly Section, Shade Three Index Number 12,197. We have a lot of red-headed cousins, Ruthie, and many of 'em (like you and Cousin Gus Trick) have to be rated in the Curly Section. However, you will be proud to know that so far you hold the record for length of curls in this section—the longest reported before your letter arrived being 16¼ inches from root to tip.

Like everybody else, I have often heard of Kentucky's famous crop of bluegrass, but I never knew before that your great state went in for the growing of knobs and chiggers. Of course the knobs, when one thinks of it, would be a profitable crop—as they could always be sold to the door factories. As for chiggers, I don't quite know what they are, but they sound nourishing and appetizing. From what you write, I judge they must grow on bushes like huckleberries, and that they produce most plentifully. Billy butted in to tell me he knew what chiggers were, but Bill knows so much and always takes so long in telling it, that I refused to listen to his description. Anyway, they must be a good crop or you would not bother to go out and gather them like huckleberries.

I really think, Ruth, that if you can make pets of wild pigs, you might even make some sort of a pet out of Billy—for Bill is wild enough at times, and also has a rather—well, I'll call it a good hearty appetite. I think it's your double chin which makes you such an animal tamer. If anybody could make a pet of Bill, it would have to be a red-headed girl with a double chin—or maybe a quadruple one would be better yet—for Billy has a firm, well-set jaw of his own, I assure you.

Ruth, I told Martha Buckle I did not agree with her, and I don't agree a bit more with your opinion of the opinions city folks hold. Some may be as city-conceited as you say these cousins of yours are, but on the average, city people thoroughly appreciate the qualities and abilities of land-dwellers. There are too many clever, hard-working country boys and girls coming to our cities every day, Ruth, and making good there, for city people to disregard the human product of the soil or rank it below its real worth and take any "clever than thou" attitude. You just come to Brooklyn, Ruth, and see if I won't be proud and delighted to walk down Flatbush Avenue with you and show you all the latest styles in knobs and chiggers.

FALMOUTH, MASS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I come again, this time to ask as a favor that you will publish this brief note of explanation which also gives my new address. In reply to my two letters in January and April issues of COMFORT and my "Missing Friend" notice in the June number, I have received a host of letters, but over 300 of them were either unsigned or did not give full name and address even though some of them contained questions and seemed to require an answer. If these Cousins will write again to my new address below, and give me their full names and addresses I will answer their letters. I would especially like to hear from "Miss Molly" of Jackson, Tenn., and "Alyce" of St. Louis, Mo. My full name is

JOHN JAY VINCENT WILCOX.
P. O. Box 221, Falmouth, Mass.

HECTOR, ARKANSAS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA, BILLY AND ALL THE COUSINS:

Hello! Gee. I had to yell to let everybody know I'm here! I don't believe that cousin in China heard me, but let him sleep. All I ask is permission to come in and shake the mist off my curls. This is sure a wet day. I can hear the wind shriek through the towers of my castle. It makes me long for a mate.

My castle is situated away back in the Ozarks of Arkansas. It is a huge affair covering the top of one of these peaks. Sometimes I am almost afraid to stay here all by myself, with no one but Snow, my colored man. You see, I have never found a mate. Sometimes I can hear the screams of a cougar, away off in a canyon. Oh, how lonely it makes me! Sometimes I think I will climb to the top of the tallest tower in my castle and throw myself off. But when I get up there and look down on the rustling leaves and flowers, I just can't do it. If some of the cousins will write me a letter it might save my life. Ah, the day is getting gloomier and gloomier. If I had but a few letters to read and a few pictures of bright happy faces from the outside world, it might cheer me up.

Listen: I am going to let you in on the ground floor of a little secret. This is for ladies only. Now, girls, don't tell anybody—hold on, there is a horrid man listening!—but, girls, I can cook. I'll send a sample of my fudge to those who send me a letter and a photo. But don't forget the photo; I must have it to know what kind of candy to send.

Now a word to Uncle Lisha and Billy and I must be going: Uncle Lisha, I am in sympathy with you. I happen to know something of goats for I have a flock of the woolly rascals; but maybe your Billy is not one of these mountain goats. If you will come and live with me, Billy, I will give you the job of educating my goats and you may sleep in my library.

Now for a little description of myself: I am rather tall and slim and straight as a board. I have very dark curly hair, which is unruly, being long on top. It is determined to shade my dark brown eyes with a curl instead of letting my long black lashes do that. My mouth is generally open, showing uneven rows of white teeth—when I have anybody to talk to or laugh with.

I'll close, hoping to get a shower of letters soon.

Love to all. WILLIAM M. HURLEY.

William, if you will just wait a while before flinging yourself off that lofty tower among your flower beds, you can arrange to have a nice soft pile of pink and green letters for you to bury your curly head in six feet deep as you land after the drop. We are never going to let you die of gloom on the lonely top of a dark Ozark, with nobody whiter than Snow to lighten up your heart and hearth. It is truly a pitiful picture you draw, William, of your sad fate and your melancholy listening to the shrieks of Missouri wind and the screams of Ozarkian cougars. It does seem to me that you need a lot of cheering up, and, believe me, you are going to get it. Snow will have to go for your mail in an oxcart, and you will have to start manufacturing your fudge in the castle soap kettle. Business is going to commence soon on your Ozark summit, Willy, my boy, and the castle is going to hum from moated keep to battlemented towers. For your life is going to be saved and your slim and charming straight-as-a-board form will have to bend over a desk for many a day, answering the letters of blonde and brunette lifesavers. Our Family is never going to let any curly-headed member expire in the midst of gloom while there are any two-cent stamps to be bought.

DALTON, R. R. 1, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I wrote you all a letter some time ago, but I suppose it was Billy's meal time when the letter arrived. But please, Uncle Lisha, do not let him brake any teeth on this one, because, as I said in my other letter, I am a lonesome little girl and want to know if some of the cousins won't write to me I know perfectly well what a job I am undertaking and want to say this as a warning to those who do write—I will try to answer and I will answer all those who enclose a stamp. It may take a good while and I want you all to have patience, and lots of it, for I am going to business college and I am pretty busy most of the time and cannot neglect my studies But I will do my level best. Uncle, I know you are either laughing or feeling real sorry for me, but you have no idea how lonesome I am.

I am getting along fairly well with my work here and I like it. I started on May 23rd and have been working hard ever since and then the real work will begin when I get through and I am in an office—as I hope to be some day. Of all my studies I like typewriting the best. I am not very good at it yet, but I am getting better every day, for we have two or three speed tests each day and I make one or more words at each test. On account of the hot weather we commenced in summer at 7.45 and go right through until 12.45 when we are finished for the day.

I am a young girl, five feet, six and one-half inches tall, and have very fair complexion, with dark hair and blue eyes. I live in the country, over two miles east of Dalton, Ohio, and about seven miles from Massillon where I am attending school. Please don't think I walk it, now, for I absolutely do not. I could though, for if my education depended on my walking back and forth I would gladly hoof it.

My parents own two and a half acres of land and last year we raised over a hundred chickens. This year we raised three out of sixteen! Talk about luck, some lucky luck I call that. What do you think? Dad has been repairing our place—not just repairing it,

A Delightful Test

To bring you prettier teeth

This offers you a ten-day test which will be a revelation to you. It will show you the way to whiter, cleaner, safer teeth.

Millions of people of some forty races now employ this method. Leading dentists everywhere advise it. You should learn how much it means to you and yours.

Clouded by a film

Your teeth are clouded more or less by film. The fresh film is viscous—you can feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays.

Old methods of brushing leave much of that film intact. The film absorbs stains, so the teeth look discolored. Film is the basis of tartar.

How it ruins teeth

That film holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So most tooth troubles are now traced to that film, and they are almost universal.

Pepsodent PAT. OFF. REG. U.S.

The New-Day Dentifrice

Endorsed by modern authorities and now advised by leading dentists nearly all the world over. All druggists supply the large tubes.

Now we combat it

Dental science, after long research, has found two film combatants. Many careful tests have proved their efficiency. Leading dentists everywhere urge their daily use.

A new-day tooth paste has been created, called Pepsodent. It complies with modern requirements. And these two great film combatants are embodied in it.

Two other effects

Pepsodent brings two other effects which authority now deems essential. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's neutralizer for acids which cause decay.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube and watch these effects for a while. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

Then judge the benefits by what you see and feel. You will be amazed.

The Gods Arrive

PART II.

MARCIA'S eyes held the haunting ones of her visitor for a moment before the latter, bursting into a gale of gay laughter, took an impulsive step forward and gathered Marcia into her strong young arms.

"Aunt Marcia! You perfect dear! Did I frighten you? You fell hard for the melodrama stuff, which goes to prove that I'm an actress of parts. Texas papers please copy. Aunt Marcia, are you glad to see me? Because I'm frightfully glad to be here."

Speechless, Marcia held the girl back and looked at her. No wonder her eyes had seemed familiar. They were her own at eighteen. But Anita was not so beautiful as she had at first thought. Her humorous mouth was too wide for actual beauty and her nose tipped ever so slightly skyward; but it was an interesting and piquant face and Marcia, unconsciously yearning for the companionship of her own kin, loved it straightway.

"Anita Reece!" was all she was able to utter.

"That's me," replied Anita with ungrammatical airiness.

"Whatever possessed you! You deserve to be spanked. Why didn't you let me know you were coming? Imagine getting into New York with no one to meet you! Take off your hat, dear, and sit down and tell me all about it."

Anita held Marcia's hands in a tight and comforting grasp as they sat down to talk.

"Of course you know that dad died a long time ago?"

Marcia nodded.

"Grandmother went a year ago and granddaddy followed her in the winter. It left me all alone, you see. Granddaddy had always kept your Oldham's lawyer's address and after I got things straightened out, I came straight to New York. Mr. Seymour wrote me where to find you. You're all I have now, Aunt Mark."

If Marcia had not already warmed to the girl, she would have at that name. Nobody but her father had ever called her Mark.

"Oh, my dear, I am so glad to have you. Father always wanted you; did you know that?"

Anita had known that from discreet but nevertheless irate grandparents.

"I've come to stay, Aunt Mark, except for the business trips I suppose I'll have to take back to Texas. Grandfather left me all he had, and it's rather a lot. Aunt Mark, I want to get this off my thorax right now; I never blamed mother a bit for ducking. That ranch was the limit till we found oil and I got old enough to show 'em what was what. 'Course I got along because granddaddy sent me to the Coast to school, but mother must have nearly died of lonesomeness. That is that."

They talked till luncheon time when Anita remembered that she had left a taxicab waiting below and she went down to dismiss it.

In the afternoon a deluge of trunks and boxes overflowed the apartment. Anita regarded them a trifle dubiously.

"It looks as though we would have to get into larger quarters, Aunt Mark," she said.

"We can manage nicely for the present, dear," planned Marcia. "Later in the spring we are going out of town."

"You must remember, Aunt Marcia,"—Anita spoke shyly—"that I am on my own. Please tell Uncle Jim that."

That evening when Harkness came home he scanned Anita with amused eyes. "So you thought you would have a fling at New York," he bantered.

She nodded brightly. "Just naturally flopped right down on Aunt Mark like an airplane with a broken wing."

To Marcia's vast relief, she made no mention of the shock she had given her.

"I love it," Anita was saying stoutly. "Aunt Mark is fruity. Are you going to like me, Uncle Jim?"

"So far as I know," he smiled, "nobody has yet called me subnormal."

"I tried to get you, Jim, to tell you to be sure to come home to dinner. I wanted to celebrate."

"Did you, Marcia? I had to run out to Long Island on one of those tedious business trips."

"Your breath doesn't smell a bit tedious, Uncle Jim," teased Anita.

Harkness threw back his head and laughed. "So that's your number!" he said. "All right; I have it now and I fancy we'll be friends."

Inside of a week Anita knew her New York far better than did Marcia. Inside of a fortnight her shrewd eyes had observed every detail of the Harkness menage.

On the way home from a shopping expedition one day in the car which she had bought, Anita spoke regretfully of the frock which she had tried to induce Marcia to buy.

"It suited you," she fretted. "And when a dress suits you it's a crime not to get it. You really should jazz up your clothes a little, Aunt Mark."

"I can't afford it, Anita."

"Uncle Jim affords good clothes."

"That is different, my dear. That is business."

"That is fiddlesticks!" retorted Anita rudely. She stepped on the accelerator in her irritation and a block further on was halted by a policeman.

"Well, what's the matter?" she snapped into the face of the officer.

"Anita!" warned Marcia.

"You were going fifty, young lady; that's what's the matter," said the officer.

"I can't believe it. But what of it, anyway? Do you call that fast? Why, officer, our steers down in Texas run faster than that."

She was suddenly leaning forward, dimpling into his face. He held his official expression only a moment before his face relaxed into a grin.

"All right," he said, "I'll take your word for it. Only this isn't Texas, and if I let you off this time you'll have to look out in the future."

"Thank you. When I get within gun shot of your beat in the future," she promised gravely, "I'll pretend I'm following a hearse. Goodness, see the line we're holding up! I feel like a celebrity. Good by, officer."

"Anita!" protested Marcia as the latter saluted and moved sedately on.

"Yes, Aunt Mark? Shocked? Well, you're to blame for the whole episode—you and your I-can't-afford-its. At least you might let me buy that dress for you."

"We won't discuss that, please, Anita."

Anita drove a block in silence. Then, "If I ever happen to get married and my husband treats me like a shabby pair of slippers—comfortable, and good enough for domestic use, but not smart enough to show outside the house—I'll duck as mother did."

"We won't discuss that either, Anita."

"No," amended Anita, not heeding her aunt's air of dignity, "on second thought I won't duck; I'll make a noise like a wife; in other words, I'll raise Cain."

Her aunt sat in freezing silence.

"It won't get you anything to get so all over icy, Aunt Mark. You and I are all that are left of the Rands. I'm not trying to be impertinent, blessing, but I want desperately to see you happy, and you aren't going about it in the right way. You're far too young and innocent for this city. It's a good thing I came."

March had come in meekly and Marcia felt a yearning for the country, but Anita, drinking her fill of the city, begged for a reprieve and the family drifted on from day to day in town.

Marcia was increasingly thoughtful these days. For a time after Anita's arrival Harkness, attracted by her piquancy, had spent more time at home, but now his old habits had him by the throat.

"Business, business!" he exclaimed when Anita rallied him on his absence.

"Your chief must be a slave driver," Anita observed coolly.

In fact, the attitude of Mr. Palmer was puzzling Harkness not a little. He was not as cordial as formerly; there were now conferences to which he, Harkness, was not admitted. Recently, when he had mentioned beginning operations on his own mine, Mr. Palmer had abruptly changed the topic of conversation.

Harkness never dreamed that it was his own surrender to the city which had wrought the change in his chief and he was troubled and humiliated, for he knew that he had brought business to the firm, justifying its financial confidence.

Marcia's reflections too, were personal. Was she, as Anita so picturesquely stated, lying down on her job? In the old days men had stolen her father's patents. Now, in quite the modern fashion, she feared that a woman was stealing her husband. And she was supinely permitting it. She tried to flagellate her spirit to the fighting pitch, but she failed miserably. A wife fighting for her husband was to her a degrading sight.

One day in April Marcia received a letter from Mr. Seymour, her father's old lawyer, reminding her that her presence was required in Oldham at the opening of the sealed instructions regarding her father's bequests.

"I had entirely forgotten it," she remarked as she passed the letter over to Anita. "We have been married ten years, Anita. I wish," she added after a pause, "that I could go to Oldham without your uncle's knowledge. I dread opening up the old wound."

Anita comprehended her viewpoint with characteristic swiftness. "It's perfectly feasible," she said. "Don't you remember that Uncle Jim announced that he must go to Washington for a few days? You can slip up to Oldham while he is gone. You'll have to maneuver to keep the children quiet."

So it was settled. The next forenoon Anita drove her aunt to the Grand Central and later went down town and, bribing her way right and left with her smiles, she calmly walked into Harkness's office.

He looked tired, she thought, as he glanced up at her.

"Hel-lo, Anita!" He rose and pointed to a chair. "How did you find your way down here? Anything wrong at home?"

"Not one little thing, Uncle Jim. I'm bored, that's all; so I thought I would run down and ask you to take me to luncheon. They're having hash at home. If you'll be a lamb I'll drive you to your train afterwards."

He glanced nervously at his watch. "I'm deucedly sorry, Nita," he said, "but I've a date with some people. Business, you know."

"Oh, bother business!" pouted Anita. "Please, Uncle Jim."

She brightened at a sudden thought. "Why can't I join your party? I'm a business person myself. Please!"

He looked her over critically and she endured the scrutiny with a hopeful smile. She would, he decided, do credit to any man. Whatever there had been of the theatrical in her dress when she came, Marcia and her own good sense had restrained. She was the typical modern girl of wealth. It would not be a bad idea to show Palmer that he had such a one in the family.

"I believe I'll take you," he decided.

"Goody! Now, old dear, I'll go over in that corner and not speak to you till you're ready to go."

They met their party in the lobby of an uptown hotel—Mr. Palmer and a client and the inevitable Mrs. Archer. Harkness presented Anita with a little touch of pride.

"My wife's niece, from the free and untrameled state of Texas," he smiled.

"And not so free, at that," retorted Anita. "We've heard of the eighteenth amendment down there."

She had evoked a laugh and that gave her a running start. Her poise was perfect. She sensed a little of the exultation of battle as she looked into Mrs. Archer's hostile eyes.

The latter was furious and Anita knew it. She had come to regard Harkness as her personal property and she would make him pay dearly for bringing a woman so much younger and fresher than herself to this luncheon.

Mr. Palmer loved youth and insisted that Anita sit next to him and while Harkness was ordering he gave her his entire attention.

"I have never seen your aunt," he said presently.

"No? You've missed a lot. Aunt Marcia isn't keen for business. You must meet her soon. You will love her."

Mrs. Archer, who had been listening, turned to them with an ingenuous smile. "I have seen her," she said.

There was an unspoken insult in the older woman's voice and Anita throbbed under its sting. She turned to Mrs. Archer with eyes which she made adoring. Under the look Mrs. Archer flinched a trifle.

"Do pardon me if I stare," pleaded Anita, "but I really can't keep my eyes off you."

Mrs. Archer's suspicion melted under the flattering eyes.

"Uncle, isn't Mrs. Archer precisely like the pictures I showed you of grandmother?" Her young voice carried beyond their own table.

"She was such a dear. I lost her, you know. Please let me know you awfully well. I know you could take her place. Aunt Mark is sweet, but she is really too young quite to take granny's place with me."

A terrible silence enveloped the party when Anita's high voice had ceased. Of them all, she was the only serene one. Inwardly she was a-tremble, but no one could have guessed it.

"Granny had her face done over, too," she went straight on. "How grandfather teased her. It's wonderful what they can do nowadays. Not all the reconstruction work is being done in Belgium and France, is it?"

Mr. Palmer was past fifty and constitutionally dignified, but he giggled like an uncontrolled schoolboy. Harkness silently cursed himself for having been beguiled into bringing this young firebrand to the luncheon. However, he felt a sudden desire to grin at the face of Mrs. Archer who was convulsed with rage and mortification.

And Anita, having tossed her bomb, devoted herself to her excellent food with the guileless face of a child.

"We mustn't linger, Uncle Jim," she said, once her appetite was satisfied. "I am taking him to his train," she explained as she and Harkness rose. "I've had a topping time. Good by, Mrs. Archer. Don't forget me, will you? Good by, Mr. Palmer. I like you a lot," she added for his ear alone.

"Well," Harkness began as he seated himself in Anita's car, "you've succeeded in cooking our goose with Mrs. Archer. We'll never do business with her after that."

"You couldn't do business with that woman in a million years," returned Anita curtly. "She's doing business with you, Uncle Jim, and she is getting more out of you in luncheons and the like than you'll ever get back. If you can prove that she really has a cent to invest and that you've lost your chance at it because of me, I'll put money in your old mine myself. And that is that. By the way, I want to pay for my luncheon."

"You are in a frame of mind to enjoy insulting people, aren't you, Anita?"

"Well, after living with you for some time, I assume that you are poor. Aunt Mark never goes anywhere or has anything——"

"Anita——"

"And of course I infer that you can't afford——"

"Anita!"

"Then is it true that you are ashamed of her? I confess I've suspected it. I don't much wonder. Her clothes are a sight. I wish she would accept things from me."

They had reached the Pennsylvania station and Anita had brought her car to a stop when her uncle next spoke.

"Anita," he said, "I don't know who or what has put such outrageous notions in your head. Ashamed of your aunt? Why, she's the finest woman in the world!"

Anita winked drolly. "Don't try to put anything over on little Anita," she said. "Good by, Uncle Jim."

He got slowly out of the car and Anita waved to him till her eyes lost him in the crowd. "Take that to Washington with you," she said in his general direction before settling down to the wheel.

The next evening she met Marcia at the station and even her intrepid spirit was shaken at the sight of her aunt's face.

"What is it, Aunt Mark?" she asked when they were in the car.

"Anita, the money is mine after all."

"Why, of course! I suspected it, you poor little innocent. I get my sense of the theatrical from grandfather. I don't see why you should get so shell-shocked over a nice little thing like that."

"It isn't a little thing, Anita. That money has been piling up for ten years and there's a fearful lot of it."

Anita hooted at the fear.

"Father only meant to test us, but with his characteristic caution, he provided for the unexpected. Not even Mr. Seymour knew what was in that sealed envelope. There was a letter in it for me, Anita. A letter from the dead. He said that if anything happened to him before he altered his will that the ten years' wait would not hurt us. But it has hurt us; it has come too late."

"Too late for what, Aunt Mark?"

"To buy happiness. Father didn't reckon on that."

"Happiness has no for-sale tag on it," Anita replied wisely.

"At least I can help your uncle to fulfill his ambitions. I can give him money——"

"Aunt Mark, I'm going to drive you home through the park and deliver a lecture on the way. Don't tell Uncle Jim yet. Will it become public news?"

"I asked Mr. Seymour to keep it out of the papers," said Marcia dully.

"Good. Now for the lecture. Don't try to buy Uncle Jim, Aunt Mark. Make him desire you. You can, too. You don't realize how lovely you could be if you would give yourself some attention. You have let yourself drift into a humiliating position and it's your job to get out of it. You think that Uncle Jim has fallen for that aged vamp. Well, he hasn't. I know, for I have seen them together. However, there are plenty of others not so aged and not so obvious floating about, and no wife may sing 'The strife is o'er, the battle done' till she writes the cheque for the tombstone for her husband's grave."

Marcia smiled wanly.

"Now if you'll put yourself in my hands, Aunt Mark, I'll guarantee results."

Bewildered and a little frightened, Marcia promised.

"It's going to be difficult to stage the show with Uncle Jim hanging around," admitted Anita, "but we'll manage because we must."

During his three days' trip to Washington Anita's parting shafts pricked in Harkness's mind precisely as she had planned them to do. How could anyone think such an absurdity as Anita had voiced? Ashamed of his wife? Did Palmer perhaps, think it? And was that the reason for his recent coldness? Did Marcia think it? The thought was bitter.

Dear patient Marcia. He might have been selfish, but surely he was not capable of so despicable a thing as that.

Hereafter, he decided, the damnable business should come second to her. Palmer could do some of the tame cat business himself. He, Harkness, was a mining engineer and not a carpet knight and he'd tell 'em that. For two cents he'd go back West to stay.

Returning to New York, he reported at once to the office where he was ordered to start West that evening on consultation work which would require several weeks. On the whole he was glad. There were things he wanted to get straight in his mind. He had time for only a hasty trip up-town.

When he had finally left, Anita swung her aunt around in a mad dance. "Fate," she chanted, "is my most indulgent friend."

Nothing in Marcia's previous life approached the furious month which followed. There was a house to be found, and between hunting trips she was handed from hair dresser to masseuse to outfitter impartially.

"I won't wear those frocks," she rebelled at last. "Why, I'm thirty and the mother of two children!"

"You promised," reminded Anita.

"Madam will do well to rely on the young lady's taste," submitted the modiste.

In the end Anita had her way. They moved out to Long Island—to a lovely place with formal gardens and a glorious view of the Sound. In that environment some of Marcia's lost assurance was regained.

"If Uncle Jim gets snoopy about the place, you can tell him I rented it at a bargain," counseled Anita. "I did, too. I love you in that gray organdy, Aunt Mark. You make Mrs. Archer look like an ancestor."

The day was set for Harkness's return. He was glad that the family had moved to the country for, somehow, the city had grown intolerable to his mind.

He reached home at seven in the evening, gasping with dismay as he viewed the grounds through which his taxicab was passing.

Anita, glowing in a new dinner gown, was waiting for him in the hall.

"Hello, Uncle Jim," she said before he could speak. "It's a shame the car couldn't meet you. You're awfully late, you know. You'll barely have time to dress. We're entertaining at dinner in honor of your return. The Palmers are coming, and Mrs. Archer. She's a forgiving soul, isn't she? I had to urge her some. Aunt Mark was delayed and is dressing. Don't stop to speak to her now, there's a dear. Hurry!"

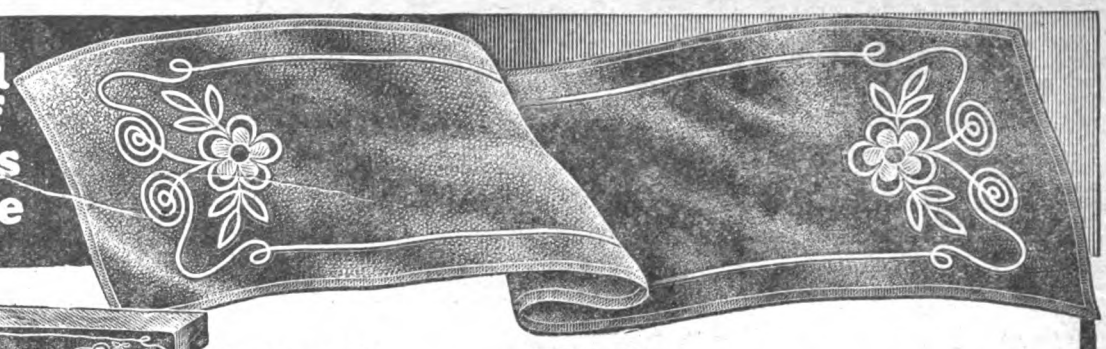
He took the stairs at a run. Not stop to speak to Marcia! He'd enjoy seeing anyone stop him!

"Marcia!" he called lustily, and was suddenly confronted by a white-capped maid.

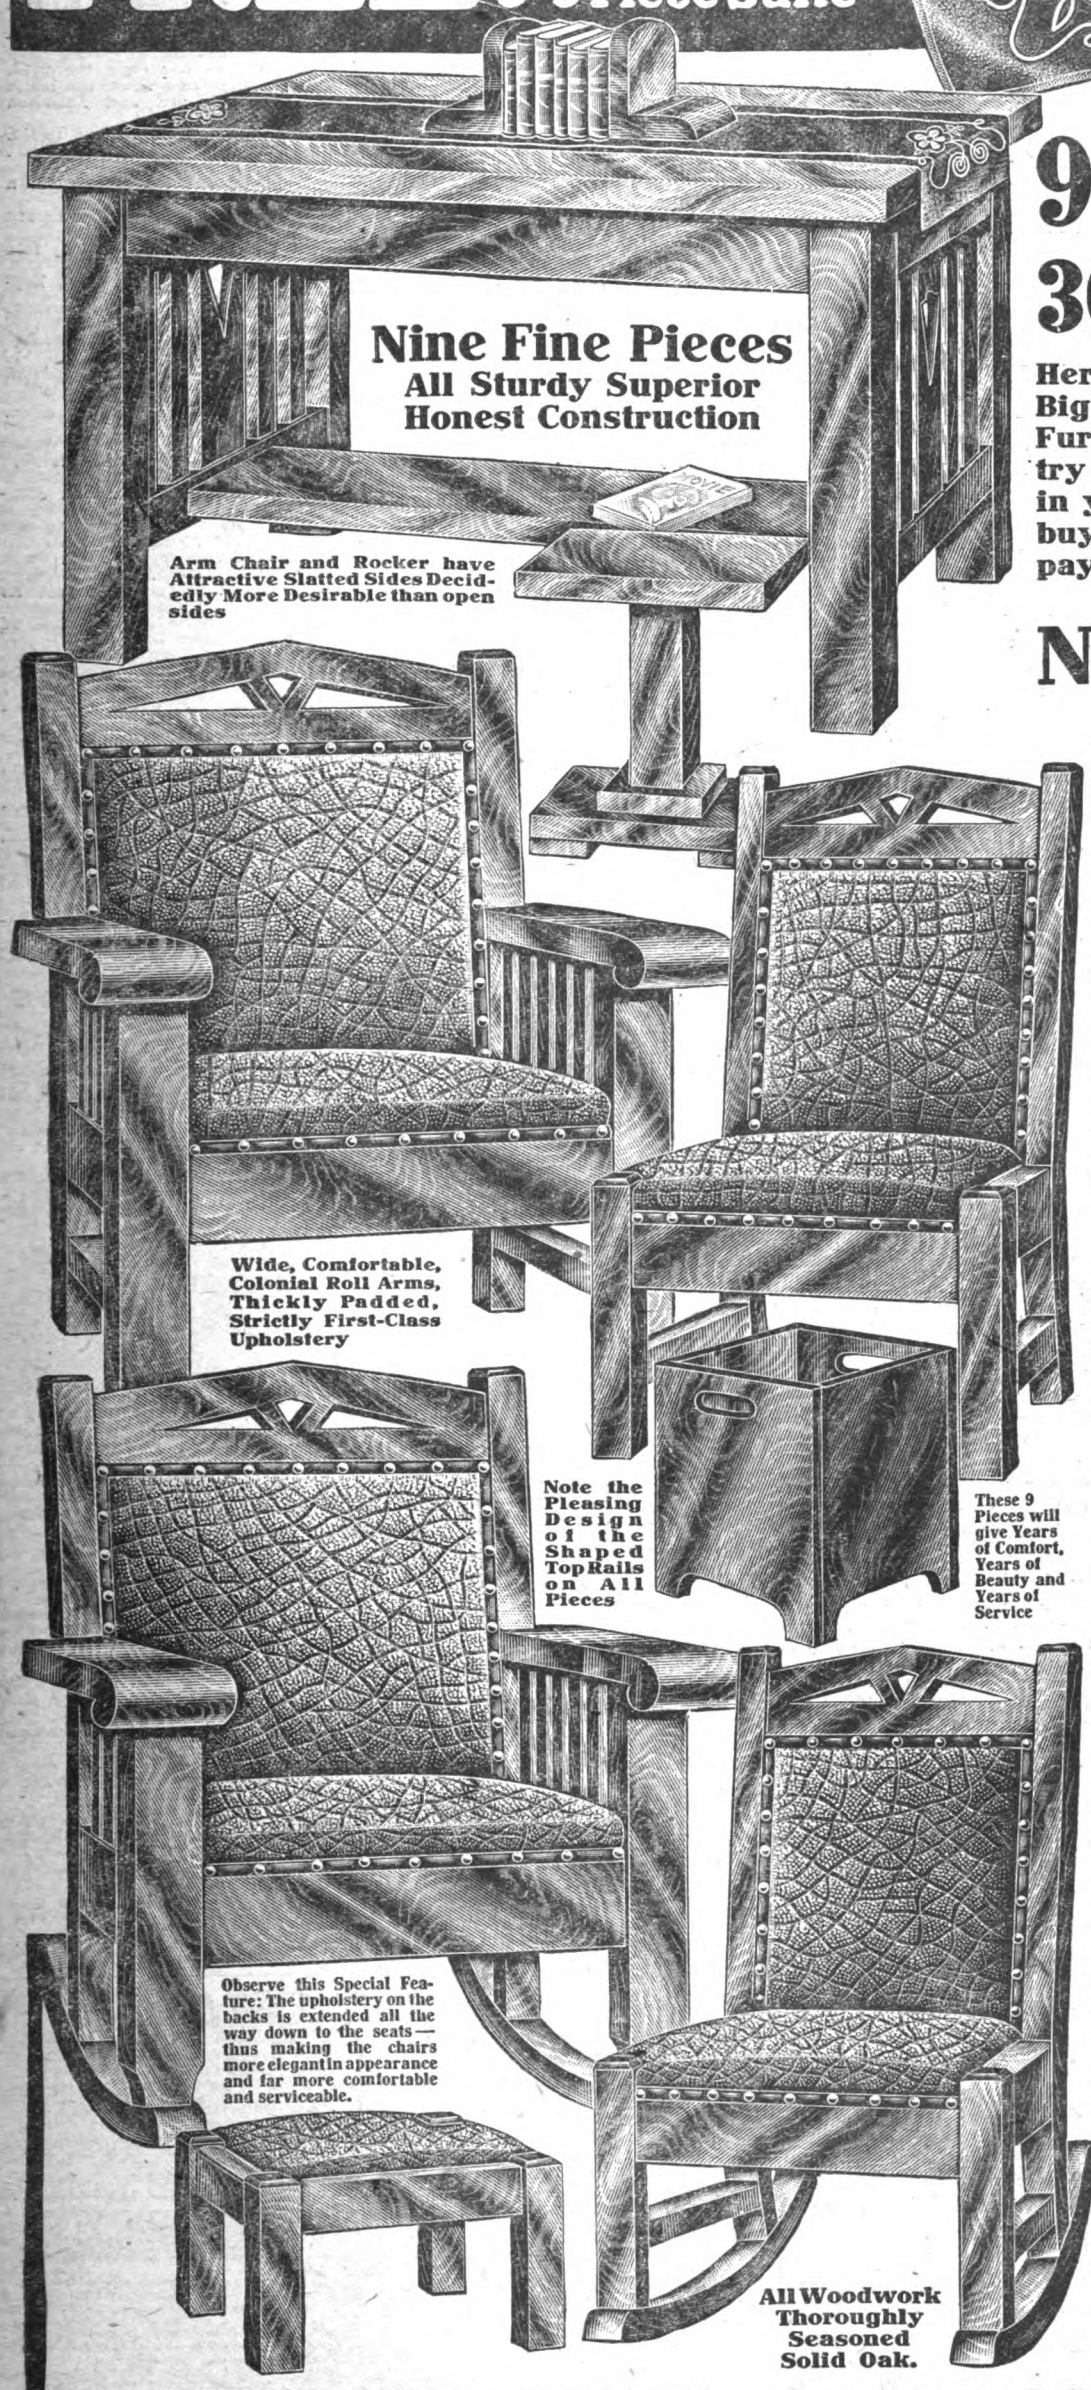
"Madame is dressing," she said blandly.

"Oh, she is, is she?" blustered Harkness. "Which is her room?"

With one eye on the disappearing maid, he tapped impatiently at his wife's door.



"Jim, is that you?" came a breathless voice. "You'll have to wait, dear."



"I tell you I won't wait. What's the matter with you, Marcia?"

She cast one dismayed look into the pier glass. From shining hair to the tips of her silver slippers, she was perfect. Her smoke-blue brocade frock with its flashes of silver was so lovely on her slender body that a sob rose in her throat at the sight.

Judson's Auction

A Harvest Story

By Joseph F. Novak

See front cover illustration.

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

DIANA Mannerly looked out over the autumning landscape. The leaves, brown and sear, raced and whirled across the cement road, and the lowering day portended early winter. Yet, there was nothing doleful in the prospect, for God had been good and the harvest plentiful.

Diana lived in a fashionable summer colony and the "Pines," their summer home, was their home, really for she and her father spent the winters in city hotels.

Because she was city-bred, the country had a fascination for her. She tried to get to the Pines as early in Spring as possible, and it was her joy to watch the farmers at their work and see their harvests develop. And there was something inexpressibly sweet to her in the way most of the farmers and their wives labored together for their common weal.

Yet, to be a successful farmer was not mere play, and that Diana knew, for the fact that many had failed was attested to in the placards that appeared along the roads announcing auction sales.

Diana had often wanted to attend an auction, and now, when she saw a flivver stop and a man nail one of these placards on a telegraph post down the road, she determined to attend that one, and so she sauntered out of the house and down to the road to see the date and place. It was, however, several weeks away, but noting another sign, she consulted that and found that on the morrow a sale would be held at the Judson farm.

Not knowing just where the Judson farm was, she decided to seek it out that afternoon.

She went to the garage and soon was off in her sedan, and presently arrived at the place.

A young woman with unsmiling eyes came to the fence.

"Did you want to see someone?" she queried.

"Is this the Judson farm?" Diana queried in reply. "I want to attend the auction tomorrow."

"This is the place," the young woman said.

Diana gazed around. "You have a pretty place. Why do you want to leave?"

"We don't, but we must. My God, tomorrow Tom and I will be beggars."

"Beggars?"

"Yes, we've been swindled out of everything," and then, as if it were a relief to her sore heart, she poured out the story.

"My husband wanted to buy a tractor, but we couldn't afford it and some sharks came and said that we could buy it on time. Tom signed the note all right and the tractor was sent, and we thought everything was all right until the company's representative came and demanded a payment. Tom looked at him like crazy and said that we had paid with a time note. But they said they had sold the tractor on payment to the fellows who sold it to us and that they had transferred the contract to us and we were to make the payments or else they would take the machine from us. We couldn't so they came and took the tractor away. We don't blame the tractor company; it wasn't their fault. Then those devils went and sold the note, and got a judgment on it, and then they came and levied on the place here and the few thousand dollars we had in the farm and the sale of our stock and crops will clean us out, and we're done."

"How dreadful! But didn't you fight it?"

"Yes, but what was the use? The judgment was rendered because they said the note had 'passed into innocent hands for value'—that means that someone bought it without knowing that there was a swindle back of it—and as they paid good money for it they were entitled to collect."

"And you are giving up everything?"

"Everything," the young woman replied, dully. "Tomorrow, if we were old people, we'd be ready for the poorhouse. As it is, all we have left is our health and each other."

Each other! Ah, how little all else mattered when they had "each other"! Diana thought.

"But what shall you do?" she persisted.

"We'll go and live with my folks, though they haven't got much. I'll be someone's hired girl and Tom will be a hired man until we can get a little money together again. Oh, we were so happy here. The crops came along so nice, and we expected such a good harvest. We worked together, Tom and I, buying things cheap or second-hand and making them do, planning to get along with them until we'd have the farm paid for—and this is our harvest," and she waved a despairing hand at their worldly goods ready for the sale.

Just outside the barn, in a neat row, stood all the farm machinery, all cleaned and repaired to make them as attractive as possible, but showing, nevertheless, that they had long been out of the factory. Against the barn were ranged rakes, hoes, pitchforks, spades, etc., while about the yard were improvised chicken-coops, in which the poultry was imprisoned.

Mrs. Judson invited her quasi-guest to the house.

"See what an auction means," she said.

She had lined up all her household goods to facilitate quick handling. All this, too, had been brightly rubbed and polished, and anything that had the slightest value was put up for sale, even poor little pictures and bric-a-brac (probably purchased at ten-cent stores) that, in their attempt to claim worth, were accordingly the more pitiable because of the bold front they tried to display.

A mist came to Diana's eyes.

"What is your entire debt?" she asked.

"About three thousand dollars, including everything. Our stuff won't bring much, but we're counting on the crops and the farm will pay off the biggest part."

"I'll come tomorrow," Diana said. "Possibly I may be able to bid for some things. Some of the—the chickens, perhaps, and maybe a—a few bushels of corn to feed to them," she said lamely, for what could she purchase at a sale like that?

The next morning was almost hot, one of those October days when it seems as if summer has returned to claim some forgotten trinket and it secured, she speeds away. The sun shone brilliantly, the fall flowers seemed to take a new lease on life, and the cattle strayed farther away from the cattle barns to graze on the brown turf.

Diana reached the Judson farm, just as the sale was about to commence. There were but few women there—women only attended when an auction held some worthwhile household goods, and poor Mrs. Judson's didn't amount to much.

She went to the house and was greeted by a sturdy young fellow with troubled eyes. There was an air of betrayed confidence about him, a look you might expect to see in a child who had been cheated out of something and doesn't know what to make of it, and it was the more touching because of his giant helplessness.

Diana asked for Mrs. Judson.

"She's upstairs, miss," he said. "Will you go up?"

Diana did so and found Mrs. Judson sitting in a chair gazing dully over the barnyard where the farmers were gathered in groups and knots, expressing not very flattering opinions of the stuff on display.

One chap in particular commented upon everything in a dried-out sort of way that seemed to immensely tickle his audience.

"Who's that old fellow?" Diana queried indignantly.

"The one who's knocking everything? Oh, don't mind him. That's old Samp (his name's Sampson), and all he does is hang round the railroad depot when he ain't got nothing else to do and find out things to tell or make 'em up when he ain't. He's a he-gossip, he is."

Diana listened to the man's dried-out manner of talking, but, quick to determine character, she found herself not blaming him as there was no venom in his chatter.

Suddenly there was an unusual stir in the yard, and Diana looked to see the cause of it.

The "cause" was the approach of a tall, big-bodied young fellow of perhaps twenty-six. Except for his carriage and the set of his exceptionally well-shaped head, he might have passed for a farmer for he was dressed in olive-drab whipcord coveralls. He had large, well-shaped hands that didn't look accustomed to handling anything in the manual line except it might be an automobile steering wheel. Across his breast a watch-chain was slung from which dangled a diamond-encrusted charm that threw off a thousand irridescences. He wore light oxfords and silk socks.

"Hello, boys," this individual cried, and then: "Well, Samp, I'm here as I promised." His voice was full and jovial, and his laugh seemed to break like a Fourth of July bomb and cheer everything within the radius of its hearing.

"How'd'ye come?" queried Samp.

"Oh, I walked over from Jim Howard's," the arrival responded. "I could have driven down but I wanted to wander through the ravine: the scenery is perfectly wonderful."

"Well, I'll be gol-danged if I kin see anything purty in that mess o' rock," old Samp responded, and then he went on confidentially:

"Listen, Mr. Lauriton. They's a fine hoss here whut you kin buy fur five dollars!"

"My Gawd!" he ejaculated, showing his white, even teeth. "A horse for five dollars? Judas priest! as Jim Howard would exclaim!" he finished.

"You'd better buy that hoss, Mr. Lauriton," Samp advised seriously, and then as the auctioneer arrived, the farmers gathered around and soon the sale was under way.

"Who is that man?" queried Diana of Mrs. Judson.

"Why, he's a young city man what visits with Jim Howard. He's very rich and went to college with Jim. Howard has a big place over towards Valley Grove."

The sale was now going on and Fellers was letting the small stuff go at a great rate. Ten-and fifteen-cent sales were common.

"Good heaven, Samp!" Mr. Lauriton exclaimed, and Diana heard him. "They sell junk that I throw out in the alley. When I get home I'm going to collect my riffraff and have an auction."

And now the sale was to go to the stock, and its quality is best summed up in Samp's description of it afterwards:

"Judson didn't have no great layout o' beasts, they was th' ornieriest bunch, but when they led out ol' Bob Tail Bess to sell her, th' whole thing was comin' to a joke, 'cause she had th' heaves an' was blind, but outside o' that she was all right."

Thus Samp described the cattle, and despite the fact that his humor was cruel, for it possessed a great deal of truth, he had summed up the situation pretty well.

Just then the aforesaid Bess was led out. She was not much larger than a pony and being buckskin she looked rather pretty when you didn't get the roll of her glassy blind eyes for that roll marked her for the devil's own. Of course, none of the farmers wanted her.

The listening Diana heard the aged Samp thus counsel Lauriton:

"Now, Mr. Lauriton, they's some hoss. If I's you and had your money, I'd buy her. She's got good wind an' I b'lieve you could make money on her. At a sale like this, where all th' farmers is purty well fed-up on hosses, they can't git much but you know a lot o' folks in your town an' could prob'bly sell her for a whole lot more'n you pay for her. Maybe you kin make a racer out o' her!"

They moved a little from under the porch, and Diana saw that the young city man seemed impressed.

"Is she gentle?" he asked of Mr. Fellows, the auctioneer.

"Gentle!" he yelled, "gentle? She's a lamb!"

He probably meant she was a wolf in sheep's clothing, to judge by the wicked glare in her eye.

"Trot her out, boy!" Lauriton commanded, and old Bess went around the ring.

Diana watched, interested, yet indignant. The farmers had formed a great circle. In the center, Fellers, the auctioneer, was standing, bellowing his head off in his good-natured, persuasive manner, his collar-band unbuttoned, and a long stick in his hand pointing to each man in the ring, trying to start a bid.

"Come on, boys! Start a bid! Who'll make it five?" And then as there was a dead quiet, though the farmers nudged one another, Fellers continued:

"Come on, boys! She's a good horse. 'Course she's a little blind, but she's good for field work. Why, if you shot her tonight and skinned her, her dog-gone carcass 'ud be worth five dollars!"

"Five dollars!" Lauriton yelled mischievously, and there was a yell of approval.

Fellers (whether he sensed the mischief on Lauriton's part or not), pointed his long stick at him and yelled: "Five! Five! Do I hear ten? Five, five, going, boys—look out!—I'm going to sell her!—going, going and she is—sold! To that gentleman there!"

"Great Scott!" Lauriton yelled. "I don't want her. I only wanted to start the bidding."

"You've got to take her," Mr. Fellers said. "You've bought her and she's yours and you've got to take her away. Never mind, though, I'll sell you a buggy and some harness to go with her."

"Mi-gawd! Wouldn't I flabbergast Jim if I came back in the glory of a horse and buggy!"

At the mention of a buggy, a little farmer piped up:

"Say, Mr. Lauriton, I bought a buggy for a dollar, but ye kin have it fer a dollar an' a half. Look at her," and he pointed to a buggy that was on its last legs.

"Bought!" exclaimed Lauriton. "Now, who's got some single harness to sell?"

"Here's some that I'll sell for eighty cents."

There was a roar then, and for the edification of the crowd, Lauriton began to clumsily harness up. The farmers good-naturedly helped him and they were having a picnic when——

Upstairs in the window, sat Mrs. Judson and Diana and it all passed in their view. Mrs. Judson sobbed bitterly.

"Oh, Miss Mannerly, that's just too terrible. It ain't enough that we're losing everything but to have them make fun of our things. I know Old Bess ain't much of a horse, but she earned her keep in the fields, and that buggy ain't much to look at but it gave me and Tom the only pleasure we ever got. It's like—like—lookin' into a grave an' laughin'—Oh, my God, my God!"

Diana's eyes dilated, and she sped down the stairs and out onto the porch. She looked like a wrathful saint with the sun shining down upon her hair that blew about her head like a halo.

The laughter ceased as she spoke with biting scorn.

"All this may be a great joke to some of you," she began stingingly, her eyes resting particularly upon Lauriton, "but do you realize what a heartache it is causing poor Mrs. Judson? You are making sport of their life's tragedy, and belittling, hurting and wounding them in cheapening those poor little possessions which, through association had become very dear to them. For shame, all of you! If you are men, why don't you treat this like a business proposition and not like a circus!"

Elroy Lauriton's face dyed red. "I—I—didn't know," he began guiltily.

"No, you didn't know! Common courtesy might have told you differently, but you are a city man and think you're mighty funny, no doubt. Do you realize that your uproarious laughter is nearly breaking the heart of the poor girl whose hopes for a harvest have turned out to be this?—and who, with her husband, must, tomorrow, face the world, penniless!"

"Mr. Fellers!" she continued. "Stop the sale! Whatever the debt is, I will pay it and take over the whole place."

Mr. Fellers looked undecided.

"You are in earnest, Miss. The sum is nearly three thousand dollars!"

"I've spent as much on a single dance," Diana blazed, not realizing what she was saying, "so I'll be responsible and I ask all who have purchased anything to cancel the purchase."

During the while, Lauriton had remained seated in the buggy, listlessly holding the reins in his hands and looking down. A tenseness fell upon the gathered men.

One of the chaps tried to break it with a "funny crack":

"Well, you goin' to turn back your purchase, Mr. Lauriton? Better put Bess through her paces afore you git beat out'n that noble animal," and he cut her as he spoke.

It was all that was needed to rouse the fiery Bess. She reared up, plunged forward and tore along like the devil, with Lauriton hanging on, for so suddenly had she started that he was utterly unprepared. Out of the yard Old Bess lit and tore down the road with the frenzy of the sightless. Over bump, boulder and rut she tore, wild, maddened by the sharp cut, and in a moment or two could not be seen for dust.

"Good heavens, he'll be killed, Miss Mannerly," shrieked Mrs. Judson.

Diana, in a moment, had seen Lauriton lose control of the wild mare. Then, like the impulsive girl she was, she flew to her machine, gave it the gas, and started down the razor-backed highway. Just as she had nearly overtaken the buggy, there was a crash, Diana saw Old Bess catapult into the ravine on one side, while the buggy upset and rolled down the other.

Diana stopped and looked down, and in among the brown, broken ferns she saw the smashed buggy, apparently atop Lauriton, for all she saw protruding from under the wreckage was a motionless right arm, upon the hand of which a brilliant diamond sparkled in the sunlight.

Without much ado, she grabbed hold of the bushes that grew on the side of the "razor-back" and slipped and stumbled to the bottom.

Fortunately the buggy was a light one, and with a tug she pushed it away enough to get Lauriton from under it.

She sat him up and gave him a shake. The effect was salutary. He let out a yell of pain, but immediately choked the next one, and a wicked smile came to his eyes.

"My arm's broken," he remarked calmly.

"Is that all?" she asked even as calmly. "Can you walk?"

"Perhaps, if you'll help me," he returned, and he placed his good arm about her and up the "razor-back" they went.

Diana looked at him severely, but there was only that wicked smile. But when she gazed at him covertly, she saw his features tortured with excruciating pain.

So she got him into the machine and took him to the doctor and when his arm was nicely comfortable, she took him home to Jim Howard's.

"You're coming to see me, I know," he whispered, as she was ready to drive off.

"I am—not," she replied.

"Yes, you are," he replied, arily. "I know it. I feel it in my heart."

"Really, why don't you set yourself up as a clairvoyant?" she retorted and she hurried away.

But she couldn't help smiling and she saw now that his was an irrepressible good-nature and that he couldn't help his teasing.

She was sure of it later, for when she and her father, together with Tom and Barbara Judson, went to the local bank to arrange for the new loan—for Tom was an honest chap and would not accept Diana's generous offer except as a loan—the banker told her that he could take the note from her and give her the cash as he had a party who was anxious to secure it.

Of course, Diana guessed who the "party" was.

They left and returned to the Judson farm. Diana helped Barbara straighten up the house and put everything into place, and they worked like busy bees until it was quite dark.

Then they sat out upon the porch and quietly talked, while the great harvest moon rose higher and higher in the sky and threw its effulgent light upon the fields of stacked corn. Tom's crops had been splendid ones—in fact, it was upon the crops that he placed his greatest hope for a good return at the auction.

"Well, we won't lose our harvest after all, will we, dearest?" he whispered, as he put his arm about Barbara and gathered her close.

Diana sat nearby, and she was thinking—thinking of a teasing cut-up.

Gradually there came to her ears the plod, plod, of a horse in the road and when the house was reached the horse stopped and Lauriton jumped from the buggy.

"Hello, folkses," he began, "I'm here again. Jim guaranteed that old Tink there wouldn't run if you hit him with a Big Bertha."

"Good reason why," Diana murmured, "if a Big Bertha hit him."

"Oh, properly squelched," he laughed. "I want to speak to you all, a moment, if I may. I called at your home, Miss Mannerly, and they told me you were here."

"Speak ahead, Mr. Lauriton," said Tom, happiness radiating from his voice.

"I want to apologize for that funny business yesterday. Somehow I will see the amusing side of things, but of course I should have found out the cause of the sale before I got "fresh". I didn't ask Jim and naturally supposed you just wanted to leave the neighborhood. Can't I buy that note from you, Miss Mannerly, and so show how genuinely sorry I am?"

"But I can't forego the happiness of doing something for Barbara and Tom, Mr. Lauriton."

"Well, then, can't we go—fifty-fifty?"

"I'll let you know—a bit later," Diana compromised.

During the following days Diana came to the Judson farm, and as often as she did Lauriton was sure to be there, for he lingered on through the lovely October month, since, one arm still being almost useless, he felt he might just as well stay on.

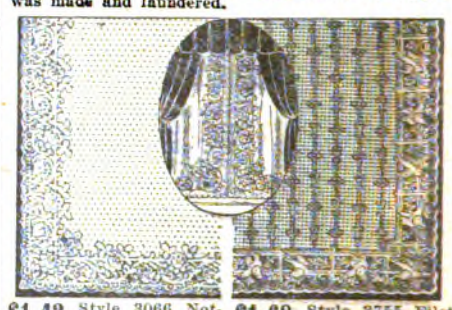
"Any decision yet?" he queried, at the close of a glorious bright blue October day.

"Yes, we'll share the pleasure," Diana said.

"That will be even better than having the whole note. I love to share things. I wish I could share my all with you. Could I, do you think—Diana?"

She had promised to take him to Jim's in her machine and they now went toward it.

She said not a word for a moment. A little sunset breeze crooned about them. Then she tried to look into his face, without blushing, without emotion. She could not.



"You may if you wish, Elroy," she said, dreamily.

"Diana! Anybody looking? No, only Old Bess and she's blind! All right, here goes! I'm glad I didn't break both arms in that spill, otherwise I couldn't do this," and encircling her with his good arm, he drew her to his bosom.

The Pretty Girls' Club

Bad Nail Habits

I HOPE none of my girls have the very bad habit of biting their finger nails, yet I should not be surprised if here and there was some otherwise quite pretty girl who has let herself form this objectionable habit.

Don't do it, girls. It ruins otherwise lovely hands, it gives you an ugly grubby appearance, and besides, my dears, let me whisper that doctors consider it to denote a poorly disciplined mentality, which means that you have not learned to use your mind well as yet but are in the immature stage of young children who do not know how to direct their bodies properly.

Of course none of us want to seem mentally deficient to anybody, and assuredly none of us want ugly nails, so if any of us have begun to nibble away at finger nails in moments of nervousness, let's make up our minds to stop it at once.

The first thing needed is to give daily care to the nails, so that there will be no ragged bits of cuticle sticking up to invite the absentminded bite, and no rough edges to the nails which one attempts to smooth with the teeth.

Use your nail file every morning to smooth and shape the nail until it is like a polished surface, and use your orange-wood stick to keep the cuticle pushed down at the base of the nail, and your manicure scissors—nice thin curved ones, not too long—to carefully snip away any little hangnails. If the skin around the nail has become very roughened from your bad habits, you can use a bit of hand pumice very gently indeed to rub it smooth. At night rub vaseline into the flesh of the finger-tips, massaging it into the cuticle about the base of the nails. And when you arise in the morning, gently scrub the nails with a good nail brush, then rinse and dry, and rub in a tiny bit of nail cream or other soothing ointment. Just a tiny bit that the skin will at once absorb.

BITING NAILS IS AN UGLY HABIT.

If you will follow these directions, and keep your nails shaped, spotlessly clean, and rubbed gently with the palm of the hand until they are lightly polished, I am sure you will always remember not to bite and disfigure them.

If you need any help, in addition to this, ask your druggist to put you up a little quinine solution—which is quinine dissolved in alcohol; or a solution of bitter aloes, also dissolved in alcohol. Apply this to the nails with a brush, and I assure you at the first taste you will be willing to stop.

Answers to Questions

NEBRASKA GIRL.—I do not think it wise for you to exereise the joints which have been affected by inflammatory rheumatism. What has your physician told you to do? In my own experience, very hot applications to such joints has helped, if carried out daily without missing any day. The water was very hot, and steaming cloths wrung out and applied, being replaced with fresh ones continuously, for ten minutes or more. One of the big specialists here has his rheumatic patients spray their joints first with hot water and then with cold, then hot, then cold, etc. How are your tonsils and your teeth? Your physician has no doubt told you to see that these are in perfect condition. Look after your diet; eat simple healthful things, see that your bowels move freely daily, drink lots of water, and rest your inflamed joints. Get rid of that rheumatism as quickly as you possibly can; there is nothing that gives more trouble over a longer period. You ask for exercises for large bust and hips. If I were you I should avoid all exercise until my joints were in perfect condition, otherwise you may strain some ligaments and cause yourself endless trouble. Your weight for a height of five feet six and one-half inches should be about 143 pounds, depending upon the size of your bones; with small bones it could be less. Your waist should be ten inches smaller than hips and bust which should be alike in measurement. About 39 inches would be correct for a 29-inch waist, or 42 inches for a 32-inch waist.

R. R.—All your troubles, hair, complexion, sleeplessness, etc., come from the long continued condition of constipation. What has your physician told you to do? Follow his directions faithfully. You are 25 pounds overweight which shows conclusively that you eat too much and of the wrong foods. You say you only eat twice a day; then I am afraid at least one of those meals is too heavy. No doubt—or, rather, of course—wrong eating is at the bottom of your condition of constipation. Cut out at once all fat building foods, which means starchy foods and fat and sweet foods; this will eliminate candy, cake, pie gravy, potato, rice, fat meats, etc. Suppose you try the following diet for a time: At night soak six prunes in a glass of warm water. On rising in the morning drink a glass of water. Fifteen minutes later, drink the prune juice and eat the prunes, chewing every particle until it is liquid before swallowing. Before you rise, practice for ten minutes the exercise I will give you below. It will do you no harm to go without breakfast. Drink a glass of water every three-quarters of an hour until about an hour before midday dinner. For this, eat simple food, chewing it until liquid, drinking nothing with your meals or until an hour after. In fact it would be well to wait two hours. You must cut out coffee, tea, white bread. Suppose you eat some toasted biscuit without butter, a soft poached egg, or some bran bread with your egg. In addition a baked custard, or a baked apple if it agrees with you (cooked until it bursts its skin), or a piece of melon, or some grapes. You see, you must eat very simple food for a time. You could eat some spinach cooked quickly in very little water; or asparagus, or carrots well cooked. Don't eat turnips, cabbage, cauliflower, onions. For supper eat very little. If I were you I should only have some barley gruel and some toasted biscuit at night for some weeks. If raw apples agree with you, you could eat one following dinner, chewing it thoroughly. You must eat absolutely nothing between meals, but beginning an hour—or two hours—after a midday dinner, drink a glass of water, sipping it slowly, every three-quarters of an hour until an hour before your evening meal, which you should eat rather early. You will find you sleep better with very little food at night and eaten quite a while before retiring. If you can regulate your meal hours, I should say you should eat your noonday meal about 12 o'clock, and your evening meal about six. For your midday meal you can eat, as a change, a little roast or stewed chicken, chewing it thoroughly, along with spinach or carrots; then your simple dessert. Before beginning this diet, I should take an enema, though all doctors will warn you against the enema habit; it soon teaches the bowels to rely upon this artificial aid and they will not move of themselves; this is also true of cathartics themselves. Yet a teaspoonful of aromatic cascara at night before starting on this diet, and after you have taken an enema, will probably start you off right. Then cut out all cathartics. Exercise in the morning for fifteen minutes, and again before going to bed for another fifteen minutes. Take a walk during the day of at least half an hour, not until two hours after eating. You must throw off these toxic poisons by exercise, and you must see that no more are stored up, by being sparing in your eating and very careful in selecting your foods. Bathe the entire body daily, frictioning the surface to cause the skin to throw off its impurities through the pores. You ask for external applications to cure the conditions. My dear, there isn't anything external which would do you the least bit of good. Your whole trouble lies in what you have eaten, how much you have eaten, and in faulty habits of the body. You have probably not exercised enough, and you have let yourself grow to depend upon cathartics and enemas. Of course when you first began to be constipated then is when you should have regulated your diet and your habits at once, but you can't help that now, so all you can do is be a little more severe in your diet regulations. Surely it is worth while to deny yourself and be very careful for a month or six weeks, to see if you cannot overcome this condition which is ruining your health and your appearance. Your doctor will tell you not to wait for a bowel action but to fix a certain hour each morning and each evening and daily make the attempt, not straining but giving up twenty minutes or half an hour if necessary. If you can manage extra exercise periods during the day without any binding clothes, that will help you more than anything else except the change in your diet. Be sure the eggs eaten are soft so that they will digest easily; for a soft-boiled egg it should not boil longer than three and one-half minutes. A little broiled fish or baked fish is permissible instead of egg or chicken, or a small piece of broiled lamb or steak or mutton if not well done. Do not eat any fried food, any hot breads or indeed any white bread at all, nor any sweets. I expect this sounds strenuous but your condition is one which needs strenuous treatment. I have known of people who have overcome such a condition by first freeing the bowels, then eating prunes each morning as I have directed, and living on a quart or two quarts of milk daily, with no solid food whatever. That means nothing to eat except the milk, which in such case is taken a glass at a time, beginning an hour or two hours after your prunes, with each mouthful of milk "chewed" before swallowing, none of it drunk down quickly. If you wanted to try this, you should exercise for fifteen minutes in the morning, take your prunes and your water, then an hour later drink a glass of milk, say at 8.30. At 9.30 drink a half glass of water; at 10.30 another glass of milk; at 1 o'clock another glass, at 3 o'clock another glass, at 5 o'clock another glass. In between these glasses of milk drink a glass of water, so that you will have three glasses of water between 10.30 and 5 o'clock. Drink another glass of water at 6.30, and another at 7.30, but no more milk. Exercise for fifteen minutes before you go to bed. This is also a strenuous way to overcome the conditions you are facing, but you may wish to try it. Naturally you won't feel very energetic while you are taking this diet, and you will lose in weight, but of the latter you should be glad, for you need to lose twenty-five pounds at the very least. Remember if you take up this milk diet, you must eat no solid food with it, but stick to milk alone, with the exception of the prunes. Now for the exercise which will do you the most good:

To Overcome Constipation

Lying on your back, on the bed, in nightgown or loose underwear, raise the right leg at right angles with the body, without bending the knee, then let it down as slowly as possible. This exercise strains the muscles of the abdomen and it is those muscles which need to be exercised in your case. If you let the leg down quickly, there is no strain on the abdomen; you should let it down so slowly that you feel the strain and the drawing of the abdominal muscles. Practice ten or fifteen times then the same number with the left leg; then with both together. The body should lie flat on the back, arms along the sides; don't lift the head.

BLUE EYES.—It is a simple matter to have pretty nails. Soak the fingers of one hand in warm soapy water for a few minutes, then with the flat end of an orange-wood stick, which you can buy at your druggist for five or ten cents, gently push down the cuticle at the base of the nail. Skin which has grown up on the nail can be skillfully clipped off with a pair of manicure scissors, but not with ordinary scissors, after it has been gently loosened from the nail by a cuticle knife (also on sale at your druggist's), or with the orange-wood stick. Do not pry at it vigorously or dent the nail with your efforts; but the skin having been softened by its soaking in the warm soapy water, just work at it gently until it is loosened from the nail, then clip it very carefully with the scissors, being most careful not to cut the skin below the nail but only the hard rim which is on the nail. Before putting your hands in the warm water, file the nails into a shape which follows the rounded ends of the fingers, using a flexible steel nail file. Then after attending to the overlapped cuticle as above directed, clean the nails thoroughly with your orange-wood stick, never with any steel instrument, as that makes the nail thick and hard in time. Each morning, after scrubbing the nails thoroughly, clean them as thoroughly, and with the flat end of the orange-wood stick, push the cuticle very gently back at the base of the nail so that it will have no chance to grow up on it again. I think if I were you I should postpone treatment of my freckles until late fall. About the warts, they can be removed as a rule, by tying a thread tight around their base. After a little they turn black and drop off. Try one at a time, and whatever you do, do not pick at a wart, as it is likely to turn into something much more objectionable.

VI.—Your skin is sluggish, perhaps because of your illness. Massage it nightly, by dipping your fingers in a tiny bit of cold cream and with the forefinger of each hand rubbing the nose toward its bony ridge, also its full length with little circular motions. Massage the cheeks with light circular motions, and also with upward strokes. This massage should follow a thorough washing. Have you been using soap on the face, or only in the water? The latter is the proper way, and after the washing, be sure that you rinse the face many times, the final time being in cool water. Then follow with your massage. End the massage by a light slapping of the face, rapidly with the flat of each hand. Also take abdominal exercises, such as the one given to "R. R.," for you should stimulate all the eliminative functions. How about your diet, and your weight? Eat sensibly, and give your skin every chance. I think you will find the above treatment will put you right again.

BUD.—About the "streak of light hair" on the side of your head, you should be glad of it. Will it cheer you at all to know that I have a streak of white hair on one side of my head—a real lock—and that I wouldn't part with for anything? And when I have my hair dressed for any very smart gathering, the hairdresser takes a great deal of trouble to make that lock show. It is quite fashionable to have a lock of hair different from the rest of one's hair, so if I were you I would consider myself fortunate. You don't know how many people have envied me mine. I even know of one woman who bought a false lock of white hair, and wore it fastened in among her own locks, to create this fashionable effect. So your nose gets red in the morning when you wash your face? Your circulation is probably a little uneven, and it would be a good idea for you to take up some daily exercise, night and morning. Also treat your nose with consideration when you take that face bath—bathe it gently, but give the rest of the face a gentle rubbing—mayhap that will restore the balance. A red nose may come from several things, chief among them being a stomach which is not doing its best work or, rather, which is being given too much work to do. Be sure that your food is chewed until it is liquid before swallowing; that you eat sensible foods, not too many sweets; that you drink a great deal of water between meals but not at meals; and that you do not eat between meals.

can have an orderly house all the time. I think there are other things to be considered sometimes and I certainly don't believe in having our homes just "so-so" at the expense of our health. There are some who think it is a crime for a woman to sit down and rest as long as there is a speck of dust anywhere or anything to do. But I think it is wrong for a woman not to rest an hour or so every day if she possibly can. Just hard work, such as keeping your house in perfect order, your children clean, plenty of good things cooked to eat, washing, ironing and sewing done in order, chickens taken care of, the many little deeds of charity we do, entertaining company that just happens in on you, are some of the things women have to do. One of the biggest tasks is taking care of the fruit and garden in the fall. If you are real healthy you may stand the life all right but if you don't have good health to begin with, what then? You won't last many years. Sisters, I know, by sad experience and now after fifteen years of married life and thinking I just must keep on working, I find that at the age of thirty-four, part of my work will have to go undone. I have lung trouble and at times I can do only the cooking for five and send my children to school. There will be a week or two at a time that I don't dare do the family washing and as I am living in the country I can't get anyone to do it for me and I have to depend on the men folks to do what has to be done and I can tell you we don't eat off a linen table-cloth as we used to. We eat off of white oilcloth. I am the only woman in the family; children are boys. They help me do lots of my work though. When my health became so bad that I couldn't do my work I cried my eyes almost out. I would cry until my head was hot and hurt all the time but I saw that would never do. My family couldn't be happy when I was so blue so I just made up my mind that if I couldn't do my work and be a help to my husband in that way, I could help in another. I could smile with my husband and children, and be cheerful, and how they appreciate it. They didn't care about the neat house and linen table-cloths; they'd much rather see me sitting down doing nothing but with a ready smile for each and every one. Of course when my neighbors come and find my house looking like a bachelor's hall, and I sitting out in the hammock, I suppose they go away and say, "that woman's good for nothing." But that is one of the trials I must bear. I try to smile and then smile some more. What's the use of grumbling? We should try to learn to not judge anyone by their work, and not to judge harshly at any time for we do not know the circumstances. I am living in a new neighborhood. Several have visited me and some of them came when my house was very dirty. I couldn't help it. All I could do was invite them in and treat them as nicely as I could. Perhaps they will judge my character by my home and never come again.

Don't you think if we would all live as God would have us live, with love for one another, overlooking each other's faults, and doing His will every day, that we would be much more contented? I am trying to live that way.

With love to everybody, your sister,
MRS. H. MOYER.

LAS CRUCES, N. MEX.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORTERS:

I don't like to tease but may I come in just once? I asked once before but wasn't admitted but I know Mrs. W. did the best there was to be done so I'm not going to let that worry me but here is one thing that does—never seeing a letter from this part of New Mexico. I wonder if I'm the only one so lucky as to have COMFORT? Well, others don't know what they are missing.

We have the dearest little valley here, not exactly "little" either but one naturally wants to speak of it as they would of anything dear to them. Its name is Masilla Valley, only it is pronounced Ma-see-a. Las Cruces means "The Crosses." Isn't it good that we can make something of nothing, and such pretty somethings too? Thanks to those who told about making different things of gunny sacks, because I've got "more gunny sacks" and didn't know what to do with them. Here is something I am making of a couple of them—cover for our speedster seat. Cut the sacks to fit the seat and embroider in yarn or silk or silk thread a basket of flowers or some design you like in cross-stitch. If you don't like to remove the tacks that are used to hold the leather binding in place, use carpet tacks, or tacks with large heads. Be sure and allow plenty of material so that enough can be turned under at the edge to make it firm. This makes a durable cover. I got the idea from a linen colored cover in a swell limousine. I couldn't say what the material was but it looked good. I have a dining table cover made of the fifty-pound flour sacks, another cut in half and sewed together, making a scarf for my buffet and one the same way for the fireplace mantle. Instead of joining the sacks with lace I used gingham. I'm using light tan as the wall paper in my dining-room has a tan background. In each corner I used gingham of pink, tan and yellow and made a cluster of apples and green for leaves and with black thread for the lines in the leaves and to applique the fruit onto the cloth. It is a very pretty set.

Good by.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I can't resist the temptation of writing to say "Amen" to Mrs. Mason's remarks. She certainly voiced my opinion to a detail, about dish washing and floor scrubbing. To see anyone wring a dish rag from soapy, greasy water and wipe the pan and kettles without rinsing either, in order to hurry through and get down on her knees and scrub the floors white, does not appeal to me either.

A Forgotten Love

self, his offer had seemed a refuge; there was another reason beyond poverty that had kept her away from London.

"Jacky was right; there must have been some reason," she thought, "for he doesn't like me. And I——" with a shock she realized that she hated the man who gave her all she had, hated and feared him.

The sullen, hot loathing of him that had come to her tonight seemed to lie at her heart tangibly. It frightened her.

"Jacky," she cried, panting with desperate horror of a something evil that was slowly drawing nearer, threatening, obscure; "I must have Jacky, or something dreadful will happen to me!"

Wild with a causeless terror—for till tonight Marchmont had never openly refused her anything, or reminded her of her position—Gillian locked her door and began with shaking fingers to write to Jacky. At first the sentences were strung together incoherently; then as she settled to her task her brain steadied. She got up and hunted in the little old desk that had been her father's; among the papers untidily stowed there were two she wanted; she had often wondered how they had got there, what he had been doing with testimonials as to a maid's character, and signed, too, by a countess and a well-known beauty. But they would be useful now, whatever they had been.

They had been kept in their envelopes and were fresh and clean. Gillian put them carefully in with her letter to Jacky, that was full of such minute, strange instructions. When it was safely sealed she rang for her maid, who of all the household was the only one who really liked the desolate young mistress. She was not on good terms with the other servants, either, having been engaged by Gillian herself, not Mr. Marchmont, and she was to be trusted.

"Pierce, do you think you could post this for me? I have no stamps," she said quietly.

"Certainly, miss," the girl said cheerfully, seeing it was to the mistress' sister in London, to whom she had once before acted as postman.

"It's a pity she hasn't a nice, cheerful young man now. I've never found sisters so reliable!" she thought as she loyally posted the secret letter that was to strike the very joy of life from Jacqueline Hamilton's lips.

CHAPTER III.

"A DEVIL INCARNATE."

Tall, dark, masterful, Lesard leaned against the mantelpiece, his lean face somber, his gray, hawk's eyes full of fire. He was stirred to the uttermost depths, for all he was so quiet.

Opposite him was Jacqueline Hamilton, sitting on the edge of a table, her face hidden in her hands. The firelight turned her wavy hair to burning gold, and Lesard noted it as he looked at her bowed head.

"Do you love me as much as that?" he said.

His voice was as unlike him as his face, all its reckless gaiety gone.

Jacky nodded.

"I'm ashamed. Oh, I'm ashamed!" she whispered pitifully.

"Don't be—ashamed!" How slowly he was speaking. "Come here, sweetheart."

For there was half the length of the room between them.

"No!" Her head was lower than ever; he could hardly hear her.

"Come here!" It was an order now, more than an entreaty, and her hands dropped from her face as she straightened herself where she half-sat, half-leaned, against the table.

So slowly that she seemed to feel the floor cautiously for each step, she came to him; nearer, nearer; her eyes almost closed, her lips apart and piteous. When there was still a wide space between them, Lesard moved sharply toward her, with the strength and grace and litheness with which he did everything. He had to stoop to slip one arm around her waist, the other round her shoulders.

"Look up, sweetheart," he cried softly, his voice thrilling her to the core of her heart. "Don't be ashamed. That was nothing to say between you and me. Don't you know there is nothing that can't be said between us now? Look at me!"

He would not try to lift her face to his; she must look at him of her own accord, or not at all. The vague, intangible sweetness from her hair went to his head; the iron arms that held her so softly shook a little.

The girl looked up; her dark-blue eyes met the keen gray ones that were so near, doubtfully at first, then with a sudden flash of the spirit that had been so fearless—till tonight.

"You are not my master!" she flung her head back against his arm, and met his gaze rebelliously.

The man's eyes grew dark with love.

"I am—from tonight," he said slowly. "You love me; you've said so! It will be sweeter than being your own mistress, Jacky; you are very tired of being your own mistress. And you're not that any more—are you, if you love me?"

"Yes," she stammered over the answer, "yes, I am!"

Lesard laughed softly.

"Kiss me, sweetheart," he whispered, his face touching hers. "I tell you, you can't lead this life any longer. Do you think I don't know how tired you are—how you pinch, and save, and scrape to keep body and soul together? Come to me and rest; I'll take care of you."

His lips, very smooth through the fair mustache that was so striking on his dark, lean face, touched hers; surely, no man's kisses were ever like Lesard's, so sweet and quiek and tender!

The girl wavered; then she clung to him with a love that was like agony. Lesard's arms tightened around her as he felt hers go about his neck; the world was a dream to him; there was nothing in it but this fearless slip of a girl, who till tonight had defied him. As he kissed her time and again, her love was not more pure than his. Lesard—the adventurer, the money-lender, the man who was feared or despised as people knew him well or little—forgot his trade, forgot the secret burden that troubled his life, and kissed her as a man does a woman who rises from her prayers.

"Heart of my heart!" he said softly; and of her own accord Jacky lifted her lips to his once more.

"Have you been lonely?" she whispered. "I have, all my life. I've been alone in my mind till I knew you. I always felt like a child who can't find anyone to play with. Do you understand?"

"Understand? My God! yes." But how did this baby know these things, unless it were that she was soul of his soul already? For the first time he forgot his strength as he caught her to him.

Jackie gave a little stifled cry.

"Take care; don't drop me! I'm off my feet."

"Drop you!" the man answered with utter tenderness; "not I! Do you think you are so heavy?" As he spoke he lifted her with a hand on each side of her waist, lifted her without an effort, as a girl lifts a doll; for an instant he held her so, her face on a level with his; then he put her gently on her feet again.

"Sit down," he said with sudden compunction; "you're tired out! I've been a brute to you today, worrying you all the afternoon to make you say yes, instead of no. Why were you so hard to me? Did I—did I deserve it?"

"No!" she cried. "No, don't say such things. But you are all wrong. I can't marry you. It isn't as if I were alone in the world. I sent for you today to say good by."

Lesard did not answer; he knelt on the worn hearth-rug and began to make up the fire. The uncomfortable little room was cold.

"You can't say good by to me," he said coolly. "I won't have it. And how do you mean you're not alone in the world?"

Jacky looked at her watch nervously; in a few minutes the girl she lived with would come in; she dared not talk before her, and tomorrow she would be miles away.

"My sister," she said; "she needs me."

"But she is adopted by a rich man, you said. Do you mean she wants you to go and live with her? Because you can't—you're coming to live with me." He saw her mouth tighten.

"I can't marry you—not now!" she cried. "I'm frightened about Gill; she is so unhappy and she wants me. Listen!" She read him some—not all—of that dreadful, outspoken little letter.

Lesard, whom nothing ever jarred, gave an imperceptible start as he heard.

"Marchmont!" he said. "You never told me she was adopted by Paul Marchmont. I don't wonder she isn't—happy. Look here, Jacky; I won't have you going to Marchmont's house! I wouldn't let any woman go there, much less you!"

"You can't stop me. I've got to go," she returned quietly. "I'm not going to have Gillian wretched all day with that man and frightened all night for fear of robbers. She went to him just to let me have all the money we had, and I'm not going to be happy here while she is slowly dying. You don't know her; if a thing frets her, it seems to take her very life out of her. And I didn't read you all the letter, and I can't—I've got to go! I'm not afraid of burglars." She tried to laugh. If Lesard only knew just how she was going to Hamilton Place, how angry he would be!

"Burglars!" contemptuously. "I don't think many burglars will trouble Mr. Paul Marchmont. They wouldn't find it exactly profitable. If your sister knew a little more about her delightful guardian, she would dismiss that bugbear."

"What do you mean?"

"Nothing!" he said, with queer shortness. "But if you go to Marchmont's, I shall make flying visits to that neighborhood and see you——"

"You can't! I won't have it!" with sudden fright, for what should she do if he did come? It would ruin her plans.

"Well," he said, lighting a cigarette and taking no notice of her sudden start, "perhaps you are right! I won't have you skipping out after dark to meet any man, even me. And I don't fancy entering that brute's house. But you must promise to telegraph me the very instant you think you want me. Do you hear?" authoritatively.

"But why should I want you?"

"It's no house for any woman to live in—that is why! But I can't tell you; only if you're wise, you'll get your sister to leave him. Don't go, Jacky! Let her come here."

"How could she? She never has any money."

"Listen, Jacky!" Lesard was very earnest, his hard face very thoughtful. "I don't want you to go. It isn't safe. No, don't laugh! I don't mean any nonsense about burglars—I mean I don't want you to be in Marchmont's house; it's the man himself I'm afraid of. He is a devil incarnate—I can't tell you any more."

"Why not? If you know things about him, you ought to tell me."

Lesard turned away to hide the sudden tightening in the muscles of his face.

"I can't, Jacky!" and it seemed as if the words were torn out of him. "But I know, and you must never let out, even to your sister, that you know. If things are really as bad as you think they can be, don't wait for anything. Get out at once, both of you, and telegraph to me when you are safe in London. Don't go near the local office; it's never safe. And don't put any letters to me in Marchmont's post-bag—remember!"

"But I don't understand——" she began.

Lesard was at her side like a flash, and on one knee by her chair as he took her in his arms.

"No, and I dare not let you go! Jacky, if you love me, trust me, believe in me!" (Believe in Lesard! How his world would have laughed at the fool who should do it.) "Keep out of Marchmont's way; don't let him dislike you; and promise me to come back in a month—before, if you can. I shan't be happy for one hour while you are in Marchmont's house. And remember this always, that you're mine, all mine; that I'll take care of you; that you trust me, no matter what happens; that, if a tight place comes, I'm always at your back." (She little knew as she listened in wonder what it meant to have Lesard at your back—strong, unscrupulous, powerful.) "You're loyal enough; you may need to be loyal to me. Don't forget I warned you!"

She threw her arms around his neck, as if she felt something of the terror that was coming; as if a second sight warned her that it was not a short day's journey she was putting between herself and the love of her heart, but a wide world of doubt and despair.

"I'll have to go tomorrow!" she whispered sharply.

Lesard held her to him in an iron clasp. What could this child do against Paul Marchmont?

"Jacky," he began, "be careful not to——"

She pushed him frantically from her. The girl who shared the rooms was coming upstairs.

Jacky Hamilton went, after all, without the only warning that could have saved her heart from breaking.

CHAPTER IV.

MISS HAMILTON'S NEW MAID.

Mrs. Gibbs, black-haired, highly colored with the very best rouge, a fine-looking woman, too smartly dressed for her place, in spite of her orthodox black silk, stood in Mr. Marchmont's own sitting-room. She looked oddly perturbed, considering there was nothing in question but the engagement of a new maid for Miss Hamilton.

"Come down from London, has she?" Mr. Marchmont, reclining at his ease, was not the Marchmont Gillian knew. "What's she like, Polly?"

"Oh, a pale little slip, with red hair," carelessly. "Says Pierce"—who had left the very day after Gillian's conversation with Marchmont, shaking the dust off her feet—"told her of the place. But it's not that. It's these!" She held out two written recommendations. "However did she come by them?"

Marchmont took them, lifting his eyebrows in surprise.

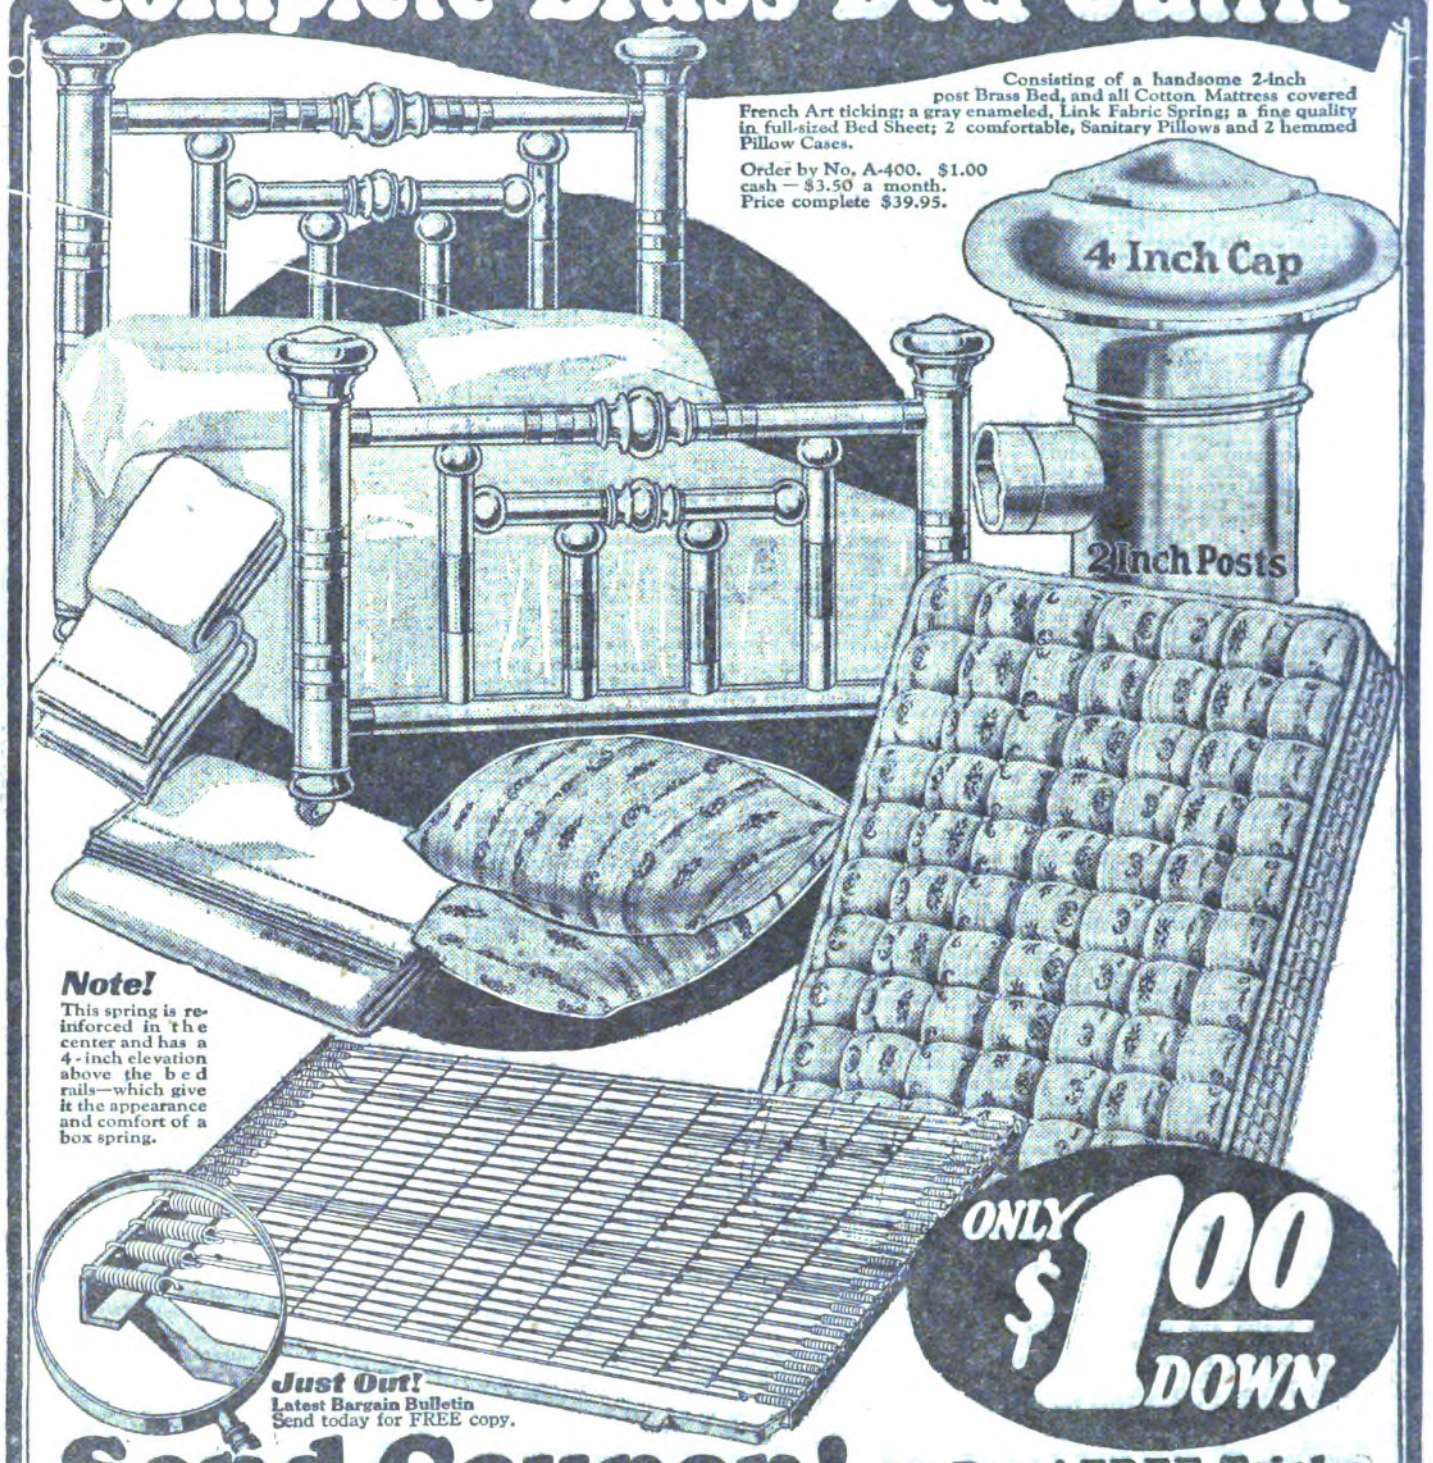
"The Countess of Ernescliffe! Mrs.——" he ejaculated. Then he smiled.

"Don't look so rattled, Polly," he drawled as she sank on a sofa beside him, remarkably at ease for a housekeeper; "it's all right. I mentioned to Billy when I was talking about his last piece of d——d cleverness, that we wanted a good, smart lady's-maid for our charge; he's sent her. But don't say that you know the testimonials mean any more than their face! It isn't a good plan."

"Don't you suppose I know that?" she returned. "Of course, it's all right, since you told Billy! But before, I couldn't see how the girl got sent here."

"It's all right; yes! Didn't she say anything?"

"No, nor doesn't know anything, I believe!" rising. "I'm to take her, then?"



"Of course. You may as well keep an eye on her, though. If she seems too knowing, do the grand and send her packing."

Mrs. Gibbs nodded and rustled out, silk evidently from top to toe. The girl looked the sort who would keep to herself, and that suited the housekeeper; she did not want anyone in the house who would try to attract the attention of its master.

"The references are satisfactory," she said with

Glandular Enlargements of Babies

IN taking this subject for our talk this month, we do so in answer to the many inquiries in regard to swollen glands of babies. We appreciate the fact that this is a large subject to discuss in this department, and also that we can only take up a few of the many kinds of glandular swellings, but hope to offer advice and suggestions that will be helpful and enable mothers to treat or procure treatment for their babies, if afflicted, soon enough to relieve a great deal of pain and suffering. A gland in the sense that we are used to the word is a name given to the various small organs of the body whose functions are to secrete or withdraw from the blood material to be used for other purposes, or excrete material that is injurious or of no use to the body.

An example of the secreting glands are the salivary glands, six in number, situated on each side of the mouth, and they secrete digestives that play an important part in the digestion of our food, especially the starchy foods.

If the salivary glands become irritated or inflamed, and this is often the case in teething, the saliva seems to be continually running out of the mouth.

In some diseases like mumps, which is a specific disease of one of the salivary glands, you often get inflammation of all the salivary glands, with a strong tendency to migrate to other glands of the body.

In blood-poisoning of fingers or hands you may get swelling and inflammation of the lymphatic glands or elbow and in under the arm, or if the blood-poisoning is in the feet or legs, you get swelling and inflammation of the lymphatic glands of the groin.

The explanation of this by those who have made special investigations is that the lymphatic glands, in trying to relieve the blood of the poison, become infected and therefore you get pain, swelling and inflammation in a part not very near the invasion of the infection. The point we wish to make here is this: you may get swelling, pain and inflammation in a gland when the gland itself is involved only in so far as it is trying to absorb a poison that is causing trouble in some other part of the body.

In pale, anemic babies you often see that practically all the lymphatic glands seem swollen or inflamed. This may be caused by some specific disease the baby has inherited from one or both parents, or may be caused by lack of proper food and oxygen.

A little care about the food to make it more nourishing, having the baby sleep out in the open air, a few drops of iron a day with cod-liver oil may build up the baby so it will become normal in every way.

The glands of the body, their functions and conditions in health and disease, is almost an endless subject and every investigation discloses some new interesting feature. In this talk we shall go into it far enough to impress upon the parents the fact that every swollen gland means something and must be looked after for the well-being of the baby.

One of the common glandular affections we shall take up is scrofula. This, as we understand it, is a peculiar general or constitutional condition where the lymphatic glands are in an irritable state, which renders them liable to become swollen and inflamed, and to have also lost the power of repair, the last condition manifesting itself by breaking down of glands and pus forming. The inflammation is of such a low grade that the swelling does not come to a point like a boil or carbuncle but has to be opened and cleaned out thoroughly. There are specific diseases that will cause scrofula, the most common causes are improper food, impaired nutrition, exposure to damp and cold for a long time, or attacks of measles, typhoid fever, or chronic malaria.

If a mother suspects that her baby is scrofulous, she should take it to a competent physician at once for examination.

The treatment is to open up the swollen inflamed glands as soon as you are positive pus is present, but the most important treatment is preventive and it simply means special care in diet, dress and the child's surroundings.

If the baby is nursing, the mother herself must be healthy and have plenty of good milk for baby, and if there is any doubt about this put the baby on modified milk. Special care as to dressing baby so that it will be warm enough, and to get it out in the open air all that is possible, sleep with open windows.

Very few appreciate the good that fresh air will do a baby, and it is unfortunate that the thing that is free to all, rich and poor alike, is used so little. If you are positive that it is getting plenty of nourishing food, that it is getting plenty of fresh air, that its dress is adapted to the season of the year and is warm enough to prevent its taking cold, then you may consider medicine.

The two things that offer the most help are iron and cod-liver oil, the amounts that you should give depend so much on the age and size of baby that it does not seem advisable to suggest dose.

If at any time you notice that your baby has a swollen gland or glands, get busy and find out the cause, and treat and remove it.

Do not be patient and wait, thinking the baby has something it will outgrow, as this is a foolish, vicious thing to do.

These glands have a function and something is preventing this function being carried out and we must come to their aid and relief.

Questions and Answers

BED-WETTING.—What can I do for my ten-year-old girl, who wets the bed every night? Have tried lots of remedies but they do not do any good.

MRS. M. E. L., Morton, Miss.

Bed-wetting is a most obstinate condition to relieve as we must first find cause and remove it in each individual case. Many of the most obstinate cases will yield to treatment when the urine is made clear and mild by some simple alkali like cream of tartar, teaspoonful in glass of water two or three times a day, or equal parts of vichy water and milk. If urine is concentrated, with odor of ammonia, give three-grain doses of Urotropin in one-half glass of water three times a day. Do not give Urotropin if urine is acid as this will acidify it. Have urine examined to see if it is acid. In some cases you get bed-wetting from reflex irritation of the bladder walls from pinworms in rectum. Enlarged, diseased tonsils and adenoids will often cause this condition, and an operation gives quick relief.

MORNING SICKNESS.—Will you please tell me if there can be anything done for morning sickness during pregnancy, as I vomit a great deal and feel weak, also have dull headaches?

MRS. E. L., Elamsville, Pa.

A.—Morning sickness is a sympathetic disturbance due to congestion of pelvic organs beyond the physiological limit, and for which it is to some extent a corrective. The treatment is to keep the bowels regular, avoid all excitement, sexual and otherwise, eat food easily digested, like stale wheat bread toasted, or liquids, milk, broths. An abdominal binder giving slight upward and inward pressure often gives relief.

CONSTIPATED BABY.—My three-year-old baby girl is constipated all the time; she eats most everything, but drinks a lot of fresh milk. She has bad breath, but aside from constipation is perfectly well.

MRS. V. P., Centralia, Wash.

A.—Give baby teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia in her milk often enough to keep bowels regular. Give her graham crackers, molasses cookies, orange juice, plenty of water; all of these things are good for the relief of constipation.

RHEUMATISM.—I have had a lame wrist and thumb for four months but thought it would go away when baby came a month ago, as it did when my two-year-old boy was born. My physician calls it neuritis. Will you give cause and cure?

MRS. J. H., Philipsburg, Mont.

A.—We think you have a form of rheumatism, but cannot see how it has any connection with your pregnancy, but is caused by acid condition of blood. Would suggest that you take ten-grain doses of sodium salicylate, after meals, three times a day, drink plenty of water, avoid acids. Locally, should rub on Iodex, and apply some on cloth under bandage.

BABY SWEATS.—What can I do for my ten-months-old baby who sweats all the time night and day, has a rattling in chest and cough? He weighs twenty-five pounds, but has not gained in weight for two months. I am still nursing him. MRS. G. D., Rantoul, Ill.

A.—Continued sweating is not only weakening, but indicates that your baby has some serious condition that is causing it. Should wean him and put him on nourishing diet with a good deal of milk. Give him twenty drops of Syrup of Hydriodic Acid (Gardner's) in water after meals, three times a day. If you do not get improvement soon, take him to some physician and have a thorough examination made, especially of chest.

CONSTIPATED NURSING BABY.—My nursing baby, two months old, is badly constipated, and I have to give him physic all the time. He has gained three pounds since birth.

A.—Regulate baby's bowels by keeping your own regular. Try and do this with your diet, but if you cannot do it, take teaspoonful doses of Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada often enough to keep bowels freely open and you will find baby's bowels relieved.

SPASMODIC CROUP, HICCOUGHS.—My eighteen-months-old boy was feverish for two days and coughed some and on the night of the third day, about an hour after we put him to bed, we found him in convulsions, almost choking. We tried to get him to vomit and he turned black. We called in a physician but he died soon. What remedy should I have used when he was choking? What is the cause of croup and will my four-months-old baby have it? What is a reliable remedy for hiccoughs? MRS. L. M., Everett, Wash.

A.—I think your baby must have had membranous croup, laryngeal diphtheria, as the ordinary spasmodic croup always terminates favorably. This baby should have had a large dose of Antitoxin, inhalations of lime being slaked, small doses of Tincture of Ipecac and Tartar Emetic, stimulants, brandy in small doses, few drops repeated often. If these things give no relief, an operation, intubation until membrane is dissolved. This form of croup is caused by specific germ the same as in diphtheria. The most important thing to remember about the treatment of this case is the fact that this baby had been sick and feverish for two days without treatment. Hiccoughs in baby will usually respond to a little sugar and water, but the best treatment is to see that baby does not nurse too often, and and that it is digesting its food properly, and it will not have hiccoughs.

YELLOW SPOTS.—Can you tell me how to avoid yellow spots coming on my face when pregnant?

MRS. E. F. R., Luray, S. C.

A.—I should pay special attention to my digestion, especially to the bowels, taking a grain of calomel in divided doses two or three times a week.

MATERNITY CORSETS.—When my baby was born its hands and face were black for a month. Could this have been caused by maternity corsets?

MRS. A. I. R., Cedar Bend, Minn.

A.—No, absolutely not.

SCARLET FEVER.—My fourten-months-old baby had scarlet fever when he was four months old and it settled in his ear, and still discharges with bad odor. What can I do for him, and when should I wean him?

MRS. P. H. W., Erdwin, Texas.

A.—Wash out baby's ear with a saturated solution of boracic acid with rubber ear syringe, then drop two drops of twenty per cent. solution of Argyrol. You should wean a baby when eleven months old, as a rule.

CONSTIPATED BABY, ACID URINE, MALNUTRITION.—My four-months-old baby is badly constipated, kidneys do not act very often and he cries out at that time. My three-year-old girl has no appetite, sleeps with her eyes open, and has sores all over her body.

MRS. J. P., Livingston, Texas.

A.—If your baby is nursing, its bowels should be regulated by your own; that is, keep your bowels regular and baby's will be also. For the painful urination, you may have been eating lots of acids, and the baby's urine becomes acid; this would cause painful urination. Would suggest that you have baby examined by competent physician as circumcision may be needed. Your three-year-old girl is suffering with malnutrition and I would suggest three-drop doses of Tincture of Chloride of Iron, three times a day after meals, in water or syrup, nourishing diet, including milk, eggs, broths, and keep her out in the open air all you possibly can. Locally, should bathe sores with 'Dakins' solution.

ASTHMA.—My sixteen-months-old baby weighs 21 pounds and was very well until a few months ago when she took cold and has had a wheezing ever since, and if she takes a little cold it is almost impossible for her to breathe. Her cough is loose and she does not seem to suffer, only short breath.

MRS. J. L. M., St. Louis, Mo.

A.—Without much doubt your baby has asthma, and a change of climate would be advisable. A few drops of Adrenalin Chloride, given hypodermically, will relieve spasms, and baby should be taking small doses of Syrup of Hydriodic acid, in water, three times a day. A high, dry climate is most important and your physician can help you decide on location.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

(CONTINTED FROM PAGE 14.)

But if I agree with Mrs. Mason I can't say the same for Texas Blue Bonnet. Of course circumstances alter cases but I think if there wasn't so much sympathy extended to the "poor unfortunates" there probably wouldn't be quite so many to need the sympathy. If a girl thinks she'll have the whole world at her back no matter what she does, she's not apt to care so much what happens to her. If every girl that has a child without a name to give it, was made to serve a sentence in the "Pen." there wouldn't be quite so many illegitimate waifs. They are the ones that need the pity if there's any such to spare. The girl has the law on her side, so there's no excuse for her not making the man come to time and then we will know what man to blame if we do feel like blaming him.

Sincerely, MRS. A. M. URNESS.

CLARKSBURG, R. R. 1, Box 26½, W. VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for several years and think it a splendid magazine.

I am sending a picture of my little girl, taken when she was one year old. She is nearly four now. Her name is Edna Mary. She has a little sister, and she says she loves her better than anything else in the world. Both have blue eyes and Mary has curly hair.

EDNA MARY FLOYD.

How many of the sisters disapprove of girls marrying young? I do not. I was married when I was fifteen years old and I don't think I could have done better if I had waited until I was thirty. I shall not try to capture Bachelor Bill for I captured my Bachelor Bill over five years ago and I would not trade him for all the bachelors I ever saw.

I am five feet, eight inches tall, have dark hair and brown eyes and weigh one hundred and ten pounds. We have always lived on a farm and I like farm life.

Sincerely, MRS. W. B. FLOYD.

Mrs. Floyd.—Not all early marriages turn out as happily as yours has—with a good husband and a darling baby to call you up. For all she looks so sweet tempered, she can't fool us. We know that one day she got cross and bit a piece out of the transmitter. Maybe Central gave her the wrong number.—Ed.

CAPRON, VIRGINIA.

DEAR LETTER FRIENDS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for about fifteen years and enjoy the Sisters' Corner. The letters are interesting as well as instructive.

I have been married nine years to one of the best of men. We have two little boys. Our six months old baby died a year ago. It was so hard to give her up but I am trying to be resigned to God's will. We are trying to train our boys to love the right. They almost worship 'Daddy" and try to imitate him in many ways. Mothers, do you ever stop to think how important it is to have our children retain their confidence in us? As a rule they shape their lives by our example.

I wonder how many COMFORT families have family prayer services? No poem has more of moral beauty in it than Burns' "Cotter's Saturday Night." The scattered family is reunited, there is the converse and the household joy about the fireplace, the common meal.

"The cherfu' supper done, wi' serious face
They, round the ingle, form a circle wide;
The sire turns o'er, wi' patriarchal grace,
The big ha-Bible, once his father's pride.
He reads a portion with judicious care,
And 'Let us worship God,' he says with solemn air."

A scene like this will sweeten the family life, will create an atmosphere of piety, will bring God as a reality into the family life. Modern business life and modern enjoyments have so crowded into the oldtime family prayers that comparatively little is left. The home ought to be the center for creating moral and spiritual power. One ounce of home is worth a pound of school. Sometimes an heroic minded mother when the father is absent has carried on prayer services. Mothers of this kind cannot but leave an impress on the household life.

There, I didn't mean to preach a sermon. I would like to correspond with some of the sisters, especially those of California. MRS. W. A. RICKS.

ELLISVILLE, MISS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I saw a picture once entitled, "He who hesitates is lost," so if I keep this I'll never be numbered among the sisters and I so much wish to be one of you.

I live between two towns that are seven miles apart. One has a population of about thirteen thousand, the other three thousand. There are two car lines near us, one in front and the other in the back of the house.

Some of the sisters tell how they make pin money. I will tell you how I have made some. I have beautiful early spring bulbs and flowers and the town people come out and buy them from me. I try to sell flowers at a reasonable price. Last year I put out fifty pear limb cuttings and got sixteen of them to live. I was offered one dollar apiece for them but I could not take it as I am anxious to get an orchard started. One year we sold over forty dollars' worth of pears from two trees besides canning a great many quarts of them.

I have been married twelve years and have a dear, good husband and a boy ten years old and two girls, seven and two years of age.

I am a well wisher of COMFORT and its many readers. Sometimes my husband calls me KATRINKA.

WEST VIRGINIA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS AND READERS:

I've just read in COMFORT the letter from "An Old Maid Sister" and she expressed my idea of doing good to all people. She, many others and I have found that happiness and joy come to those who help others. If you want to feel blue, just sit down and think of yourself but if you want to be glad and of good spirit, get up and do something for someone. If you don't believe this, just try and see if I'm not telling you the the truth.

I would like to see the old familiar question of raising children discussed more fully. Not the little children but the big ones, in the 'teens. I am afraid that parents do not keep control over their children as long as they should. How many of you are true, good pals with your children? Most parents think when their children reach the 'teens they are old enough to take care of themselves but that is the time they are in need of the most care and protection. Sometimes you ask a father or mother where John or Betty is and what they are doing. "Oh, I don't know," is usually the answer. This does not come from all parents but from many. "Know where your children are and what they are doing" is a good slogan for parents to adopt. The parents are indirectly to blame for the wrong doing of the children of today, although many of them do not see it that way. Many times parents do something that is wrong but say, "Don't you do that, Johnnie." Parents should be a living example for their children. Children follow someone. How many fathers and mothers go to church and Sunday School with their children instead of sending them by themselves? Our community is about like the average I suppose. I am secretary of our Sunday School records and know whereof I speak, for the young people hold the "Banner of Attendance" most of the time.

I was twenty-one years old last December, and am the oldest of nine children, six of whom are living, ranging from four years up. We are all at home with Father and Mother on a farm of 56 acres. We have a nice six-room house and a good Christian home. There are many unfortunates in this world but we can do a world of good to them by kind words and good deeds given in time of need.

Wishing you one and all much happiness and joy,
BLUE BELL.

Blue Bell.—The letter from Texas Girl, elsewhere in this department, may explain why so many parents lose the confidence of their children. Think it over, mothers. Are you guilty? —Ed.

HUNTINGTON, ST. LOUIS AVE. AND DAVIS ST., W. VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Where are all the West Virginia Sisters? I seldom see a letter from our state. Let me tell you a little about our city. It is one of the most beautiful cities in the state with the best equipped schools, both graded and high. There is also Marshall College with acres and acres of beautiful shaded lawns. It is also one of the most prosperous cities, with large manufacturing industries, theaters, library, parks, playgrounds, bathing beaches and one of the finest country clubs in this part of the country.

I am twenty-nine years old, five feet, five inches tall, brown hair, blue eyes and a fair skin. Am not going to tell my weight. Fatty, someone says. I can't help it. Have been married fourteen years and have three of the most beautiful children in the world, or, at least, I think so. Eva Vivian, thirteen; Ruth, eleven and Otis, five.

In cases of typhoid fever bathe the patient in cool water instead of warm, every two hours when fever is on, keep ice bag on head and keep feet warm. Feed nothing but liquids, such as rice water, orange juice. Beef tea made as follows is good: Take a piece of steak, place in self-sealed jar, without water and screw lid on tightly. Place in water over top of jar and boil four hours. It is very nourishing. Never take patient out of bed. In each stool place half of an antiseptic tablet and let set half an hour before emptying. This will kill all germs and prevent a spread of the disease. I helped care for two cases last summer. Consult a doctor about everything and follow his directions.

Sisters, I will tell you what to do when you think you must have some new furniture. Get paper and pencil and write down the number of pieces you must have. Then go over your old furniture and pick out the pieces you were going to give or throw away and, piece by piece, paint, varnish, cover or tear up and build over again. It will surprise you what it will save you. I will tell you what I did a few months ago. I thought I would just have to have some new furniture. I had an old cupboard with glass doors, that wasn't in use. My husband cut it down and made it over into a china closet and it looks fine. We also had six or eight dining-room chairs; we got new bottoms for them, burned the old varnish off, put on new and now we have practically new chairs. I had an old center table that I thought was impossible to do anything with. We cleaned off the old paint and put on a fresh coat and now it makes a most attractive table. An old dining-room table was cut down to a kitchen table, given several coats of paint, the top covered with oilcloth and now it looks fine. It is wonderful what you can do with a little ingenuity and varnish and some work.

I'd like to hear from the sisters.

MRS. RUBY ARTHUR.

WISHART, MO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have read COMFORT ever since I was a small child and have received much benefit from it.

I am eighteen years old and have been married three and one-half years. Am five feet, two inches tall and have grey eyes, brown hair and a fair complexion.

What do the sisters do to entertain children on rainy days? I borrow children from my neighbors as I have none of my own and I make pictures for them, coloring them with crayons. We cut these up and make puzzles for them to put together. At home my sisters and I had a bead box and we amused ourselves stringing beads.

I believe in being a companion to your husband. I help mine in the fields and in return he helps me in the house. I often let my dishes go unwashed so as to be with him, as I get very lonely by myself. I am a stranger here.

With love to all of you, MRS. ERNEST REEVES.

BELLEVILLE, R. R. 4, ILL.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for five years. I am twenty-seven years old, and have been married twelve years. Weigh 275 pounds. I have one of the best of Johns, only that isn't his name.

HELEN K. NOVOSELEC.

I am sending you a picture of my baby, Helen K. Novoselec, now two years and a half old, but only eight months when this was taken. I would like to see her picture in COMFORT. We have lost two children. MRS. F. NOVOSELEC.

Mrs. Novoselec.—Baby Helen may be like the little girl of nursery rhyme fame in that she has a little curl right down the middle of her forehead, but I'm sure she could never be "horrid" no matter how she tried. She's too dear for that. —Ed.

YOUNGSTOWN, N. Y.

I live near the Niagara River about one mile from historic Fort Niagara, and about twelve miles from Niagara Falls.

Famous Strong Men of the Past and Present

By John R. Blake

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

HUMAN beings have always been greatly interested in marvelous feats of strength and physical endurance. Any man who could lift great weights, box or wrestle skillfully, run extraordinary distances, or short distances very swiftly, or who could strike a blow of phenomenal power with his fist, has always been sure of celebrity. The popular interest which is invariably displayed in boxing contests, wrestling matches, athletics and gymnastic feats of every sort, is the best illustration of the fact that in all ages and countries, and among all races of human kind, men who were able to do remarkable things in the way of physical strength and agility, have never lacked for admirers.

It has been claimed, and with some show of reason, that many of the records of our modern athletes would have astonished the heroes of old Olympia and the entire ancient athletic world; yet it is very much open to doubt whether the strongest of our strong men have equalled those of past times in demonstrations of sheer muscular strength.

The Bible story of Samson wrestling with a young lion and killing him instantly with his hands, and afterward tearing down the immense pillars of the Philistine temple of Dagon, comes first to mind. Then there was Milo, of Crotona, who, it is recorded, once ran a mile with a fully grown ox on his shoulders, and then killed the animal with a single blow of his mighty fist. He could break, by contracting the muscles of his forehead, a cord tied tightly around his head. According to writers of that period he lost his life while trying to tear asunder the trunk of a large tree; his hands being pinched in the wood, he was unable to withdraw them, and was devoured by wild animals of the forest.

Polydamas, of Thessalia, repeated Samson's feat and killed an enormous lion that had ravaged the valleys near Mount Olympus, using in performing the feat only his bare hands. King Darius the First, of Persia, called him to his court and opposed to him three of the strongest men of his army. Polydamas killed all three, one after another, with a single blow of his fist upon the jaw of each.

Ancient Rome had many strong men. The Emperor Caius Julius Verus Maximus was able to squeeze the hardest stone to pieces with his fingers. He was seven feet tall and the bracelet of one of the women of his court could almost be worn as a ring by him on one of his huge fingers. She, however, was an unusually small woman with a very tiny wrist.

Salvius, of Rome, could walk up a ladder carrying two hundred pounds fastened to his feet—one hundred to each foot. Athanatus, another Roman, could run around the arena carrying five hundred pounds fastened to his feet—two hundred and fifty pounds to each foot. Iccus could hold the most furious bull and tear out its horns almost as easily as the average person would pull up radishes.

Scanderberg, King of Albania, who lived in the Fifteenth Century, was a man of great stature, and the power of his arm was such that, during war times, he thought nothing of cutting two men in half with one mighty swing of his huge broad-sword. Francis, of Vivonne, Lord of Chasteigneraye, who lived at the court of Francis the First of France, could stop a bull, running at full speed, by seizing it by the horns. The Emperor Charlemagne, who stood nearly eight feet high, could hold at arm's length a knight in full armor.

Louis de Boufflers, who lived in the Sixteenth Century, could break a bar of iron with his hands. While standing upright, with no support whatever, four strong soldiers could not move him; he remained as firm as a rock. Sometimes he amused himself by taking on his shoulder his own horse fully harnessed, and with that heavy load he promenaded the public square, to the great delight of the inhabitants. At about the same period there lived a Spaniard named Piedro who could break the strongest handcuffs that could be put around his wrists. He folded his arms on his chest and ten men, pulling in different directions with ropes, could not unfold them.

The chronicles of the Sixteenth Century also tell of another remarkably strong man named Major Barsabas. One day he took up an anvil weighing 500 pounds and hid it under his capacious cloak. Often, to amuse his comrades, he went through the rifle drill with a cannon. One day, seeing a crowd looking at an enormous dancing bear, he offered to wrestle with the animal. The Major threw the bear down several times, and judging it unworthy of further struggle, slew the beast with his fist and then carried it away on his shoulders, amidst the cheers of the crowd. On another day, seeing several officers of his regiment surrounded by an angry crowd, he ran to them, knocking people down right and left as a child does a pack of cards. The crowd became angry and turned on him, whereupon he seized one of his assailants and used him vigorously as a club on the rest, who, greatly astonished at his display of strength, quickly withdrew.

Augustus the Second, Elector of Saxony, was a man of great strength. He could carry a man in his open hand. One night he quietly threw out of a window a person who paraded his palace wrapped in a white sheet and pretending to be a ghost. Augustus' son, the famous Maurice, Marechal de Saxe, who commanded the French at Fontenay, was also a marvel of physical strength. He could break with his hands the strongest horseshoe. One day while in London he had a quarrel with a dustman whom he seized by the head, and throwing him up into the air, let him drop right into the middle of his own dust-cart. The only opponent who ever succeeded in resisting him was M. Gauthier, an actor. Maurice tried with him to see who could turn down the other's wrist, and after a long struggle he won, but with great difficulty. The power of M. Gauthier's arm was far beyond the average, and with his fingers he could roll up silver plate almost as easily as anyone else would roll up paper.

Thomas Topham, born in London in 1710, occupies a large niche in the gallery of famous strong men. His feats of strength are as well verified and authenticated as those of Sandow, Rolandow and St. Cyr. He once lifted three casks filled with water and weighing a total of 1,836 pounds. He could bend a stout bar of iron by holding the two ends with his hands, placing the middle of the bar behind his neck, and bringing the two ends forward. He could also straighten the bar again, which is a much more difficult feat. He could easily lift two hogsheads of water; raise his horse over a turnpike gate; carry the heavy beam of a large house as a soldier would carry a rifle on his shoulder, and raise two hundred weights with his little fingers over his head. He broke a rope fastened to the ground that would sustain twenty hundred weight, and lifted an oak table six feet long with his teeth, with half a hundred weight hung at the extremity thereof. With one hand he raised a man who weighed twenty-seven stone off the ground and held him at arm's length. It is related of him that having been placed on special police duty at the entrance gate of a race course, he refused to allow a four-horse coach to go through, and when the driver whipped up his horses and attempted to pass, Topham took hold of the hind wheels of the coach and upset it and its occupants into the roadway.

At about the same time that Topham existed there lived another celebrated strong man by the name of Richard Joy. He was commonly known as "the Kentish Samson" and "the strong man of Kent," and, among other things, he could cope successfully with any large and powerful horse, lift a ton weight, and snap a rope that had borne thirty-five hundred weight without breaking, the last mentioned being far more extraordinary than Topham's similar feat. Joy was taken to court in the reign of William and Mary to exhibit his strength before the nobility and royalty.

Tom Johnson, who was the champion boxer of England in 1785, could lift a sack full of wheat with one hand and swing it around his head. The sailors of Constantinople have record of a Greek sailor who could bend an anchor with his hands only. The brothers Rousselle, nicknamed "Hercules du Nord," exhibited wonderful muscular power. The eldest could jump a considerable height with a weight of twenty-five pounds fastened to each foot, and a similar weight in each hand. Standing on a chair and bending himself backward he could lift from the ground with his teeth a weight of five hundred pounds. He could also lift on his shoulders a table with 1,800 pounds on it.

A Scotchman, said to be the last of the Stuarts, was possessed of such extraordinary strength that he was given the nickname of "Jemmy Strength," and his real name has been forgotten. Among other feats he could carry a cannon with its carriage, and had been known to lift a cartload of hay, weighing a ton and a half, upon his back. Many a time he picked up a donkey and, carrying it on his shoulders, walked through a toll-gate without paying toll. There was once a Scotchman named Gill on board the celebrated cruiser Alabama, who could lift a man at arm's length with one hand.

The strong men of comparatively recent times and of today have done, and are doing, some wonderful things, the lifting feats of Eugene Sandow and the modern "Hercules" being especially remarkable. Sandow began his career by going around Amsterdam wrecking weight-lifting machines by a strong pull at the handle. Afterward he made a lengthened tour with a theatrical show, exhibiting his powers as a wrestler and lifter of heavy weights. In his work on the stage he was accustomed to raise a dumb-bell of 150 pounds in his right hand and a hundred weight in his left; these were raised and lowered seven times. He then turned somersaults while holding a dumb-bell weighing 150 pounds. This was followed by raising a weight of ten stone above his head with one arm.

A "Roman Column" is a pole of burnished steel twelve feet in height, which was made fast to the stage by cords and guys. Halfway up are two stout cross-bars, six inches in length, and from the summit hang two steel chains ending in steel hooks. These fit into rings, which were affixed by straps to Sandow's legs, a little below the knees. With his feet upon the cross-bars and unsupported, except by the chains, he would bend the upper part of his body backward until his hands touched the stage. In this position he would raise a large iron dumb-bell weighing 150 pounds at arm's length above his head. Next he would lie upon the stage and lift a dumb-bell weighing 312 pounds, with two men seated upon it, making a total weight of 612 pounds.

Dr. Winship, of Boston, once lifted 2,500 pounds while in harness; and another American strong man, William B. Curtis, beat that record by a harness lift of 1 ton, 8 cwt., 3 quarters, 19 pounds.

Rolandow and Louis St. Cyr, the French-Canadian, made some astonishing records in weight-lifting and strength contests of every kind, but their records are not just now available to the writer.

About two decades ago, Harvard University had a student and athlete of whose wonderful performances many astonishing stories went the rounds. It was claimed that he was the strongest college or university student in the United States at that time, as tested by Dr. D. A. Sargent's famous methods.

His name was Arthur Lovering, and those who understand what the Sargent tests are, will readily appreciate Lovering's merits as a strong man. The following is the record of his performances on the strength-testing machine at Harvard: Strength of lungs, 37; push up, 40; strength of back, 410; pull up, 17; strength of legs, 665; strength of right forearm, 85; strength left forearm, 80; chest and upper arm, 383; total strength, 1,660.

The University of Virginia also had a powerful student, named "Sandow" Moore, at about the same time Lovering was at Harvard; and there are many other contemporary strong men who might be mentioned if space would permit. But, on the whole, it is a reasonable conjecture that, while the general average of physical strength among men may have advanced somewhat, as some statisticians claim, with the improved conditions of modern life, yet the individual performances of strong men of bygone ages have never been surpassed, and it is extremely doubtful if many of them, assuming that history reports them correctly, could be equaled by the very best of our living muscular men.

Many sightseers visit Niagara Falls every year to see the great cataract, with its immense volume of water falling 160 feet over the straight and horseshoe shaped brinks and splashing on the rocks below forming myriads of rainbows of varied hues and colors sparkling in the spray, and then swiftly traveling and forming part of the great Whirlpool Rapids with its treacherous undercurrents sucking down most everything that touches its angry surface; then making its way more leisurely down past the village of Lewiston and still further winding and twisting its course, passing my home about six miles from Lewiston and emptying into Lake Ontario just a little way from my home. We can look from our windows and back porch and see where the river ends and the lake begins.

We have a lovely bungalow with a charming situation, especially in summer. It has seven rooms with pantry, bath and four roomy clothes-presses. It is finished in yellow pine upstairs (the bedrooms) and in oak downstairs. It has highly polished oak floors. Could any of the sisters tell me what is best to use on floors? Whether oil mop or dustless mop? Some say that oil is injurious to the high polish.

There are many helpful things in the Sisters' Corner, and Mrs. Wilkinson, I know must be a dear and lovely woman. I would very much like to know her.

I may call again to tell you about "Old Fort Niagara" and Lake Ontario with its numerous summer homes, amusement parks and delightful sunsets.

Will some of the Sisters' Corner readers please write to me? I haven't many correspondents and I would love to hear, especially from sisters living in California and the western states. I will endeavor to answer any who care to write to me.

Sincerest regards, dear people, from

MRS. LESLIE RIPSON.

CHALLIS, IDAHO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

For several months I have been a reader of COMFORT. My good neighbor takes the paper and we exchanged, but I find so much I'd like to cut out and file that I am sending you my own subscription for two years.

I have never noticed any letters from Idaho and she surely is a wonderful state and ought to have something to say so though writing is not my shining art, I'll express my opinion anyway.

I also read that article scoring Modern Dress and Modern Girls and I wish to say that it is the same everywhere. The girl of daring clothes and manners is the popular one and I have further noticed that they choose their husbands from all the men while the quiet girl takes what she can get or remains single. Daring clothes, paint, etc., surely win a good home and husband for a girl and further insures her a second husband whenever she desires one. There are exceptions of course.

In reply to Contented Wife, I have found home teaching is better than sending a child to school when they are too young. Teach sounds of letters first to insure good pronunciation. The long hours of school are too confining for a child, yet to be behind others of their age is not right either. I recommend home teaching from my own experience, being home taught to the third grade and am teaching my own little girl to third grade and at seven years of age she seems as far ahead as children taught in school.

Perhaps you might like to know a little of me personally. I am a blonde, five feet, six inches tall and weigh 178 pounds. We live on a cattle ranch, two miles from town, and have a lovely home. I have been a Mrs. nine years and am the happy mother of two little girls, seven and two and one-half years of age. I am interested in flowers, books and outdoor life as well as home and babies.

I should like to hear from the sisters.

MRS. ALEX KLUG.

TEXAS.

HELLO EVERYBODY:

May I come in for a chat? This is the third time I have tried.

I have come to give you mothers some advice. I am eighteen years young and will be a mother in a few months. "A lot of advice she can give mothers," I hear someone say. Just you wait! I know I loved my mother as well as any girl could and yet there was something missing. I always told my mother things that I thought she ought to know until I found out that she was telling one of her sisters, who lived about one hundred yards from us, everything that I told her. So I quit telling her anything and when I had something to confide to someone, I told a girl chum. When I was about to be married I asked her many things and she told me to find out the way she did, to let my husband tell me. If only mothers, and I will add fathers, would do their duty by their sons and daughters there would be fewer ruined boys and girls in the world.

TEXAS GIRL.

OHIO.

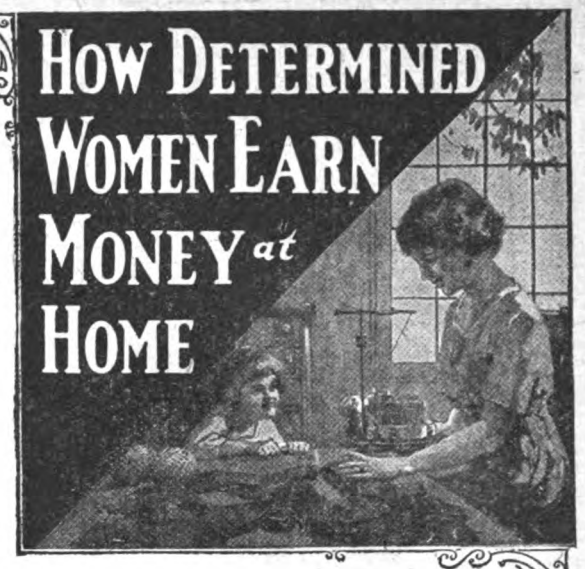
DEAR SISTERS:

I am coming to you for a bit of advice. I am about two thousand miles from my dear old mother, who lives in the sunny land of Texas, while I am up here in the cold northeast where we have winter six months of the year. Mother is nearly seventy years old and alone. She thinks it my place to go and live with her the remainder of her life. We have been apart off and on for the last twenty-five years, ever since my marriage. I cannot make my husband see it that way, although I took care of both his parents until they were laid to rest; still, he doesn't think I owe my mother that much.

Have any of you ever been placed in this position and how did you manage? I have many a sleepless night, thinking of mother alone. I want to do what is right by both husband and mother. Tell me, to whom do I owe the most? If the mothers read this, tell me what you would want your daughter to do in a like case. Husband won't hear to going down there. We have no family, just us two and both in good health. Mother has enough and more to live on. I am forty-five years old.

SISTER DAISY.

OSSINEKE, MICH.



DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am a newcomer and I hope to have a little place among the COMFORT sisters. I have been reading COMFORT for over a year and I think it a wonderful paper. The first thing I search for, when I get it, is the Sisters' Corner. And as I always found lots of friendship and help in it, I thought I would try to get in for a little chat, too.

I must tell you a few things about myself as they all do. I am a French bride. I married one of the best soldiers. I like America as my new country and am proud of it. We have been married over two years and we are a happy family for we have a dear baby boy, nine months old, named John Charles. If I see this letter printed in the dear old COMFORT, next time I write I'll send his picture. He is a dear, and we love him.

We live on a farm and have a home of our own. In France I was living in a big city, but I love the country life. Work in the garden is one thing I like,

By Eustine Erne

I think it would be a little difficult to explain exactly what first got me so interested in this matter of home occupation for men and women and led me to write this message.

Perhaps it was a deep-rooted recollection of childhood days when a crisis in the family fortunes made it desirable, yes, necessary, for Mother to earn some extra money. I never think of it without a feeling of regret that she could not have known about the Gearhart Knitter and Allwear Hosiery.

When I undertook to investigate and write about home knitting I did so with the understanding that I was to be allowed to present the facts as I found them, in my own way.

It makes me very happy to be able to say that in Gearhart Home Knitting there exists a pleasing, spare time, extra-money opportunity for most any woman who is determined to succeed.

I have seen with my own eyes letters from legions of women (men, too, for that matter) expressing thanks and gratification that they were able to earn money at home in the Gearhart way.

Some needed the extra money to pay pressing bills, to care for a sick husband, clothe the children or themselves, and others wanted a vacation, to refurnish the parlor, etc., almost as many reasons as there were women. But my point is that they got what they wanted, seeing in the opportunity Gearhart offers the solution of their difficulties or the fulfilment of their desires. The spare time which most women can profitably utilize in knitting Allwear Hosiery is the money-making formula which Gearhart will tell you about on request.

You simply make arrangements for one of the knitters, under an iron-clad, three-year contract which binds Gearhart to accept and pay for all the Standard Allwear Hosiery you can produce. After mastering the simple principles of operation you begin to knit in comfort and privacy. If you wish, no one need know how you are making your extra money. Then you make up a dozen or a hundred dozen pair of Standard Allwear Hosiery according to instructions (how much you do rests with yourself), you pack them up and send them to the Gearhart Company. Quickly comes a generous check for your work.

I earnestly believe that there is no home occupation for the average woman who wants additional practical income at once so profitable and fascinating as Gearhart Home Knitting, and so I say, "If you are a determined woman, really serious in your desire to devote your spare time to earning money, write the Gearhart Knitting Machine Co., for their Profit Guide Book, which explains everything, and free samples of knitting, Box W. H. O., Clearfield, Pa., today."

When we asked Miss Erne to write the above request for home workers we told her that we wanted to reflect the reputation of an old established house which for 36 years has manufactured what we know to be a truly wonderful machine, highly perfected, simple, and of absolutely guaranteed quality. In the simplicity of the above and absence of exaggeration Miss Erne has succeeded admirably.

Grandfather's Ghost

by Mrs. S. Merwin

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

MRS. Crawford sat before the open fireplace in her living-room, knitting. Her knitting needles gleamed and flashed in the firelight, and clicked an accompaniment to the winter sleet outside that snapped against the window panes.

Her low, wide old-fashioned house stood a little way outside of the town—trees around it, and a woodlot behind it. The town site and the country that stretched away on all sides had, in times gone by, belonged to her husband. Many times she had been offered large sums of money for the woodlot.

"Never while I live shall that lot be sold," was always the old lady's answer. "I need the wood for my fireplace."

For she belonged to that past where glow the firelight and the candlelight, and where live the fancies and superstitions that go with them.

Straight and tall she sat, and very sweet and romantic she looked in her black silk and white lace, with the firelight playing fantastically all over her. On a low stool beside her, with hands idly clasped and hanging listlessly before her, sat Lois, her granddaughter, looking pensively into the fire. Now and again a flame leaped up and brought out of the darkness that veiled her small figure a sweet, demure face, framed in soft brown hair. Presently Mrs. Crawford spoke, evidently continuing a conversation that had gone on before.

"If you marry Philip Gordon," she said firmly and with much determination, "it will be without my consent, and I shall have to disinherit you—and spend my last days in loneliness."

Lois made no answer, but continued to gaze into the fire. The big log burning there, the flames leaping out suddenly and then subsiding, racing back and forth, were telling her sweet things of the future if only Granny could be brought to revoke her stern ultimatum. For Lois and Philip had been quietly engaged for some time; and shrewd Granny had been excitedly suspecting it. Now she forbade it; and Granny's word had always been law to Lois.

"I've never told you before how your grandfather and Philip's quarreled over a piece of property. Both claimed it and Jacob Gordon got it. They never spoke to each other again, and your grandfather would never rest easy in his grave if I were to allow the money he left behind to go to any of that family."

"You ought not to be superstitious, Granny," Lois said gently.

"Superstitious or not," Granny retorted sharply, "I never dared to cross his wishes while he lived, and I would no more dare to do it now he is in his grave. His ghost would haunt me if I did—say what you will."

"But, Granny, it's foolish to attach any importance to an old, worn-out quarrel like that one. Philip wasn't to blame for it. And he hasn't the property now—nor the money it brought. He has to work for his living, the same as if his grandfather had never had any property."

"I won't risk your grandfather's vindication, all the same."

"You haven't any objection to Philip personally, have you, Granny?"

"No, but I've said all I have to say on the subject."

Then Philip came in. And the room seemed filled with the cold freshness that filled the outside world.

"Come out for a walk, Lois," he was saying, "the weather's cleared, and the footing isn't bad."

Lois, from her low stool by the fire, looked at him standing there in the middle of the large room, where he had just turned on a light. She was realizing what a fine, big fellow he was, and though not so very handsome in features, yet kindness and good will and joy of living shone from his face. Tears filled her eyes and a sob her throat because she must deny herself to him no less than because she must give him up. She rose and went up the broad stairs without saying a word. Philip, with puzzled, smiling eyes watched her as long as she was to be seen. Then he began talking to Mrs. Crawford. But Granny had fortified herself with coldness, and deigned not to look his way. So he was obliged to play jingling tunes on the old piano and whistle accompaniments to save himself from embarrassment.

When he and Lois were outside, he took her by the arm and guided her carefully over the icy pavements. "There's a little house I want you to see," he said as he turned a corner. "It's only just begun, but it'll be a regular little dovecot for you and me. We've got to be married by the time it's finished so we'll be sure to get it."

"We can't be married," Lois said mournfully.

"Who says so?" Philip turned to her quickly.

"She did?"

"Then we'll have to elope."

"Oh, no." Lois was so startled at that thought that Philip laughed.

"I'm going to have a raise—so the chief says, especially if I get married—so there's another reason."

"I couldn't leave Granny," Lois said wearily, and rested her cheek softly against his sleeve. Philip looked down at her tenderly, and then—only the stars were there to see—he put his arm around her and held her close.

"Granny says your grandfather and mine quarreled and never made up, and she's afraid of Grandfather's ghost if she lets us get married," Lois volunteered explanation.

"Afraid of his ghost, is she? Well, a ghost must be a creepy, uncanny sort of individual." Then after walking a few paces he continued: "We'll have to try and lay this one," he laughed.

He went on talking gaily of things that happened at the office where he worked, and then of their future together. Lois had neither the heart nor the courage to contradict him, nor the hope to agree with him, so she let him talk and only said, when they had again arrived at her door, "Aren't you coming in?"

"No. Granny's too icy. But I'll be around Saturday evening to take you to Marian Eastman's Hallowe'en party."

"I'm going early, right after lunch, to help Marian get ready," Lois informed him.

"Oh, all right, I'll see you there then."

Saturday evening was soon on hand. Lois and Marian had worked so hard, bringing old furniture, braided mats, ancient hangings and what not from garret and cellar—for this was to be one of "Ye Old Tymes"—that by the time they were dressed in the old-fashioned clothes they had found in their respective garrets, Lois was a little tired.

When the guests began to arrive, each new one was cause for merriment, and the effect was sufficiently unique to gratify the young hostess. The room flooded with soft candlelight, the fresh young faces looking out of ugly bonnets over faded silk or sprigged muslin, large hoop-skirts and fashions in vogue fifty or one hundred years ago. For extra diversion, Marian had ushered all the young men into the dining-room, and when all had arrived marched them in procession through the room where the girls were assembled. They came—dressed in old uniforms, in dignified black broadcloth, in coarse working clothes and heavy shoes that their grandfathers had worn while plowing the soil, grave or gay as befitted the costumes worn—amid peals of laughter from the girls. But to Lois' surprise Philip was not one of the procession.

As the evening rollicked away and he did not come, she was first disappointed and finally angry. Perhaps, she thought, he had been thinking over Granny's ultimatum and thought it best. But he had promised to come. She had been unhappy enough since she had seen him last, but now she was deeply hurt. If he could abandon her thus easily, he must have been deceiving her when he made pretentions of love to her—only playing with her love. Humiliation deepened her hurt when their friends made inquiries concerning his absence, for to them it must seem as if he were jilting her. And everything was made harder because she must needs hide her wounded feelings. She was dancing with the grandson of a farmer who was making much of his assumed awkwardness. "I thought Phil was going to be here tonight," he said. "He told me this afternoon he was; what's become of him?"

"I don't know where he is. I came early, just after lunch, to help Marian," was all the answer she could make.

A group of clergymen stood at one side, loudly proclaiming displeasure, to each other, at the dancing in their presence—much to the merriment of the dancers. A Quaker who had refused to deliver up his hat, and wore it ostentatiously throughout the evening, detached himself from the group and coming to Lois asked her, with many thees and thous, if she would sup with him. He, too, had seen Phil during the day and expected to meet him here this evening.

Then, when the young men, clergymen included, were seeking partners for the final dance, he came.

"Oh, Phil!" everybody chorused.

"Give an account of yourself," called one.

"Had important work on hand this evening," he sang out.

"You'll have to pay a fine for wearing citizen's clothes here tonight," said another who was dressed in an old policeman's uniform. Philip was dressed in his office suit.

"Anything you say," he answered laughing. And while he was meeting sallies from right and left, he was making his way straight as a beeline to where Lois stood.

"Come dance this with me, Lois," and he hurried her off, leaving no time or opportunity for words.

Half an hour later they were nearing Mrs. Crawford's house. The air was clear and sharp and Lois was so well muffled up as to give her an excuse for not talking. She wished to know why Philip had done as he did, but she did not wish him to know of her angry and hurt feelings, so she waited for him to explain. To explain did not seem to occur to him, however, and he only talked of the cold. He helped her carefully over the muddy places and asked if she were comfortable. As they came within sight of the house, Lois exclaimed, "What can Granny be doing up this time of night? There's a light!"

She hurried in, Philip following close. The light she had seen came from the fireplace where a single log burned slowly. Philip lighted a lamp and the room quietly stepped out of its gloom. There sat Granny, upright and stiff, in her chair by the fireplace, a heavy shawl over her shoulders. She looked straight at them without seeming to see them. Lois, frightened, hurried toward her and almost gasped, "Why, Granny, what is the matter?"

At the sound of Lois' voice, Mrs. Crawford relaxed and drew a long breath. "Children," she said, "I've seen a ghost."

"A ghost!" Philip nearly shouted.

Lois laughed, softly and reassuringly. She dropped on her knees beside her grandmother.

"You've been dreaming, Granny," she said soothingly.

"Dreaming! No!" the old lady cried. "I was as wide awake as I am this minute. It was your grandfather's ghost. Sit down, both of you, I must tell you."

At nine o'clock that evening she, having been alone since noon, decided to go and see a neighbor who was not well. She returned nearly an hour later, and coming into the room a chill passed over her. She lighted a candle, and there, beside the fire, sat Grandfather Crawford. He was dressed in his best black suit, the one they had buried him in, and his sealskin cap which she had not seen for years. His head was sunk deep into his collar and he made no sound, but she knew him instantly. Her knees gave way and she sank into her chair. Then he spoke in a hollow, muffled tone. "Martha," he said, "I've been in torment ever since I departed this world. And you're to blame."

Mrs. Crawford was unable to speak and the hollow voice went on: "I died hating Jacob Gordon and you've been keeping that hatred alive. In every way you could contrive, you've been keeping it alive."

Still she could not speak, and again the voice went on: "What's money or property to me now? What was it ever to me? You were to blame—you. All I want is peace, peace, PEACE." And the voice rose in a mournful wail like that of a lost soul.

"You've been keeping it from me. And now again, when it's in your power to give it to me, You're keeping it from me. My last chance—my last chance."

The wail died away and the arms tossed as if in agony. Mrs. Crawford made a supreme effort and spoke in a weak voice:

"What can I do to give you peace, John?"

"Stop hindering those children from getting married. It's the last thing. Woe is me if they don't get married."

He rose to his feet and seemed to be moving toward Mrs. Crawford, making no sound. This was more than she could bear and she closed her eyes. When she opened them again, the candle was out and the ghost was gone.

"If I hadn't known who he was at first, I should have known him when he blamed me for everything. It was always his way," Granny said after she had finished her story.

For a few moments there was silence then Granny went on: "Goodness knows you were always welcome to be married with only my own desires to consult. The sooner now the better."

"We were waiting for some carpenters to get a house built," said Philip soberly.

"Don't wait for anything," Granny said. "I couldn't bear to have your grandfather come again as he came tonight."

In less than a week Lois and Philip were married. Granny never stopped urging them to haste until she gave them her blessing. But they did not take the dove-cot; Granny begged them not to leave her. Lois was willing and Philip made no objections.

One evening after Philip had moved his belongings to the house, Lois, with a happy sense of wifehood was taking things out of the trunk and distributing them in closet and drawers. While Philip, proud of his position as a family man, sat by watching her.

"What are these?" Lois asked, holding up and spreading out a queer looking suit of black clothes. And reaching down brought up a sealskin cap.

"Those?" said Philip. "Oh, those are my grandfather's clothes. I sent for them to wear to that party."

"Why didn't you wear them?" Lois asked, looking at him wonderingly.

"I didn't want to appear before Granny in them."

Then a light broke on Lois' understanding.

"Oh, Philip," she cried, coming to him, "how could you frighten Granny so?"

"Well, you see, sweetheart, it was an extreme case, and I had to use extreme measures."

As for Granny, the appearance of her husband's ghost was a matter of triumph. She had always believed in ghosts, the young people's skepticism notwithstanding, and now she had positive proof of her belief.

The Gods Arrive

She wanted Jim to see her like that. She wanted to see the fire of desire leap into his eyes at beholding her.

"Wait!" she half-sobbed as Harkness rattled the door-knob.

She was thinking very fast. Anita had warned her not to buy her husband back, but was that not precisely what she was doing, using her body instead of her money as the price? Suddenly her brave plan dissolved before her eyes. It was cheap. It was pandering to the half gods when all her life she had kept fast hold of the gods.

"Wait, Jim!" she repeated.

She pulled frantically at the few hooks which held her gown, stepped out of it and flung it aside. From the closet she dragged sober stockings and slippers and the little mail-order taffeta of two seasons before. In an incredible short time she opened the door to admit her husband.

"You dear!" She was in his arms and he was straining her to his breast. "Don't talk to me of heaven; heaven is where you are, Marcia."

She was confused and strangely shy. "You'll have to hurry, Jim," she panted. "Guests are coming."

"Damn guests!"

"Jim! Jim, am I smart enough for your new friends?"

He looked her over, satisfaction in his eyes. "You suit me, sweet, down to the ground, and if it's anyone's else business, just let him speak to me about it. I'm not going to dress, though that lovely niece of ours will probably eat me alive. There's a motor in the drive now. They've come and I supose we'll have to go down, but let's not be too cordial and perhaps they will leave early."

They went smiling down the broad staircase, he enquiring for the first time about the splendor.

"It was Anita's idea; nothing else would satisfy her and I indulged her," explained Marcia.

Anita, impatient for the climax, was waiting for them at the foot of the stairs. She looked up and saw the two soberly-clad figures descending hand in hand and her eyes grew wild as she raised a despairing hand to her head.

"My word!" she moaned to an unheeding world. "Can you beat it?"

There was a sound at the door and she turned and walked toward an approaching guest.

"How do you do, Mrs. Archer?" she said, extending a penitent hand.

How much extra money do you want to earn in your spare time?

Would you like to have a pleasant home occupation which would enable you to earn money in your spare time? An occupation that has proven successful for women and men, too, all over the country. An occupation at which others have earned all the way from $1.00 a week to $25.00 or even more a week, depending upon the time devoted to the work and the individual ability of the worker.

THE wife and mother of today carries a tremendous burden in trying to make both ends meet—to stretch out her husband's salary so as to pay the rent, the butcher, baker, insurance, heating and lighting bills, keep the children and herself looking respectable, and to enjoy an occasional little outing.

It is a very trying problem—and the wonder is where a woman ever gains the experience and patience to handle the finances of the home as efficiently and economically as she does.

Many women are searching for something to do at home through which they can earn money during spare minutes or a few idle hours. Something that they can pick up and lay down at will, yet be sure of getting a money return for the time they devote to the work. Such work must not be unduly laborious, or of a mental type, but must be work that can be easily handled and in line with her training and natural aptitude for making things to wear.

A great number of women have found this type of home work in knitting socks on the Auto Knitter. In fact, this year the Auto Knitter Company will pay for over a million pairs of socks made in American homes during spare time by women who own Auto Knitter Machines. And they will pay to these knitters in wages a total of more than $100,000 in payment for their work.

These socks, made by Auto Knitter home workers, are known and sold under the name of Old Tyme Wool Socks. They are retailed in the stores of over 9,000 dealers in the United States. They are advertised in national magazines and newspapers, and so popular have these socks become that the sales are increasing rapidly as well as the number of dealers handling them. The earnings of these home workers vary with the amount of time devoted to the work and the speed of the individual operator, but whether the amount earned be large or small, it is most welcome and helps to make the lives of these workers easier and happier.

Mrs. Ralph Curtis, Connecticut, recently wrote to us, saying:

"I really had no thought just then of selling to private customers, but my father travels on the trains a great deal so he asked me for a sample pair. In that first week he sold 22 pairs at $1.00 a pair, which made a nice little profit. I sent in my first 12 pairs to the A. K. Co. and all were accepted. But after the 22 pairs that my father sold the people around here and the railroad men kept me so busy that I didn't get time to send any more to the A. K. Co. for three months. In November, 1921, orders started coming in for ladies', men's and children's socks and stockings, and by January 31, 1922, we had made $130.00, besides making socks for the family. I also made my baby his woolen shirts for winter, a sweater and a cap; also such sweet little stockings. I made a lovely slip-on sweater for a railroad man and got well paid for it."

Auto Knitter spare time home workers are always sure of selling every pair of standard socks, because we give a five year contract to every owner of an Auto Knitter which definitely binds us to receive hosiery and pay a stated price for every dozen pairs made to our standard on the Auto Knitter and sent to us. As a matter of fact, out of the thousands of pairs of socks that are sent to us, less than 5% of the number received are rejected. Beside the price paid for the work, we also replace pound for pound the yarn used in the standard socks which you send to us under our work contract. This contract which we give, is absolutely binding on this company to receive for acceptance either large or small lots of standard socks from our workers, and to pay a fixed wage, which you know in advance, for them. Yet the workers themselves are not bound by this contract to us in any way whatsoever.

$536.56 Profit in 4½ Months

C. G. Begalke, Wisconsin, recently wrote us;

"Both I and my wife are happy to say that during the four and one-half months that we used the knitting machine, we did make 1080 pairs of men's socks, 250 pairs we sold to the company and 830 we sold to private customers at $1.00 to $1.50 a pair; my wife just went from house to house a couple of times and displayed some sample socks and after that people began to come to our house and order socks and sometimes we had to hustle and fill orders.

"And up to now the knitter is paid for and wool also and still have a net balance of $536.56 clear profit."

You will notice that while Mr. and Mrs. Begalke sent a small amount of their work to the company, they disposed of by far the larger amount to private trade and in this way their profits were exceptionally large.

All of the Amazing Truth Cannot Be Told

It is a fact that the amount of earnings reported to us by some of our workers with the Auto Knitters are surprisingly large. If we were to show you many of the letters written to us by Auto Knitter workers, you would hardly believe what you read with your own eyes. Large amounts are earned by many knitters, whom we prefer to class as exceptional, but a much larger number of workers earn more modest sums which they find worth while and helpful.

But, back of these gratifying spare-time earnings lies the simple fact that the people worked. If you want to keep your house in order you must work. If you want to make your own clothes you must work. If you want to earn money at anything you must work. Nothing ever does work of itself. And the Auto Knitter is no exception. The more time that you work at it, the more adept you become and naturally, the more socks you will produce. You could have an Auto Knitter in your home for a year, but if you didn't operate it, you wouldn't make one cent out of it. That's common sense, isn't it? The Auto Knitter is for workers and in the hands of such, it will answer every demand made upon it for reliability, speed and earning capacity.

And whether such people can turn out a dozen standard pairs of socks a week or ten or more dozen, we will gladly pay for every pair of standard socks that they send us.

How You Can Make Money at Home

Clearly and briefly, here is our proposition: The Auto Knitter Hosiery Company enters into a five year agreement to buy all of the standard socks you knit on the Auto Knitter and send in to them, paying a fixed, guaranteed price. Checks will be sent promptly for each lot, large or small. Replacement yarn is also sent you pound for pound for that used in the socks you send to us. Previous experience in hand-knitting is not necessary, as full directions for operating the machine are contained in the instruction book sent with every Auto Knitter. The Auto Knitter comes with a sock already started in it and its operation is not difficult, but, like your sewing machine, there is a right way and a wrong way to operate it, and your first sock may not be a perfect one, just as the first work you did on your sewing machine was not perfect. The fact that there are women and men all over the country who are making money at Auto Knitting, and who learned to use their machines without any assistance other than their instruction book, shows that the operation of the Auto Knitter can be accomplished by average women and men.

Stella Rosevelt

ing in upon her mind, "it was something connected with this lovely stranger which had caused his own sadness during the last year."

A gentleman approached her just then, and, turning to Star, she said, with a smile:

"I must ask to be excused, as I have an engagement to dance now. I am sorry to leave you in the midst of our pleasant chat, but I will see you again before the evening is out."

Star, with an answering smile, said she "hoped they would meet again;" but, oh! how she longed to inquire about her brother. If she had but spoken just one word to tell her that he was well and happy.

Happy! The thought nearly made her cry out with pain.

He must be changed, indeed, if he could be that with Josephine Richards; and, loving him as she did, it was agony to contemplate it.

What if he himself were there among the gay throng, with the bride he had so lately wedded?

What if she were to meet them together?

For a moment, as this contingency presented itself to her, her brain reeled, and she felt as if her senses were forsaking her again; the next, she called all her pride to her aid.

She felt as if she could not bear to remain there—she longed to go away by herself until she could get a little more calm; and, seeing that Mr. Rosevelt and Ralph were deeply engaged in conversation, she slipped away unobserved to a small anteroom, which connected the drawing-room with the conservatory, and which she saw was at that moment empty.

Here she sat down in a chair near a large urn filled with flowers, which stood on one side of the door leading into the conservatory, and fell to musing sadly upon her broken hopes.

She had not been there long when she was aroused by hearing a gay laugh ring out close at hand. She started as if some viper had stung her.

She knew that sound but too well, and, looking up, she saw Josephine Richards, or Lady Carrol, as she believed her to be, standing almost beside her.

She was dressed all in white; she wore it almost constantly now, for she knew she looked lovelier in it than in anything else; everybody had told her that she had never been so beautiful as when she had stood beside Lord Carrol during that mock ceremony. There were great pearls in her hair and on her arms, and clusters of white lilacs on her bosom.

Star held her breath as she looked at her, thinking that she was wondrously fair, and that it was not strange that she should allure any one by her beauty; but she believed she was dressed thus because she was a bride.

How happy and bright she looked, too, with the vivid color in her cheeks, her eyes sparkling from the excitement of the moment, and with a light laugh just leaving her red lips!

Why should she not be happy, Star thought, bitterly, as the wife of one of the noblest men in England, and occupying one of the proudest positions in the land?

A heavy sigh involuntarily escaped her, and, hearing it, Josephine turned quickly to see whence it came.

"Stella Gladstone!" she exclaimed, and instantly all the color went out of her face, all the light from her eyes, the laughter from her lips, and she stood regarding the beautiful girl with lowering brow and angry eyes.

CHAPTER XLI.

REHEARSING THE PAST.

Star arose as she addressed her thus, and with the act all her pride arose as well.

"Yes," she said, speaking with cold politeness. "I suppose you are surprised; you did not expect to meet me here, Miss—Lady Carrol."

Josephine's face lighted at those last words, and a wicked gleam leaped into her black eyes.

"No, I did not," she returned, trying to call a happy smile to her false lips. "And—and—you have heard, then?" and, dropping her darkly-fringed lids as if in confusion, she played with some flowers which she held in her hands, and looked the modest bride to perfection at being addressed by the title she had so lately assumed.

"Yes, I have heard of—or at least I saw your marriage in a paper which was sent me recently," Star answered, trying hard to steady her voice, and resolving that the girl who hated her so should not suspect the torture she was enduring.

But Josephine did suspect it, and was determined not to let her go without wringing her heart with something of the agony which she had suffered.

Lord Carrol had dared to tell her, in the midst of her humiliation, that he loved Star, and she was bound to be revenged in some way for it.

She had sent her the Cheshire Gazette, even as Star had mistrusted, but she had not expected to get any such satisfaction as this out of it.

She had been down to the American Legation and found out where Mr. Rosevelt was stopping, and then had marked that paragraph and mailed that paper to Star, just to arouse her jealousy and show her that she had been a guest in Lord Carrol's home for a week.

It had never entered her head that she would only read the notice of that mock marriage, and believe it real, not observing that it was connected with the remainder of the article describing Lady Sherbrooke's ball.

But she now saw that such was the case. Star believed that she was really Lady Carrol; and she knew something of what she must be suffering on account of it, and with a sense of cruel exultation she resolved to give the wheels of the rack that she was on another vigorous turn.

She felt that the lovers would without doubt meet before long—perhaps that very evening, for she had seen his lordship there only a short time previous to this meeting, and she was assured he would waste no time in coming to an understanding with Star; but now, while she had her in her clutches, she would make the most of her opportunity.

"I presume it is something of a disappointment to you to find me here, and—situated just as—I am, when you so confidently expected to win his lordship," sneered Josephine. "You perceive that it is not always safe to be too trusting, and a young peer, even though he were traveling under an assumed name, and made love to a pretty, poverty-stricken girl, to while away an idle hour, could not be expected to marry her."

Star was very pale, but she was more than a match for the unfeeling girl in her proud beauty.

She stood like a tall and stately lily before her, and to all outward appearance she was no more moved by her scathing words than the snows on the peaks of lofty mountains are stirred by the fierce winds in the valley far below them.

Lord Carrol did not travel under an assumed name. I have discovered that Sir Archibald Sherbrooke and Lord Carrol, of Carrolton, are one and the same," Star replied, with cold dignity.

Josephine started, then remembering, said:

"Oh, of course; I forgot that both names were given in the notice of the marriage. But," she went on, taking an intense delight in the torture she was sure she was inflicting, although her fair victim gave no sign, "you have no idea how lovely Cheshire House is—that is where the dowager Lady Sherbrooke lives; and Carrolton is even more delightful, I am told. We intend to go there before very long; but London is very gay just now, though it is out of season, and we are having such nice times that we prefer to remain here for the present."

She glanced at Star angrily.

If she would but betray the least suffering, to show that she was wounded by this apparent triumph over her, she would have been content.

But she stood there, her graceful form proudly erect, her shining head thrown slightly back, her eyes fixed upon her face with an indifferent glance that galled her almost beyond endurance, while her manner was that of indulgent politeness, as if she were but listening, in a well-bred sort of way, to the babblings of a spoiled child.

"I suppose you have heard," she resumed, "that we came abroad to take possession of the estates of Sir Charles Thornton, whose death leaves mamma the nearest of kin, and therefore we shall all henceforth occupy a very high position in this country."

"Indeed?" Star responded, as if it were a matter of no moment to her. "I have heard of Sir Charles Thornton, but I did not know that you were 'nearest of kin' to him."

"Well, you know it now," Josephine retorted, sharply, beginning to lose her temper at Star's immobility; "and fortunately we can do exceedingly well without Uncle Jacob's money, which you so cunningly managed to wheedle him out of. We shall not return to America, for we can enjoy so much more here among the nobility, where, as I told you before, our position is so high, and mine particularly, you know, as—as Lady Carrol, is one to be rather envied."

This last, she thought, must be a dagger in the fair girl's breast, but she was wholly unprepared to have it turned against her own.

"May I take the liberty to ask Miss Richards what she means by the statements which she has made—to explain herself, if indeed that is possible," said a deep, stern voice just behind her.

Both girls started and turned instantly at the sound, and both uttered a cry—one of surprise, the other of dismay.

Lord Carrol himself stood in the doorway of the conservatory from which Josephine had entered, and through which he had passed on his way from another portion of the building back to the drawing-room.

He had seen Ralph Meredith and Mr. Rosevelt but a moment or two after Star slipped away. They told him that she was there, and he had instantly left them to seek her.

He had seen her standing there in the anteroom through the glass as he approached, and he recognized her instantly, although the sight had nearly unmanned him.

As he drew near, however, he heard Josephine's voice, sharp and scoffing, and addressing the strangest words to her.

He stood still and listened, perfectly aghast at what she was saying, until he comprehended the whole situation; and, when she made that last amazing assertion, he could endure no more, and entered to confront her.

Star, with one look into his white set face, and a glance of astonishment from his to Josephine, whose countenance, for once in her life, expressed blankest dismay, sank back pale and shivering into the chair from which she had risen when Miss Richards addressed her.

That young lady felt for the moment as if she would like the ground to open and swallow her forever from sight.

But the situation was a desperate one—so desperate that she did not care for anything; so, quickly rallying, she tossed her dark head and retorted with a light laugh:

"Miss Gladstone was just telling me, my lord, that she had heard of my marriage, and I was only carrying out the joke a little farther."

"I understand you," he said, briefly, but in accents of intense scorn.

Then, with a quick, eager step he came between her and Star, who, with her white hands folded helplessly in her lap, her face like purest marble, felt as if earth was again slipping forever out of her reach, for her senses were reeling.

With a stern, authoritative gesture he motioned Josephine away, and, reaching down, he took Star's hands in his.

"My darling," he said, in low, thrilling tones, "has she been torturing you to death? There is not one word of truth in what she has told you. Come with me, and let me explain everything to you."

A mocking laugh, which, however, was full of misery, rang through the room.

Lord Carrol looked back and saw Josephine, her face almost convulsed with pain and passion, passing out.

"Come," he murmured, gently turning again to Star.

He drew her unresisting hand within his arm, and led her through the conservatory out upon a covered porch at the rear.

He placed the fair girl in a chair in a secluded corner, and then knelt down before her.

He took her hands again and drew them to his breast, where she could feel the great heart-throbs which made his strong frame quiver like a tree struck by the woodman's ax.

"My darling," he said again, "I have seen Mr. Rosevelt, and he told me that you were here. I have been looking for you everywhere during the last fifteen minutes. Dearest, you will let me defend myself now, will you not? You will not turn away from me—you will not spoil both our lives by again driving me from you, believing me to be a 'traitor and coward'?"

Star shivered. Those words smote her with terrible pain; but her heart had been bounding with new hope since he had so sternly confronted Josephine Richards and proclaimed her assertion a lie.

She could not comprehend it, for she had read the notice of their marriage with her own eyes. Yet she instinctively trusted him, and it was so sweet, after all the miserable past, to have him there, looking so fondly down into her eyes, and calling her his darling in those dear, familiar tones.

"Archie—Archie!" she murmured, with a sob, "I know all about it—you were never a traitor or a coward. I know you never deceived me, and I alone am guilty of a great wrong to you."

With a low cry of joy he gathered her close in his arms, and laid her shining head upon his breast, calling her by every endearing name with which his heart was filled.

"You know all about it, my love? Who has told you?" he asked, surprised.

"Just one little sentence in a newspaper, which told me also that, when at the very moment I found you had been true, my life was to be a blank as long as I should live," Star said, with unsteady voice and quivering lips. "I read," she added, "the notice of your marriage with Miss Richards in the Cheshire Gazette. These two names, Archibald Sherbrooke and Lord Carrol, were printed there, and told me the whole story. I knew then how I had been deceived. But I cannot understand."

She broke off suddenly, and drew herself away from him, shivering and sick at heart again.

Surely that notice would never have been printed if he were not married, and she had no right to be thus in the arms of another woman's husband.

She knew that he neither loved nor respected Josephine from the way he had addressed her; he called her Miss Richards, too, but it was a puzzle she could not comprehend.

Lord Carrol read her thoughts, and saw by her white face how she was suffering, and he said, with infinite tenderness:

"My love, it was all a farce, a mock marriage planned by a wild and thoughtless girl, while I was chosen as one of the unfortunate victims and Miss Richards the other. Did you not read the description which followed that notice?"

"No; I read nothing but those horrible words, which told me of my own injustice, and that you and I would be parted forever. They burned themselves into my brain as if they had been branded there with a hot iron, and I cared to read no more."

"If you had," he returned, "you would have been undeceived; but I was very angry when I saw how the affair had been published, and if I could ascertain who wrote it up, I should be tempted to chastise the writer severely."

Star was weeping now; great, glad tears of joy chased each other over her cheeks, and she did not resist him when he drew her into his arms again, wiping with his own hands the glittering drops as they fell, while in low, tender tones he told her all about the strange events which had conspired to separate them for so long.

"Will you forgive me, Archie? I was very hard upon you, but I was nearly mad with my misery that night when I refused to listen to you," Star said, when the story was ended.

"Forgive you, my own? This moment compensates for everything," was the rapturous answer.

"I have been very foolish, Archie," Star whispered, "but, oh! I am very, very happy now. I was so utterly wretched this morning. I have been so wretched all day that it required all my courage to come here tonight; but I forced myself to do so because I did not wish Uncle Jacob to mistrust anything."

"And I hear that my modest little Star has become a great heiress; she is no longer the quiet, retiring little maid whom I was so proud and happy to have won that day when we went to Coney Island," Lord Carrol said, half regretfully.

She lifted her head from his breast and looked at him inquiringly, and he thought rather more searchingly than the occasion required.

"I mean," he explained, "that Mr. Meredith has told me that Mr. Rosevelt has adopted you as his heiress."

She drew a long breath, but merely returned, in an absent way:

"Yes."

"Mr. Meredith told me more, too, my darling," her lover resumed; "he was the one who lifted the burden of sadness, caused by your sentence of banishment, from my heart. I imagined, also, although his confidence did not extend quite so far as this, that he had been my unsuccessful rival, and that was why you confessed what you did to him regarding your affection for me."

"Did Mr. Meredith tell you that——" Star began, blushing crimson as she remembered what her confession had been.

"Yes, my beloved, and no hungry heart ever feasted upon sweeter words. They changed the whole future for me, and I was intending to start again for America in just three weeks, to search for the star of my life; the past has been very lonely and hopeless."

"Yes, indeed," Star returned, with a long sigh; "and yet," she added, looking up with a smile, "I am glad that I am not to come to you quite so empty-handed as you found me."

"You surely do not regret the promise that you made me then?" Lord Carrol questioned, reproachfully.

"No; for it proves that you won me for myself alone; but now that I know you are a peer of England, it is a comfort to feel that no one can point the finger of scorn at me and say that you have chosen beneath you."

He stopped her with a tender caress.

"No one should ever have said that to me with impunity, under any circumstances," he rejoined, gravely.

They talked a long time, and everything was explained—all the events of the past rehearsed, all Josephine's duplicity and hatred made known.

Another blissful half hour slipped unheeded by, and then he said:

"Come, dear; people will begin to wonder what has become of us, and besides, I want to introduce you to my mother and sister."

They were just entering the drawing-room when they met Lady Sherbrooke coming toward them, looking right and left for her son.

Her handsome face lighted as she saw him, and she quickened her steps, while she wondered at that new light in his eyes, at the bright and youthful expression on his face.

"Mother," Archibald Sherbrooke said, and there was a proud ring in his tone, "I want to introduce to you Miss Gladstone, a friend whom I met while I was in America."

Lady Sherbrooke shot a keen glance into that lovely, blushing face, and there came a look of surprise into her own, while for once she lost something of the graceful self-possession that was habitual to her as she greeted Star.

Her heart went forth to the young girl at once, and she experienced a shock akin to that which Vivien had felt when she met her.

Table Linen and Its Care

By Susan B. Dinsmore

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE American merchant offers for sale besides the domestic linen several kinds of imported damask. That manufactured by the Irish is the most expensive and is generally considered the best made but it is closely followed by the Scotch linen and before the war a great deal of linen made in France, Austria or Belgium was sold in this country.

The value of linen is very largely determined by the bleaching to which it is subjected because bleaching takes from its weight. The best heavy damask is bleached by natural methods, as spreading it on the grass where the sun does the work. Other methods of bleaching are by spreading the linen on snow or by using chemicals which take from the fiber and strength of the fabric. It is very difficult for even the best experts to determine from the cloth the method by which it was bleached but the grass bleached cloth comes into the market about the middle of December, hence the winter is a desirable time in which to buy. Domestic or American made linen is very poor because the temperature in this country is unfavorable to its manufacture. This makes it impossible for American linen to compete with the imported except where inferior or cheap cloth is desired.

Cotton is often used to adulterate the less expensive linens. This causes the cloth to become fuzzy through wear and so is undesirable. One may easily detect cotton in linen by rolling it between the thumb and finger. Linen, which is heavier than cotton, wrinkles much more readily than cotton.

When selecting linen one should always be careful to get pure linen and choose by weight, not by fineness of the threads. The best fabrics are not those which are very fine but those which are firm with an elastic leathery appearance. Never choose a linen which is stiff and heavy with starch.

The durability of a cloth is also to some extent governed by the pattern and weave. Patterns having long, unbroken threads are very showy but not as durable as the cheaper and medium-sized patterns. Small and medium-sized patterns are less effective than the large showy ones but they are always in good taste and less expensive in the end.

In buying table linen have the exact size of the table and buy the same amount of cloth to drop at each end as will drop at the sides of the table. Material purchased by the yard is generally from fifty cents to a dollar a yard less in price than that which is purchased in pattern lengths. Two dozen napkins are generally considered necessary to each cloth and should always match the cloth.

The best linen soon loses its luster and beauty unless properly cared for but its richness can easily be retained to the last if one is careful in handling it. Age in no sense causes the beauty of linen to decrease. Fruit stains or other spots should be taken out by pouring boiling water through them as soon as possible after they are made. Do it before the spot is dry if possible. In laundering table linen one should be careful in handling cloths and also see that they are not boiled or rinsed with colored or badly soiled clothes as that tends to make them yellow or streaked.

Table-cloths should always be ironed lengthwise of the cloth and while very wet with a hot iron. Nothing, however, will yellow a cloth quicker than too hot an iron. Both napkins and table-cloths should be ironed dry on both sides before they are folded. Fold napkins in convenient sized squares. Cloths keep best when they are folded only once or twice, lengthwise, and then hung carefully over a rod in the linen closet. If the linen closet is too small for such an arrangement, the table-cloth may be rolled on a mailing tube or round stick. Fold the table-cloth and lay it away flat only when this is absolutely necessary as the folds tend to cut the fabric and shorten its period of service.

When the table-cloth begins to show a little wear where the edge or corners of the table come, cut a piece two inches wide off of one end and one side and hem again. This brings the hardest wear on another place in the cloth. When the table corners finally insist on poking through the cloth the least worn parts of the linen can be cut in squares and hemmed for picnic napkins or tray-cloths. Wrap linen in blue paper to prevent its turning yellow when not being used frequently.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

housekeepeing, cooking and sewing are the three things I can do best. That is, I try to do all I can to please my husband and he seems to be satisfied. Doesn't that mean I do it well?

As this is my first letter, I'll cut short to give somebody else a chance to talk, too. I would love to correspond with the dear "COMFORT sisters, I need friends so badly.

When I write again, I'll talk about my home and I also will tell you, like Mrs. Clark did, the most exciting thing that happened to me; that was on the boat coming across from France.

With love to all, MRS. OLGA COUTURE.

Welcome, little War Bride.—We are glad to have you with us.—Ed.

KANSAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for many years and although I haven't a very good education and cannot write well, perhaps Mrs. Wilkinson can read it as I wish to say a few words to Lena.

I, too, had the same trouble with my husband and for five years I was so miserable I even thought of suicide but I found a way through sorrow that has brought happiness and sunlight again. We were expecting a new life to live with us and my husband would allow me no help so I had to do all my work alone and was bitter at all the world. I could find no joy for I knew he would never love the baby. But God knew best and it never opened its eyes on this world. I saw he was so troubled over the loss and I studied and found my answer. I told him it was his fault for God did not intend that another should suffer as I had because of his terrible jealousy and I would endure it no longer. I would do my housework then I was free and could do as I pleased. I kept a book and when he left home I would write down where he went and how long he stayed and kept a list of my own comings and goings. One day I showed him the two lists and told him there was proof that he went twice as much as I did and I was not going to stand any more. He cried and asked my forgiveness and another chance and today people speak of our happiness and how much my husband thinks of the children (we have four) and of me.

Sisters, write and tell us how to make over things and some of your ideas. A HAPPY MOTHER.

IDAHO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have enjoyed the S. C. for some time and when I saw Wild Rose of Pennsylvania's question about American girls marrying foreigners, I thought I would tell of my experience. I also saw Mrs. J. M. Comer's remarks on the same subject and I believe she is prejudiced.

Nearly three years ago I married a "foreigner" eight months older than I am. He had been drafted during the war in spite of a treaty existing whereby the U. S. or his country could not force subjects of either country to serve in the other's army. He served two years, fighting our battles. Before the war was over he became a citizen of the United States. Don't you think I have more respect for him than some of our 100 per cent. Americans who got married in April and May, 1917, to keep out of the war? Both my brothers were in the war too, and they all want to forget it. I am an American. My ancestors have lived in the United States for over two hundred years.

My husband is good and kind to me and the only trouble is that his heart is bigger than his pocketbook. He is the only man I ever saw that just suited me and I have never regretted marrying him. I do not believe that a man or woman should marry someone they do not love. If a woman really enjoys the presence of and is sure she loves and respects the man she is to marry, I think she will be happy when married, whether he was born in this country or some other.

I do not understand what Wild Rose means by "working people and middle classes." In this country each is free and equal. Just because some few have creative and accumulative power to such an extent that they have become rich, are they any higher class than their grandfather who carried a dinner pail or their mother who did the family washing? The really great men of this country all had to struggle for existence during their early days.

I like to see the baby pictures in our corner. I have none of my own but I do love babies. Sisters who have babies, do not condemn the woman who has none. You cannot know how her heart aches for little ones. Because the Lord has blessed you and not her, be kind, not critical.

About the fallen women or girl, perhaps you do not know the circumstances. Anyway, if there were no fallen men and boys there would be no fallen women.

We are building a new house and if you would like to have me describe it when finished, I will. We live on a farm of eighty acres. I have lived in four states and each has its advantages.

With good will to all, A WESTERN WILD ROSE.

BRUNSWICK, NEB.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL:

"One of that Sort's" letter plainly expresses the thoughts and lives of so many motherless girls in the world. And the letter by Corine J. Roberts was the kind of advice that tends to making the world better. Perhaps I should not give you my age as you may think that one so young could not possibly know, but I will soon be eighteen and have seen a few of your experiences, "one of that sort," among very dear friends. Am enclosing a poem of which I am very fond. It may be of interest to "Worried Mother" and possibly to others in the same circumstances.

A Plea for the Prodigal Girl

"I have read of the death of the martyrs;
The story of Peter and Paul,
The story of Luther and Calvin—
I respect and honor them all;
And also old Thomas and Stephen,
Honest and faithful men,
And I've read the sweet story of Jesus,
And expect to read it again.
I've read of the Good Samaritan,
Of charity's lesson begun,
And my heart goes out in great pity
To the wayward prodigal son.

"All are so glad to welcome him,
So quick to forget and forgive,
It makes no difference what he has done,
If he only comes back to live;
They have always prayed for the prodigal boy,
Since ever the world begun,
The joy, the glory, forgiveness,
Of the returning, wayward son,
But poets seem to forget to write
Of the saddest thing in the world—
They are not so eager to welcome back
The poor little prodigal girl.

"Just why she has turned out crooked—
She happened to find the 'right one,'
Who had the slick tongue of a Judas—
And that was your prodigal son.
Though the boy is upheld and forgiven,
It is common all over the world,
That you scornfully point out for gossip
The poor little prodigal girl.
There is nothing so truly pathetic
As the life of the maidens who fall,
And if you search down to the bottom
You will find man the cause of it all.

"But he is led back in society
And nursed with the tenderest care,
Held up to the world as a hero,
And mentioned in fervent prayer,
While she is cast out from her loved ones,
Out in the hard, cruel world,
And everyone points out and scorns her,
The poor little prodigal girl.
Now, as has been said quite often,
And we will repeat it again,
That 'the lowest of fallen women
Are better than some of the men.'"

There, don't you like that? I think it is merely a condensed form of the public sentiment in general if they would only admit it.

Very sincerely,
A COMFORT lover, GLADYS M. RICKERT.

KIEFER, OKL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I read my first letter to COMFORT in the May issue with a gone, weak-kneed sort of feeling for I didn't realize what a scorching flare my temper had produced until I saw it in cold print, and I rather expected a snip or two for making so bold as to exalt the "under dog," but as all the sisters have refrained from any mention of my letter, I'm taking courage to again give voice to my opinion on the jealous husband problem of Lena's.

I believe the solution to Lena's problem is the injection of "new thought" and "brain culture" into the mentality of that husband of hers. His case is a "disease" and not a "fault," Lena. I'm confident that if you could have an examination of your husband by a brain specialist, he'd tell you that a part of your husband's brain was undeveloped, that it had stopped growing in early childhood and still remained in the undeveloped state of a child's mind; therefore, he acts like a selfish, spoiled child, and is to be treated like one. By stimulating his mind gradually through suggestion you may start him to thinking along new lines, thereby causing his mind to grow and expand until he'd come to see how foolish, silly and childish he really was. It is just possible that his ill nature is inherited. His mother possibly bred that abnormal selfishness in him by her own actions and feelings before his birth. The way you say he acts sounds about the way a selfish woman would act at that time. In either case though I believe you can cure him by suggestion and adopting a motherly attitude toward him yourself. At the first opportunity you have to converse with someone in his presence, bring up the subject of jealousy in a casual manner and then remark that you believe that jealousy is merely an acknowledgment on the part of the jealous person that they feel they are inferior or are lacking in something or some manner that other men possess to attract. Then add that you are glad that you are not jealous natured, that you feel you can hold your own with anyone and that no one is your superior. That will give him food for thought perhaps. If space permitted I could give you a number of other suggestions but I don't want to "hog" the Corner but if my idea appeals enough to you that you care to write to me I will be glad to help you further.

And now to Kentucky Lassie's query regarding the sin of falsehood, it is my observation that one falsehood breeds or fathers a whole legion of little lies to back it up. And the more a fire is smothered the more the air about it is befouled with smoke. It is best, I believe, to give trouble all the chance it needs to burn itself up, then it is done with and the air is pure.

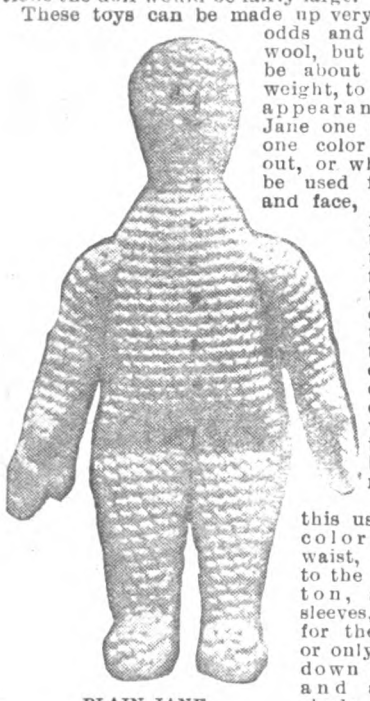
Toys to Amuse the Baby and Lessen Care



Children's Crocheted Playthings

AS children most always treasure an old doll much more than even a beautiful new one, and a mere rag doll, worn and tousled often holds the place of honor even in a family of really lovely dollies, one need not hesitate at all about offering a home-made one as a gift, even though small and of a simple sort, for it certainly will be loved by some little tot.

Of the home-made dolls which are described here, Plain Jane is of the simplest sort possible. She can be crocheted very quickly and will weather considerable wear and tear as she is so plain and substantial without any frills.

Germantown wool is the best weight, still Scotch can be used or even an 8-fold Germantown, but in this case in following these directions the doll would be fairly large.

These toys can be made up very nicely of odds and ends of wool, but it should be about the same weight, to be even in appearance. For Jane one could use one color throughout, or white could be used for hands and face, black for marking the features and the buttons, or a combination of two or even three colors could be worked into the body very nicely.

PLAIN JANE.

In doing this use a light color for the waist, say down to the fifth button, and the sleeves, a second for the balance, or only part way down the legs and a third shade for stockings, with black for shoes if necessary. For Plain Jane one will need about one skein of wool and a crochet hook which will make the work fairly close.

Beginning at crown of head make ch 6 sts, join in ring, ch 1.

1st round.—2 s c in each st.

2nd round.—1 s c in each s c.

3rd round.—1 s c in each of 2 sts., 2 s c in every 3rd st, repeat.

4th round.—Same as last only increase in the 4th sts.

In each of next 4 rounds make 1 s c in each s. c.

9th round.—Decrease by sk every 4th st.

10th round.—Decrease by sk every 3rd st.

11th round.—Skip only 2 s c in this round.

12th round.—2 s c in each st.

13th round—1 s c in each st.

14th round.—Increaae 1 s c in in every 4th st.

15th round.—Increase 1 s c in every 5th st.

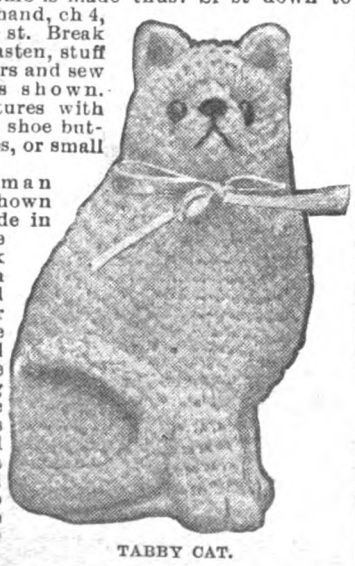
16th round.—1 s c in each st.

Make 14 or more rounds according to the length of body wanted. Stuff the head and body unfil firm, then join the edges with single crochet, taking up the back loops of opposite stitches.

Legs.—Ch 16, join in ring.

1st and 2nd rounds.—1 s c in each st. Now decrease 2 sts, then 1 s c in each st for 2 rounds, decrease 2 sts in next, 1 s c in each st for 2 rounds, continue to work in this way until over 14 rounds. This finishes the leg.

For Instep.—1 s c in each next 3 sts, turn, ch 1, 3 s c in 3 sts just made, turn, 3 s c on last sts, 1 s c in each st down side of instep, top, around leg, down other side of instep tab across the front. (This is for foot.) Make 2 more rows of singles on 4th row, fasten across the bottom with sl st. Stuff and sew to body.



Arms.—Ch 16 and join with a sl st, 1 s c in each st for 2 rounds, then decrease 2 sts, next round 1 s c in each st. Repeat last 2 rounds three times.

11th round.—1 s c in each st.

12th round.—Increase 2 s c next 1 s c in each st repeat these 2 rounds once, then 1 s c in each st.

Fingers.—Lay two last rows of arm together and join by sl st through first 2 sts, ch 5, turn, 1 s c in each st, turn, fold together and join by sl st, ch 5, turn, 1 s c in each st of ch, 1 s c in each next sts on arm, ch 7, 1 s c in each st. 1 s c in next 2 sts of arm, ch 6, 1 s c in each st. The thumb is made thus: Sl st down to 2nd row of hand, ch 4, 1 s c in each st. Break wool and fasten, stuff all but fingers and sew to body as shown. Outline features with black using shoe buttons for eyes, or small beads.

A wild man such as is shown next is made in this same way of black or brown yarn and white for features. The hair and skirt is made by drawing a couple of strands of wool through a st, tying and clipping to present the appearance shown.

TABBY CAT.

A clown is another variation which may be made very easily of white or light wool. Make head and body as directed. Then beginning with a ch 16, turn, 15 s c, turn, 13 s c, turn, 11 s c, repeat, working in this way down to a point. Make 5 of these pieces. Edge white with red and other colors with a contrasting shade, sew a small bell to tip of each piece. Then join 2 to lower part of body, 2 on the sides instead of arms, and 1 on the head, point up for the clown's cap.

A Tabby Cat.

This pretty puss is worked in Afghan st, which is as follows: Ch 10, turn, draw 1 loop through each st, keeping all on the hook.

WILD MAN.

2nd row.—Draw wool through one loop, over and draw through 2 loops, repeat these 2 rows. Unless one is familiar with this stitch it will be better to practice a little before beginning to shape the cat. A skein of Germantown will be needed and a fairly long crochet hook. Afghan st is used throughout except for the bottom. Decreasing and increasing is done as follows: To decrease, draw wool through 3 loops instead of 2, and in taking up the loops for next row draw the wool through the 2 vertical loops. Increasing is done while taking up the loops, decreasing in working them off. Always decrease from left-hand side and increase from right-hand side. In counting sts always include both the first and last loops on the hook.

Make legs first by ch 12, turn, make 7 rows, repeat making 2 sections alike. Next begin at the bottom of the body with ch 30, work 6 rows.

7th row.—3 sts on body, then along the top of one leg section, increasing in 3rd and 10th sts, skip 2 sts on body, work on next 18 sts, then across 2nd leg, increasing twice, and finish with last 3 sts of body. In working back decrease at each corner where the legs are joined on.

8th row.—Decrease at back corner of the 1st leg and both corners of the 2nd leg.

9th row.—Take up loops as usual, work back leaving 18 on hook.

10th row.—Take up 9, work back to 16.

11th to 14th rows.—Take up 2 more sts in each row.

15th row.—Work all the way across, decreasing after every 4th st.

16th row.—Take up 18, and work back.

CROCHETED DOG.

17th row.—Take up 14 and work back.

18 to 20th rows.—Short rows, 2 less each time.

21st row.—Full row, decreasing after every 4th st except third time, then after only 2.

22nd row.—Decrease after 2 sts, then twice after 1 st each time, finish row.

23rd row.—Decrease after 2 sts, leave 3 on hook.

24th row.—Take up 15, and work all off.

25th row.—1 plain, decrease, 1 plain, decrease, leave 3 on hook.

26th row.—Take up 16, leave 5.

27th row.—Take up 13, work all off.

28th row.—Increase in 10th and 11th sts.

29th row.—Take up 18, leave rest.

30th row.—Take up 16, leave rest.

Next row take up 14, next only 12, then 18 and work all off.

34th row.—Take up all across, draw wool through 6 at once, 2 plain, decrease, 2 plain, decrease twice, 4 plain, decrease twice.

35th row.—4 plain, decrease, 4 plain, decrease.

36th row.—Decrease 3 times.

37th row.—Plain.

38th row.—Take up loops and draw the wool through all at once.

Ears.—6 sts, 3 rows, drawing all to a point.

Tail.—Ch 30, 2 rows, decreasing first st in each. Next row work off.

To finish—Sew up front, stuff legs and body full, then finish the bottom in this manner: Join wool at edge, ch 3,* wool over hook, insert hook from back side in vertical loop, draw wool through st, wool over and through 2 loops on hook, leaving 2, wool over and through next st, wool through 2 loops, wool through all 3 loops on hook. Repeat from * around. Break wool and draw up closely to make flat. In case this is too small, the sts of the 1st row were too short. Sew straight end of tail to center of back and catch the tail in place along its full length. Sew in ears. Punch nose in shape, use buttons for eyes and black sts for nose, mouth and claws.

Crocheted Dog

For this one will need a full skein of Germantown and a No. 5 bone crochet hook with long handle. The body is made first and of Afghan st. Begin with a ch 19, turn, take up 17 loops, work 5 rows on these.

6th row.—Begin loop work about head and shoulders. To do this insert the hook in first st, pass wool over forefinger of left hand, before drawing through as a sl st. Make 1 loop and sl st in each st in row, work back with single crochet, inserting hook under 3 threads to prevent drawing the loops out of place. In this row decrease 1 st and each end of row, after 2nd row of loops leave 4 sts at each end. In working back in singles after 2nd loop row, increase by making 2 sts in the 5th, 8th, 9th and 12th sts. After the 3rd loop row increase in 7th, 10th, 11th and 14 sts. After the 3rd and 4th rows increase in this way 4 times in each row. After 5 loop rows are complete, when working back with singles leave 5 sts at the end, turn and work loops until only 5 sts remain, turn and continue working 3 rows on these sts. This will leave 5 sts at each end of first 2 rows, and 4 sts at end of next row. In the first of these short rows increase 3 times. After all short rows are complete continue the rows all the way around the head portion, making one more loop row. Fasten off wool.

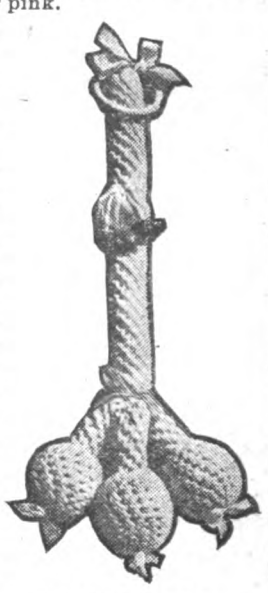
Begin in 7th st, working from the wrong side, take up 21 Afghan sts, and work 2 rows plain; in next 3 rows decrease (by drawing through 3 loops) twice in each row, 4 or 5 sts in from each end, 1 row plain, then a final row, drawing the wool through all the loops on the hook at once for the nose.



For the Legs.—The left-hind leg starts at the left end of the straight strip first worked. Take up 7 sts, 2 sts in the corner st 3 sts into the ch edge at right angle with the other, and 4 sts into a ch of 4 added to the end of under body section. Make 2nd row a short one by leaving 5 sts at the end.

In 3rd, 4th, 5th and 6th rows decrease once in each row in the 12th st, counting from beginning. Work 8 rows in all, drawing the wool through all loops at once in the last row. Reverse these directions for the other leg. For the front legs, holding wrong side of work towards you, make 6 loop st along the straight end of the left shoulder section, work back in singles, increasing 1 in the last st. Work a 2nd loop row with 7 sts, work back in singles, then work across in Afghan st, making 4 sts upon an added ch. Work 6 rows in Afghan st

Woolen Rattle

This is crocheted of one color throughout or may be made up of several light colors or white banded with blue or pink.

One begins by working a ring of ch 3 sts, into work 4 d c, 3 s c and 3 s c down the side of the first double. Then continue working round and round with singles but only through the back loop of each stitch. Use cotton and fill as the work proceeds, making the handle about eight inches in length. For the balls in the bottom use small rubber ones, covering with single stitches to fit, finishing the top of each ball off with a tube of a couple of inches. Attach these to the bottom of the handle covering the joining with a narrow ribbon. The center of the ball is also finished with a small ribbon bow and a small bell, while at the top of the handle is placed a ribbon wound ring, tied in place with a bow. If one has them a group of bells may be placed on one side of the handle as shown. For these chain 3 inches, work in a bell with a s c, ch 3 inches, repeat, making a group of some five or six bells.

WOOLEN RATTLE.

and draw wool through all loops in the last row.

Reverse directions for other leg. Join the edges, sewing up each separately. The sections upon the added chains are joined together between both the fore and the hind legs. The straight edge where the work was begun is folded in halves and joined, also sew from the point of the nose straight down the breast, and the under body seam.

For the Tail.—Ch 9, work 8 Afghan sts on it for 3 rows, then 2 loop rows with 1 row of singles between. Sew into tubular shape and to body.

For the Ears.—Ch 6, work 4 loop sts.

1st row.—Increase 1 st at each end also in the next loop row or 8 sts in all. Make 6 rows of loops and fasten off.

Gifts for Baby

A useful gift for a new baby, and a dainty one as well, is a pair of clips to keep the carriage robe in place. For these a pair of clips for men's trousers used in bicycling, are covered on both sides by fulling on satin ribbon. Fasten at the ends securely and finish the center of the top with a full bow.

A Swinging Toy

This is one way of using a doll's head which has lost its wig. Stuff the back of the head out so that it will be well rounded, then cover with a little hood made of eider-down or any sort of soft material. Add a bell and a tiny bow beneath the chin and to the top of the hood a small ring, and a half yard of narrow white elastic fastened to another ring. As this little contrivance swings from the hood of baby's carriage it will prove both entertaining and interesting.

IT WILL AMUSE THE BABY.

Similar heads can be used for an Eskimo doll and in making a pair of reins for a toddler. For the latter use heavy white piping cord, placing the little bonnet dressed head at the point where the cords cross the chest in front.

Washable Doll

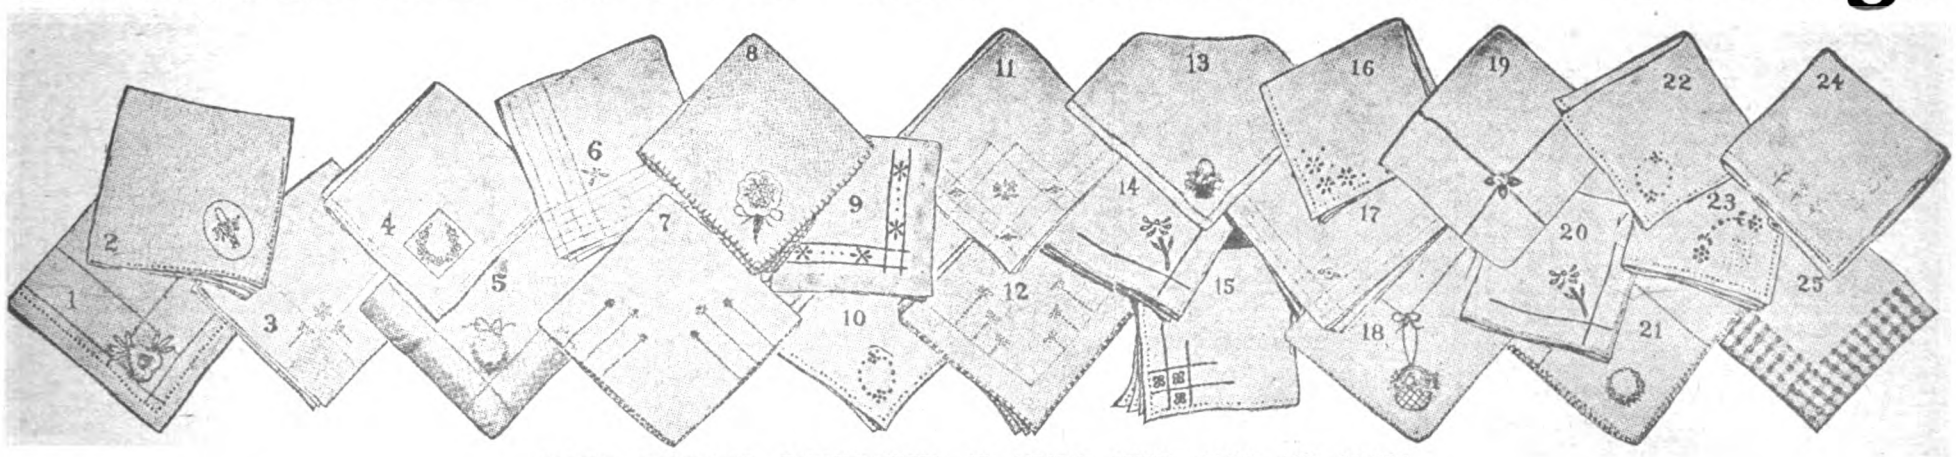
For this cute little home-made doll one will need a small rubber ball, two-inch wooden button molds, a couple of small pearl buttons and some small pieces of eider-down or flannel, a bit of lace for the cap and some ribbon.

WASHABLE DOLL.

First cover the button-molds after sewing on small buttons for eyes and indicating nose and mouth with a stitch or two on a small piece of white eider-down flannel or a bit of a white stocking. Place the flat sides of the molds together and cover smoothly. Next make two-inch rolls for the legs with one end flattened out for feet. Cut for material used for covering a small pair of trousers, slip over the legs and up over the rubber ball which should top them as it forms dolly's portly body. Attach the head securely and finish with a little Dutch lace bonnet. Cover body with a little plain dress, seamed up the back trimmed with a small white apron and ribbon as shown. Attach rolls of same material as dress for arms, and make and sew in place small bootees of a bit of white flannel or anything washable.

An Eskimo Doll

This really lovely little cuddle doll is as cute as can be, although our illustration only gives one but a faint idea of its appearance.



From white, pink or blue eider-down as material one would really secure the best result. First make the bonnet or hood, finishing this with the two ear-like pieces, which are made of triangles measuring three inches from base to tip and two inches across the base. Seam up the two sides and turn inside out, cut holes in the top of the hood, fit the ears in and sew securely in place.

LITTLE CUDDLE DOLL.

For the body cut a paper pattern measuring five inches across the bottom, seven inches up each side, slant these lines in a little, then cut out on right angles for two inches for arm pieces; leave these an inch and a half wide and cut in towards center, leaving opening here just wide enough to insert the dressed head. By the pattern cut two pieces of eider-down, seam up and turn inside out, stuff with cotton but not too closely as the doll should be soft rather than solid. Sew the head in place and cover, joining with a ribbon tied in front. Use narrow ribbon to tie the points at the bottom, which measure about one inch in from the corners. Also the arm pieces about through the center, fold here, and catch to the body as shown. The little bells down the front can be used or not, and complete this snug little Eskimo.

Drawn-in Work for Christmas Things

DAINTY HAND-MADE HANDKERCHIEFS OF COLORED LINEN, LAWN AND DIMITY.

Drawn-in Decorations

THE simpleness and fascination of the drawn in and drawn out" work, which started with the popularity of the gayly-colored novelty handkerchief, has grown until now it is seen on collar-and-cuff sets, scarfs, bags, pillows, tray and tea cloths.

This attractive sort of decoration offers one a splendid opportunity for utilizing all odds and ends of embroidery floss, which have such a surprising way of accumulating in one's work bag.

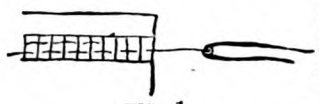


FIG. 1.

Any even or square woven material from which the threads may be easily drawn, whether of cotton, linen or wool, is suitable for this particular sort of work.

The idea is the drawing of threads arranged in borders, which give the impression of being woven in. The method, which needs little explanation, is illustrated in Fig. 1.

Draw out two threads, leaving one between, draw this thread out a little way and knot to the center of a thread of sewing silk, which is over twice the length of the space to be filled. Pull the silk in, then through the loop end slip a strand of the colored thread, hold in place until drawn in a little. The advantage of using silk is that it slips through easily and is not liable to break.

For wider lines of color, three or more threads may be drawn out.

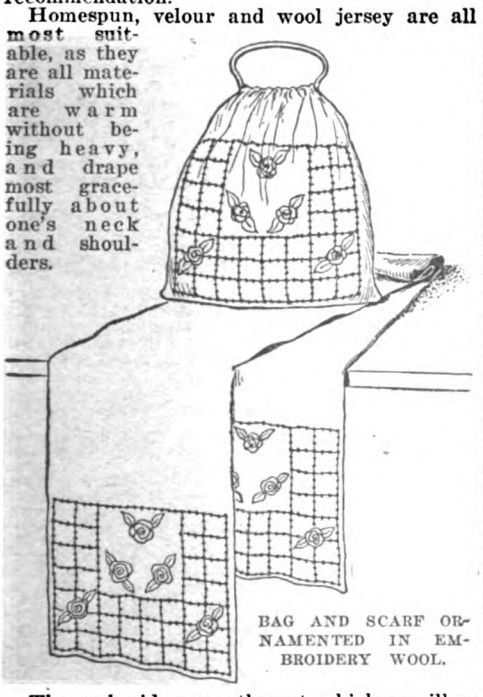

FIG. 2. LAZY-DAISY STITCH.

For dresser scarfs or pillows, rope or heavy floss may be used. For any article, first square the material and cut by a thread. If articles require a hem, decide on width and draw threads.

A Fall Scarf and Bag

The soft woolen scarfs which are now considered almost indispensable, are, fortunately, so becoming to almost everyone, they need no recommendation.

Homespun, velour and wool jersey are all most suitable, as they are all materials which are warm without being heavy, and drape most gracefully about one's neck and shoulders.

BAG AND SCARF ORNAMENTED IN EMBROIDERY WOOL.

The embroidery on the set which we illustrate is shown so clearly and is so very simple in character it can easily be carried out in any coloring preferred, although the grey jersey of the original, worked with jade green silk and wool mixture and livened with old blue roses showing just a touch of yellow to mark the centers, is a most effective combination.

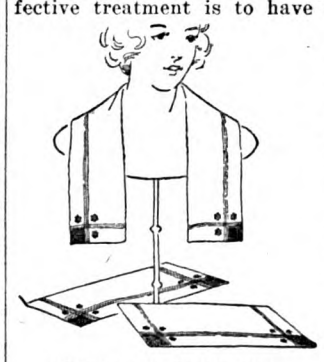
For the trellis-like work use the snail's-trail stitch, and for the roses either the overlapping outline of the rambler or bullion roses as preferred. Roll the edges of the scarf and hem, above the facing of jersey which should finish both ends, to the depth of the embroidery.

FIG. 3. SNAIL TRAIL.

The scarf measures 18 inches by 60, and the bag 9 by 12 when finished.

Instead of snail trail the cross-barring may be of cable or chain stitch and if angora wool is used in preference for the roses, work them solidly.

In using this, as it is so soft and delicate, a short needleful only should be taken as it will not stand hard pulling, and the passing of it to and fro through the material mars its beauty.



Fringe or tassels may be used on the scarf ends if preferred.

Collar-and-Cuff Set

It is the little things that count, and little touches of color may be easily added to a scarf, bag or collar as to one's handkerchiefs.

For the collar-and-cuff set shown in the this column one will need only a quarter yard of white voile, two yards of bias white binding and but a tiny bit of colored linen for the corners.

The drawn-in thread may either match the corners or be of a contrasting shade. An effective treatment is to have at least one of the threads black, using this also for the extra decorations which may be groups of French knots or lazy-daisy stitches.

COLLAR-AND-CUFF SET.

To secure true outlines a thread should first be drawn before cutting the collar and cuffs the size desired. Then allow for an inch or somewhat wider hem before drawing another thread.

After colors are drawn in, as shown in Fig. 1, turn all hems and hem down with fine cotton.

The colored linen corners are neatly felled in place, for this using thread as near the color of the linen as possible. If the linen has been washed to shrink, the voile should also be before combining the two.

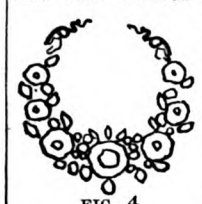


FIG. 4.

In the set shown the corners were pink; border, two black threads with pink between, and lazy-daisy designs, pink with black centers.

The fascination of this style of fancy work is liable to lead one into working out quaint color decorations on various household articles.

Even curtains have not escaped attention, and for certain rooms they are very pretty.

Coarse scrim lends itself naturally to this sort of work, gay borders of either wool or mercerized cotton perle being added very quickly.

However, as these hang between one and the light, the borders are much more effective if backed completely by the hem, instead of the border being worked inside of the hem as is usual.

Cross-stitch baskets or flower groups may also be added effectively to the lower curtain corners.

Handkerchief Suggestions

A dainty handkerchief folded in with a little note is always suitable for any gift time, and it will be even more valued and appreciated if it is a dainty hand-made one.

From a yard of handkerchief linen, linen lawn or the finest of cross-barred dimity one will get nine handkerchiefs. The novelty handkerchief of colors, though not new, still ranks high in popularity but, needless to say, only the choicest of material should be used and the workmanship must be exquisitely fine.

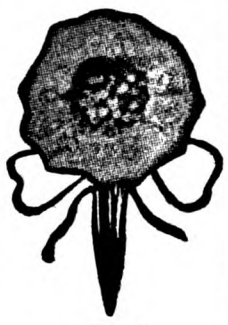

FIG. 5.

The note of color in handkerchiefs is not alone in the decorations but in the linens used, which may be of pink, blue, lavender, yellow, tan or whatever you choose. Natural pongee is especially suitable for gentlemen's handkerchiefs, but if more than the drawn-in borders are fancied, a monogram or initial only is in good taste.

All embroidery on handkerchiefs should be of delicate colors, carefully arranged. Use only fine embroidery cottons, and care must be taken to keep the wrong side of the work free from knots and crossed threads.

FIG. 6.

French knots, satin and lazy-daisy stitches, dots, rambler or bullion roses and cross-stitch are employed in working out the gay little flower-filled baskets or nosegay bouquets.

The illustrated suggestions for the various designs used on the handkerchiefs above are about a half size larger than the actual decorations should be. The colors suggested may be varied and arranged according to one's own fancy, the results being sure to please if harmonious colors are combined.

No. 1.—Hemstitched white linen, black drawn-in lines. Pink satin-stitch rose, outlined with black, green lazy-daisy leaves.

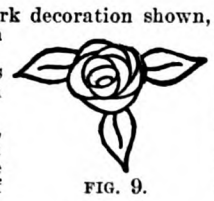

FIG. 9.

No. 13.—Grey-blue linen with basket decoration in corner. The basket is a bit of felled-on dark blue lawn, with handle of same shade in outline.

No. 14.—Another white, or cross-barred dimity. Rolled, cross-stitched edge and daisy of canary yellow. Three drawn-in lines one and one-half inches in, of black, yellow and black.

No. 15.—French-blue linen with narrow hemstitch hem. Drawn-in corner lines of old rose, with delicate pink lazy-daisy flowers with yellow French-knot centers in the three small squares.

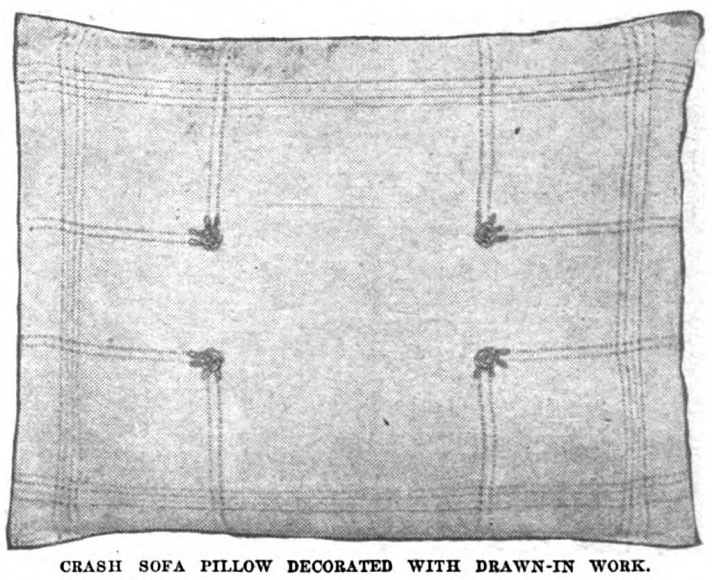
FIG. 18.

The basket is filled to overflowing with buds, blossome and leaves of rainbow hues which are altogether charming.



No. 19.—A plain design which though simple is most effective carried out in any coloring. Allow and top a two and one-half inch hem with black, add one rambler rose, any color backed by green leaves.

See Fig. 9, at the crossing of the lines as shown. No. 20, 21, 22 are very similar to designs already described.

No. 23.—Is a good suggestion for corner if one wishes to add an initial. The half wreath is of lazy-daisy stitch with French knots between.

No. 24.—Grass-green linen, one-fourth inch hem topped with one line bottle green, three white daisies with yellow centers, all the same height on two sides.

No. 25.—White dimity bordered with small checked zephyr gingham.

CRASH SOFA PILLOW DECORATED WITH DRAWN-IN WORK.

Crash Sofa Pillow

This durable cover is of natural shade of a coarse quality of crash.

Two and one-half inches in from the edges runs a border of three shades of old rose of mercerized rope embroidery cotton, one row of the darkest shade, then the lightest, followed by the second and third shades.

The two rows running in to form the squares are of the second and third shades. Finish the four points with bullion roses an inch in diameter, and built up so that they are solid and stand out, using the darkest shade for the centers working to lightest.

In making bullion roses use a coarse needle, filling centers with French knots. Begin the stitches, which are elongated French knots. Bring the needle up through the material and take a stitch one-fourth inch back, bringing the point out at the starting place. Twist the thread around the needle from 12 to 20 times according to length of stitches. Draw the needle through the twists, and take a stitch from the second point to the center of the roll, then back, making stitches overlap each other.

The Radiophone in the Rural Districts

AT the present time there are a great many more radiophone receiving sets, in proportion to the population, in the large cities than there are in the rural districts. The great burst of enthusiasm which swept the country during the fall and winter of last year was confined to the larger cities and it is only during the last few months that this new and wonderful invention has secured a place in the rural homes.

Radio is now becoming a stable and established form of entertainment and the farmers and other rural residents are just beginning to realize the value of the radiophone to them. The spread of the radio field is almost like magic and although many of the smaller towns throughout the country have not yet had the advantage of hearing the radiophone and there are many who do not even believe that speech and music can be sent through the ether without the aid of connecting wires, it is simply a matter of a short time before more homes will be equipped with radio receivers than with telephones—if you are not on the telephone line you can't use a telephone, but you can have and use a radiophone receiver anywhere.

What a wonderful thing it is for the farmer's home to be equipped with a receiving set so that every evening the entire family may gather round and listen to the concerts from famous music halls. Noted speakers talk to them and famous opera singers sing to them just as if they were sitting in the auditorium with the rest of the audience. Services from famous churches are brought home on cold, rainy Sundays and even the magnificent organ and choir are filling the little country home with music such as never before gladdened the hearts of the old folks and filled the children with wonder.

The really wonderful thing about the radiophone concerts is the ease with which the operator may change his program. Radiophone concerts are sent out to please every taste and in a single evening it is possible to vary the program from a classical recital to a program of dance music or still again to some famous band giving a concert in a distant city.

The farmer is especially benefited by the radiophone by the produce reports which are sent out every evening. With these reports he may now keep tabs on the produce market and thus sell his produce to advantage. Many of our rural friends are ardent baseball fans and it is a source of joy to them to be able to have the scores come to them fresh from the fields instead of waiting for the papers which are often a day late in reaching these small towns. The radiophone really brings the best of everything directly to the home and makes the children content and helps the entire family pass the long winter evenings at home enjoying the amusements of the outside world.

The radiophone is not an expensive luxury. A good receiving set may be made at home by any man or boy at a very moderate cost. The homemade set will give very efficient results if properly made and at the same time will give the maker a good working knowledge of the radiophone. The parts may be purchased from any dealer and the actual building is simply a matter of following instructions.

We have continuous requests for plans for building a radio receiving set and we are now preparing a set of plans for making a receiver which is now being used by the author with very good results. These plans will be complete and easy to follow. Music and speech has been received from stations a distance of over a thousand miles with this set and with a careful study of the plans any of our readers should be able to obtain as good results as we have.

The Future of the Radiophone

Many radio enthusiasts are now contemplating what the future has in store for the radiophone. Persistent rumors are afloat that the large broadcasting stations will soon close and thousands of receivers be rendered useless. This rumor is without foundation and there is little need to worry, for even if this should happen there are many broadcasting stations operated by newspapers and department stores which will continue to broadcast as long as there is a demand for such programs.

It is the large stations now operated by the radio manufacturers which are supposed to be of doubtful duration, but a close analysis of the policies of these stations takes away all fear that they will close at such a time. The manufacturers are increasing their output daily and with a stock worth many millions of dollars to be sold it seems that it would be nothing short of financial suicide for these manufacturers to take away the cause for demand. Instead of closing the present stations there are many new and better stations now under constructions and the coming fall and winter bid fair to be the greatest season for radio yet experienced.

Regarding the present types of receivers, there seems to be little chance of any radical changes before the middle of the winter and possibly not then. Much has been accomplished in the receiving end of radio, but as yet nothing new has been offered on the market that will greatly affect the receivers used the past season. Radio-frequency amplification is still in an experimental stage and although there are a few of these types of amplifiers on the market it is advisable for the novice to stick to the more stable audio-frequency until more definite results have been obtained.

The much-talked-of Armstrong super-regenerative circuit is not in common use yet and it is not advisable for the radio amateur, unless a very advanced one, to spend time and money in experimenting on this circuit. There is little doubt that in the near future this circuit will revolutionize the radio receiver but it is as yet an experiment and the amateur is apt to find it a very expensive one.

The loop antenna is becoming more popular in sections which are near enough to the broadcasting stations to use this form of aerial. The loop is a far better type of antenna than the outside type but will not work efficiently over any great distance.

Technical Terms Used in Radio

FREQUENCY of an alternating current is the term employed to express the number of complete cycles taking place per second.

DAMPED OSCILLATIONS are those consisting of a series of alternating currents of gradually decreasing amplitude.

OHM is the unit of electrical resistance.

MICRO-FARAD is the term used to express the capacity of a condenser and is used extensively in radio work.

MICRO-HENRY is the unit of inductance of a tuning coil.

TUNING is the selection of a particular wave length. This is done by altering the capacity or induction.

SELECTIVITY is the ability of selecting any wave length to the exclusion of all other wave lengths.

TRANSFORMER is any device for transferring energy from one state to another. Thus we have power transformers, amplifying transformers, telephone transformers, etc.

Questions relating to the radiophone, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Radio Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department.

Questions and Answers

Q.—What is the function of the filament in a vacuum tube? A. L., Mont.

A.—The filament is to ionize the path between the filament wire and the plate. This is accomplished by heating the filament under which condition it eminates ions which fly off and form an ionized path within the tube.

Q.—Will you kindly tell me whether W G Y, Schenectady, N. Y., sends his program on Eastern standard time or daylight saving time. F. D., Del.

A.—Schenectady sends on Eastern standard time.

Q.—What wave length does the Naval Air Station at Anacostia send? G. F. C., Md.

A.—Anacostia sends on a wave length of 425 meters.

Q.—Does it make any difference whether the aerial wire is bare or insulated? L. G., Tenn.

A.—No. The aerial may be either bare or insulated wire.

Q.—I sometimes hear Newark, N. J., and Pittsburg on the same point and cannot seem to get clear of one and keep the other. Can any arrangement be made to eliminate this condition? L. F. T., Pa.

A.—That is due to your tuner not being selective enough and I would suggest that you send a diagram of your hook-up and we will tell you how you may improve your set.

Q.—When I first had my set I was able to turn the dial and hear a peculiar whistle and by turning down the filament I could bring in the music plainly. Now I cannot get the whistle and only occasionally I am able to hear music faintly. Can you suggest what may be the trouble? M. H., Ohio.

A.—Either your storage battery is run down or your "B" battery is dead. Try charging the storage battery and if this doesn't remedy your trouble, put on a new "B" battery. It is possible that your detector tube has become "Hard" but it is more apt to be in your battery.

Q.—What station has the letters W J A L? C. E. D., Mass.

A.—W J A L is located at the Lafayette Hotel, Portland, Me.

Q.—Every night I receive the time signals from the station at Newark, N. J. Will you kindly tell me how to read them so I may set a watch by these signals. D. H. L., N. H.

A.—The time signals are relayed from the Arlington towers and are read as follows: At 11.55 until 11.55.29 a series of dots, the 30th second is omitted. From 11.55.31 until 11.55.55 a series of dots. Next five seconds omitted. The same proceedure takes place beginning at 11.56, 11.57, 11.58 and at 11.59. At the end of the 59th minute the last ten seconds are omitted instead of the last five and at 12 o'clock a long dash is sent. The object in sending this way is to allow ships at sea to read the chronometer and determine the error.

Q.—Which is the more expensive, building one's own set or buying a factory-made set? T. W., Mich.

A.—It is more expensive to buy a ready-made set and the experience and economy of building your own set makes it more desirable.

Q.—What are the call letters of the New Shepard Stores station in Boston?

A.—There are no call letters assigned to this station as yet although the station is giving some very good concerts in the afternoon and evenings.

Q.—Has an amateur who has a license to transmit a right to send phonograph music over his radio telephone? M. A., Ill.

A.—Absolutely not, and he is liable to get himself in serious trouble if he does.

Q.—Does the S. S. America send musical programs? W. T. R., Md.

A.—As near as we are able to ascertain, the S. S. America does not send any music at all but is used as a test station for "Ship to Shore" Radio telephone communication.

Q.—What company manufactures a loud speaker which is capable of producing sufficient volume to fill a large moving picture theater? P. F., Ind.

A.—There are two loud speakers which will work satisfactorily for this purpose. One is made by the Magnavax Company, of Oakland, Calif., and one by the Western Electric Co.

Comfort's League of Cousins

but roofing it and has built a new porch (for me to read the cousins' letters as they come pouring in!) and is going to paint it. Now, Uncle, if it were your home, what would you paint it? I suppose you will say, "Paint, of course." All very true, but what I mean is—what color? We are having a little dispute about the color of the paint. Now do I make myself plain? You know some people say I am very hard to understand. I was just wondering what Uncle and the cousins will think about it. Now you have me all excited and made me strike the wrong key. Oh, well, you know women are all alike nowadays. They all get excited and flustered when they see a good-looking, happy-go-lucky gent tripping down the street. Some nearly brake their necks to see if he won't give them one fond look. Well, now, to be truthful, I'm not that way. I won't go into detail, or you would all draw a deep breath and say: No use wasting paper to write to her; she thinks she's an angel. Listen, folks, please don't get that idea in your heads because I'm no angel and don't pretend to be. I like to have a good time as well as anyone else, but you know, folks, there is a limit to everything.

So long, I am going to trot along now and do a little bookkeeping; then I am going to catch my bus and ride home. You may say good by to the Angelville pest. That is what they call the little burg I live in—Angelville. No kidding, I don't know why; but they commenced calling it that when I first moved there three or more years ago.

Sincerely, GENEVA DAYTON.

Geneva, I felt quite assured you were not an angel, even before you insisted upon so strangely denying any celestial attributes—for there were no pin-feathers in your envelope and I should have expected any angel to use a white wing plume and not an Underwood with which to write letters to an earthly uncle. Anyway, there is this to be considered: if you were a surenuf angel, Geneva, you would certainly be more lonesome than you are now—for angels are a rare race, even if they do have towns named after them.

I'm glad you are getting on with your work so well; but it did not seem from what you wrote that your speed records were anything remarkable. I'm a poor dub at a machine, but I can guarantee to make "one or more words" at any test. These test words of yours must be pretty long ones, Geneva. Even if they have sixteen syllables, I think you ought to be able to write more than one or two of them between 7.45 A. M. and the time you catch the bus for Angelville. See if you can't do better than this—even if you have to "brake" the machine. Are you quite certain this is the way that word is spelled, Geneva? I'm sure no angel would spell "break" like this, but maybe your fingers got crossed.

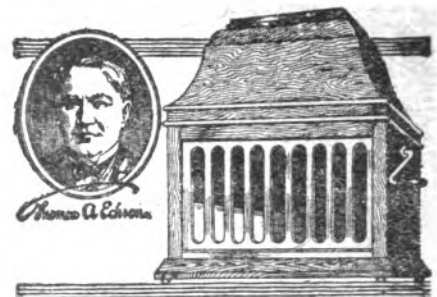
If you will take my advice, Gennie, you will paint your veranda a beautiful pale moon color. This makes it extra nice when you want to sit out of doors of a summer evening. If you need any clouds, you can use gray porch screens.

That's right; don't chase any "gents"—even good-looking ones—along the streets of Massillon. A happy-go-lucky gent pursued by a part angel would start considerable commotion and might even arouse the police. Let the "gents" do the chasing, Geneva, and if you should not happen to care for any of the chasers, why you can just spread your little sprouting wings and volplane back to Angelville.

INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

As part of our League rules is "Be kind to dumb animals," I want to remind all that there is a certain class of animals which stand in great need of some consideration. That is the jungle animals which are trained to perform tricks to amuse people who attend circuses, vaudeville shows, etc. I have been employed around circus tents and at quarters where wild animals are trained for the stage, and if the public could see some of the things I have seen, the business of exploiting wild animals as actors would die for lack of patronage, or the public would rise up in fury and demand that the law immediately stop the whole business. Believe me, a wild animal's brain cannot be made to comprehend what a trainer wants the creature to do until the flesh of the wretched, cowed captive has undergone countless cuts from whips. Do not be deceived by the claim that such animals can be trained by kindness. It just "can't be did." Every little trick you see an animal perform in public has been preceded by long suffering. It takes no "talent" to train a wild animal, anyone can do it—that is anyone who is possessed of patience and pitilessness. I hope to see the day when the importation and training of jungle animals in the United States will be forbidden by law. I have seen a-plenty of the cruelty of the methods used.



Good luck to you and all the cousins, Uncle Lisha, from Your nephew, GOMER L. FORD.

I am glad, Gomer, to be able to give place to your earnest letter. I am proud of you as a nephew. When we watch the tricks, almost human in character, performed by wild animals in circus rings or on the stage, we give too little thought to the process by which this aptitude, so unnatural to animal instinct, has been developed. In fact, what makes the acts of the animals interesting or amusing to us is because they are so strangely surprising when being the performance of wild creatures. And this can only mean that difficult means have been used to obtain difficult results. The whip, which is almost always present in the trainer's hand during such an exhibit, should cause us to remember that it is the lash which has been the real trainer of these animal actors and has transformed them by long and painful treatment into frightened automatons, responding to a master's voice and exploited for an owner's pocket.

Certainly a wild jungle creature has as much right to decent treatment as any of the domestic animals protected by our laws and humane societies. Pain is pain—when extended to any living thing. Spurred by your letter, Gomer, I am going to refuse henceforward to attend any performance of which trained animals are a part, and I will remember to protest and line up as

Overcharged Battery

"HEY, your lights are burning," is a salute that I heard about a hundred times during my recent trip in the East. It would appear that the public has not yet come to realize that a storage battery can be overcharged. Had the expression come from people on the sidewalk, I would be apt to believe that the majority were not car owners and naturally were inexperienced as regards the electrical system on a car. However, drivers would switch their lights on and off as I approached and as I came within hailing distance would shout the above expression. The fact is that long charging causes the battery to become very hot and boils away the water, necessitating frequent refilling of the cells with distilled water. When touring it is not always convenient to obtain distilled water. Overcharging also creates the danger of buckling the battery plates and destroying the separators. For these reasons it is necessary that the charging rate into the battery be cut down considerably or eliminated entirely. One way of cutting down the charging rate is to burn the car lights. In this manner it will be appreciated that considerable current is consumed by the lights and that the battery receives but a minimum charge. Another practice used by many motorists is to run the electric starter for about a minute with the ignition switch turned off. The starter consumes considerable current and quickly exhausts the overcharged battery. However, in my opinion, this is not a practice worthy of strong recommendation.

SHOWING THE BUTTERFLY VALVES IN CARBURETOR.

Still another practice which I have used with the desired result is the short circuiting of the generator. Some generators have short circuiting clips while on others the pulling of an accessible fuse will do the trick. I found that a half day's run with the generator inoperative and the other half day's run with the generator charging kept my battery about normal. However, the danger lies in allowing the generator to remain inoperative too long so that the battery becomes discharged. Anyone who has kept close touch with the electrical system should have no trouble by shorting the generator as above related. Others of my acquaintance have left the car lights burning all night so as to reduce the battery. Regardless of the method used it should be kept in mind that touring has a tendency to overcharge the battery and steps must be taken to either partially drain the battery or prevent the full charge from going into it.

Helpful Pointers

Broken Fan Belt

Should the fan belt break beyond repair and another cannot be conveniently obtained, it is frequently possible to operate the car at a safe motor temperature if the engine hood be raised or removed and the car speed not reduced below 20 miles per hour. The movement of the car will drive the air around the radiator tubes and keep the water below the boiling point. Raising or removing the hood prevents any heat pockets and also permits cooling air to encircle the motor.

Spot Light

If properly used the spot light is a great help when driving at night, but when improperly used it becomes a nuisance to approaching drivers. When the spotlight is attached to the windshield bracket it should be focused so that the light rays strike the ground several feet in front of the right front wheel. The purpose of the light should be to permit the driver to know just how near he is to the right side of the road. It is the side on which he belongs and by keeping over there he should have no fear of oncoming traffic.

Back Firing

Everything being normal, back firing or popping back through the carburetor is caused by a lean mixture. A thin mixture is very slow in burning, so much so that there is a flame or fire in the cylinder when the intake valve opens to admit a fresh combustible mixture. The flame in the cylinder ignites this new gas and causes the pop back through the carburetor. If the carburetor has been set for economical operation on the road, popping back through the carburetor is apt to be experienced when the motor is first started. However, proper use of the choker when the motor is first started will correct this condition and after the motor has warmed up the choker should be moved back to the running position and if the mixture is not too lean no further popping back will be experienced.

Releasing Starter

The Bendix drive starting arrangement while very efficient, at times may cause trouble by the small pinions refusing to release from the flywheel tooth. One method that is many times successful in freeing the two gears is to engage the high gear and then rock the car back and forth.

Motor Speed

In the throat of the carburetor is a butterfly valve or, in other words, a door which is so connected as to be opened and closed by a lever on the steering wheel or steering post and usually also by a pedal located in the toe board. This pedal is termed the accelerator. Adjustment is usually provided so that the butterfly valve cannot fully close but permits just enough of the gasolene-air mixture to escape past to keep the motor running at an idling speed. As the throttle lever or accelerator is advanced it causes the butterfly valve to open and of course permits a larger volume of the gas to pass. It will readily be appreciated that a larger charge of gas causes a heavier explosion than a small charge. For the reason just given, it will be realized how the speed of the motor increases as the heavier charges of gas are admitted into the cylinders.

Gear Changing

When you must use considerable strength to change gears or if there is a clashing of gears when a shift is made, take a look at the clutch. Due to insufficient lubrication, clearance or some other cause, it will usually be found that the clutch does not fully release and that there is a drag which has the above effect on the transmission at the time of making a gear change.

Cord Tires

The air chamber of a cord tire is much larger than that in a fabric tire. When placing an order for a tire cover be sure to state whether it is to be used for a cord or fabric tire. Cord tires do not require as high an air pressure as do fabric tires. Owners who have been using fabric tires are apt to inflate the cord tires to the old high pressure. Obtain the recommended pressure at the time of purchasing the tire.

No Power

"Lots of pep on the level but she lays down cold on the hills," is a common way of expressing the thought that the car lacks power on the hills. If a combustible charge is taken into the cylinder, tightly compressed and fired on time, then the car should not quit on the hills unless, of course, the grade is too steep. One of the chief reasons for a car quitting on hills is failure of the valves to seat promptly. On the level when a high speed is hit up, the compression periods are short. However, on the grades when the motor is compelled to "pull on the traces," so to speak, the compression period is much longer and the leakage past the valves is very noticeable. Another cause for lack of power is worn piston rings. If it is found that the rings do not hold compression it is well to first determine that the cylinder bores are true. If not, the cylinders should be reground and oversize pistons and rings fitted. However, if the bores are true, proper installation of new rings should be sufficient to restore power. When it is found that all cylinders develop good compression and yet the car does not do well on grades, it will be well to try a trifle richer mixture.

Fuel Consumption

Drivers of cars that were built several years ago have probably found that the mileage received per gallon of fuel is low. This is due to there being a better grade of gas at the time these models were built and provision was not made for heating the air and manifolds. Operating conditions at present vary greatly from those of years ago and owners of the earlier models will do well to install an efficient present-day carburetor, also inquire at an accessory house for an attachment for heating the manifold.

Answers to Correspondents

ENGINE RUNS HOT.—What causes my 1918 model Ford to get hot when running? It keeps the water boiling continually. Have had it cleaned thoroughly, also timer adjusted, but it did not seem to help.
P. K., Littleton, W. Va.

A.—Make certain the rubber hose connections are not kinked so that the flow of water through them is not impeded. If you are certain that the water is circulating, look at the fan belt. It may be loose. Check the ignition for being late and be sure that you are obtaining a full advance on the spark. If the carburetor mixture is lean, try richening it a trifle. The oil line that conducts the oil to the front of the motor may be clogged, although it would appear to me that you would have experienced bearing trouble. By the expression, "so hot," I am assuming that the water boils, but if not kindly bear in mind that a motor temperature is not at the danger point until the water actually boils.

RACING ACCESSORIES FOR FORD.—Please answer the following questions concerning accessories to adapt a Ford for track work. (1) Do you approve of sixteen-valve racing head? (2) Crankshaft counterbalances? (3) Underslung parts? (4) Which are best for racing work, disk or wire wheels?
E. L. M., Bulls Gap, Tenn.

A.—A sixteen-valve arrangement for racing work is most satisfactory. A special counterbalanced crankshaft is also common practice for duty of this kind. The underslung effect is quite essential to prevent sliding, etc. Although I am not up to the minute on racing cars, it would be my suggestion that you obtain better gearing than 4 to 1 for the rear axle. I have seen advertisements issued by accessory houses showing gears around 2 to 1 ratio for racing duty. Wire wheels have so far proved to be the popular issue with racers, but disk wheels give less air resistance and are more efficient at racing speeds, according to results of recent tests.

GRINDS IN HIGH GEAR.—The differential of my "490" 1919 model Chevrolet makes a loud grinding sound in high gear. The pinion gear on drive shaft wore out and I put in new pinion gear. The other gears are all right. Could the axle or drive shaft be bent to cause the grind? J. A. F., Belton, Texas.

A.—While I cannot vouch for the alignment on your car I wish to state that several manufacturers do not make a practice of furnishing one gear alone. Were you to be in need of a drive pinion you would be compelled to purchase a new ring gear with it. This is due to the fact that the gears are mated to operate with each other silently. While the ring gear on your car may not show wear, it is just possible that the old pinion has altered the pitch somewhat and that the new pinion does not mesh satisfactorily with the old ring gear.

Everybody Was Right

The well-known elastic English language was stretched to the snapping point the other day when a class of students in a Detroit high school attempted to answer a quiz question, "What is gas?"

Out of some sixty answers, here are a few:

Stuff made from coal and widely used for lighting and heating.

Gas is a poison used in warfare. One kind is made of mustard and smarts and another kind called tear gas is made from the juice of onions to make you cry. There is also a laughing gas.

One student who thought it was too good an opportunity to miss wrote that gas was something generated in Washington and piped out over the country through the Congressional Record and the press.

Still another lad wrote that gas was the cause of most stomachaches.

Making Turkeys Pay

YOUNG turkeys have been so difficult to raise during the last few years that the supply is deplorably short in the markets, and the prices correspondingly high, although the disease known as blackhead not being known or recognized by the average farmer. I receive many letters every month describing the symptoms of ailing turkeys, complaining of how young turkeys die off, and asking if I can tell the cause and give a remedy.

Few people realize, because the heads of the birds were not discolored, that nearly all these mysterious deaths were caused by blackhead. The name has caused people to consider it a disease affecting the head only, whereas it affects the head least, and frequently there is no trace of discoloration, even in the advanced stages of the disease.

CHAMPION BRONZE TURKEY.

Dr. Theobald Smith first ascertained that this disease, which is especially characterized by great sores in the liver and cæca, was caused by a microbe—Amœba Meleagridis. In explaining the character of the disease, he compared it to amœbic dysentery in the human subject—a disease which also attacks the large intestine and liver.

The amœba is a microscopic animal parasite capable of living within the tissues of the turkey, its host. It can grow and reproduce itself in large numbers, thereby causing irritations, destruction of the tissues and nearly always death of the invalid turkeys.

Chronic cases furnish a large variety of morbid cases, evidently caused by the inability of the tissues of the patient to overcome and reduce the irritating masses. The liver and cæcal sores are always present in recent cases, and disappear only in cases which have recovered.

The cæcum may exhibit but a minute sore, but the liver, except when nearly healed, always exhibits a large number of sores. When turkeys die after a long-continued illness, their heads, which are usually red in health, become more or less darkened. In acute cases they die so quickly, as to leave no impression as to a change of color in the head.

The majority of young poults die after a day or two of droopiness. Adults may droop longer and pass into chronic stages of the disease. Refusing to eat and standing apart are late symptoms. Starvation in chronic cases produces thinness.

When the disease in the cæcum is slight, it is doubtful if the affected birds have diarrhea, which is more or less present in other cases. In many of the older poults the droppings will be liquid, and stained orange yellow; this is the most characteristic symptom of all. Sometimes there are blackened blood clots in the droppings, indicating slight hemorrhages.

Experiments show that more than four-fifths of the young poults exposed in infected yards die before they are six weeks old. The disease has been mistakenly supposed to be one confined to older birds. It is notably a disease affecting young turkeys, but one from which the older keys do not escape. Of the one-fifth which do escape or survive an acute attack, at least ten to twenty per cent. may die, during the year, at almost any age. Examination of the organs is the only sure means of telling the cause of death.

The amœbæ are transmitted from diseased turkeys to others through the droppings, which contaminate the food with which they come in contact. It has been proved that the amœbæ may also be carried by ordinary fowl, and may be transmitted by them to turkeys in the same manner. So you see once again the importance of exercising strict cleanliness is impressed upon us country people.

About two years ago I gave our readers a summary of the work which had been conducted at the Rhode Island Experiment Station by Professor Hadley. The first point strongly emphasized was the necessity for reducing the amount of food usually given to young turkeys do not escape. Of the one-last fifteen years convinced him that the parasite which produces blackhead can only be developed in the intestines of a young bird when it has been weakened by indiscreet feeding which has clogged the bowels and rendered the tissues susceptible to attack, and that the only true method of fighting the disease is along the lines of prevention—in other words, keeping the bird's intestines in such a clean, healthy condition that the parasites have no chance to attack them. The second point is, that certain acids materially retard the growth of the parasite, so that in connection with reduced feed, sour milk is the most powerful agent in checking the development of the disease. Beyond which it is probable that beside the effect of the sour milk itself, the bacteria always present in sour milk is also beneficial to the tissues of the intestines. But Professor Hadley found that clabbered in the usual domestic way, or by any of the preparations usually sold for the purpose, does not contain sufficient acidity to be of value in fighting off the parasites. When they have once been introduced into the bird's intestines, he recommended the use of a foreign bacterium; but it is a very expensive remedy, and I believe really unnecessary, if you will take means to eradicate the sources of contagion at this season of the year, and so prevent the parasite from being in existence on your farm next spring, which would effectually prevent any chance of their being introduced into the young turkey's intestines.

As common chickens, as well as old turkeys, harbor the parasites which cause blackhead, and can be so little affected that they show no signs of ill health, though their droppings will spread the disease, it is plain that the first step in ridding the premises of the contagion is to keep turkeys and common fowls apart, and the turkeys in restricted quarters for at least some part of the year, so that it will be easy to purify and get them into good breeding condition before the mating season.

Making enclosures may seem a needless expense to most farmers, but I assure you, friend, it pays, for it makes it possible to safeguard against disease, regulate breeding, find all the eggs and control the setting period.

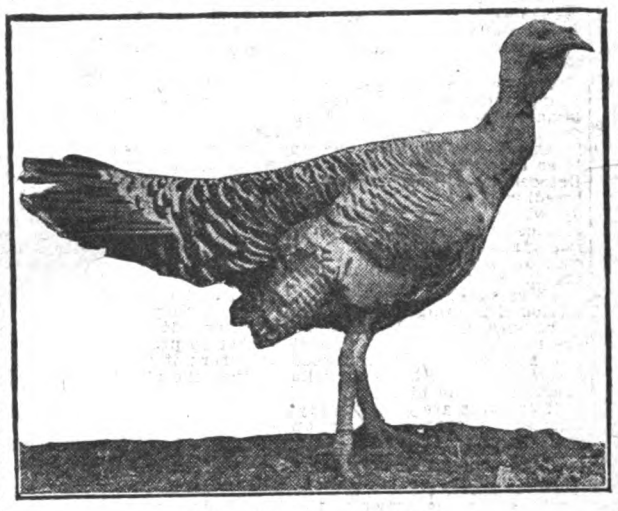
The wire around our enclosure was only four feet high. One wing of each bird was cut to prevent them flying over it. We utilized a piece of poor brush land which had good natural drainage, on which we made three enclosures of about half an acre each and one not quite so large to keep the toms in during the breeding season. A rough shelter of slabs and brush was made in each, under which perches made of sassafras poles were put up, none of them less than nine inches in circumference. This is one of the important items in fixing a place for turkeys. Being heavy, large-footed birds, they are uncomfortable, and positively suffer, if compelled to balance themselves on small perches.

Early in March half barrels were secreted among the brush in the yards so that the hens would become accustomed to their appearance and consider them safe hiding places for their eggs. About the middle of the month we commenced to keep a lookout for eggs in the half barrels and in stolen nests. When one is found it is purloined and a china egg put into its place; ditto when the second one is taken, but after that no more china eggs are dropped, as two always seemed to satisfy Mrs. Turkey, no matter how long she might go on laying. Unlike common hens, turkeys are not attracted to a nest by an egg. In fact, they retain so much of the wild nature that they will not adopt a nest that has been used by another bird; so never distribute nest eggs as decoys, but only as substitutes for those abstracted.

Now I am a strong believer in prevention rather than cure, and my advice is to take time by the forelock, and dose the birds right now. Then there will be less fear of contamination in the spring, when young birds are around. Young stock are not strong enough to withstand any strain on their vitality, and, what is more, all intestinal parasites seem to develop and mature more rapidly in young creatures than in mature stock. Young birds can be kept free if they are properly fed, unless they become contaminated by droppings from other birds. For this reason it is wisdom to purify the old birds that are strong enough to stand medicine; besides, it is easier to dose a few old birds than a lot of youngsters.

How to Condition Breeding Stock

All our stock, young and old, are given free range from about the fifteenth of June until the end of October. During that time the birds are all driven into one enclosure at night. The other three enclosures are then given a heavy top dressing of fresh lime to clean the ground and give it time to become thoroughly sweetened before they are used again. About October 15th the birds we intend to keep for breeding are confined at one end of the night enclosure by a temporary wire fence. For twelve hours they receive no food, then each one is given two tablespoonfuls of castor oil just before roosting time. The next morning, as soon as it begins to get light enough for the birds to move about, they are driven into one of the clean enclosures, where they are kept for about a month. As soon as it is quite light, and they have stopped fussing about being moved, they are given a light feed of dry grain, scratch feed, or oats and wheat mixed, and one teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium flakes are dissolved in a quart of water. After stirring thoroughly, three quarts of cold water are added, and the drinking vessels filled. They have this same mixture as a drink for the whole month, during which time they are given a mash once a week made by moistening ground corn and oats with castor oil. Besides which, they get a feed twice a day of scratch feed and mixed grain. At the end of the month they are moved into another clean yard and the yard they have been in is again dressed with fresh lime and closed up so the ground will have time to be freed from all contamination before it is used again in the spring.



After the birds are moved into the clean yard, stop the weekly oil mash and permanganate of potassium, but add fifteen grains of asafetida to each quart of drinking water one day in every week until February. Once a week give a light feed of mash—about a quart for every ten birds, and mix a generous tablespoonful of powdered rue leaves into it.

February 1st, stop all dosing; increase the amount of oats, and gradually introduce a little animal food, such as commmercial beef scraps and bone meal or fresh, lean scraps from your butcher if you can get them.

From November, when the birds are moved into the second yard, they can be given free range if there is no other poultry running at large, though personally I prefer keeping them in one enclosure until March, when we put five hens and one tom into two of the enclosures which have not been used during the winter. Then about April 1st the toms are separated from the hens and confined in a small enclosure which is divided into two yards by a wire netting of one-inch mesh. The fine netting is used for this partition to prevent the toms from picking and injuring each other's wattles, as they would do if large-sized mesh was used.

As turkey hens stop laying and become broody, they are taken out of their own yard, kept in a small wire pen for about a week, to break them up, and then put into one of the yards with a tom. After about a week they can be returned to their own yard, and will soon commence to lay again. As soon as the flock is taken out of the winter enclosure and put into the breeding yard, the winter yard should be treated with fresh lime, and left to sweeten until wanted for brood coops and baby turks.

Necessary care and feed for young turkeys I will give in one of our spring numbers.

Science Discovers Best Lice Remover

Changes Old Methods—No Dusting or Spraying—Birds Delouse Themselves. Gives Lasting Relief.

A recent discovery promises to revolutionize all methods accepted up to now for keeping poultry free from lice and mites. This wonderful lice remover keeps the birds always free without the poultry raiser doing any work. It is the simplest, easiest, surest and best method ever discovered.

Hick's Lice-Go, which is the name of this sensational lice remedy, is added to the drinking water. The medicine taken into the system of the bird comes out through the oil glands of the skin and every louse or mite leaves the body. It does not injure the hatchability or flavor of the gges or meat; is harmless to chicks and does not affect the plumage. A few days' treatment at the start and then a little in the drinking water each month.

A Trial Costs You Nothing

So confident is Mr. Hick that Hick's Lice-Go will remove every louse or mite, that he is making a special guaranteed offer of a regular full sized, double strength, $1.00 package of Lice-Go and a regular $1.00 package of Hick's Egg-Lay Tablets all for $1.00. Send $1.00 today (currency, money order, check, etc.) to Chas. M. Hick & Co., Dept. 311, 1018 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill. If you prefer, send no money, just your name and address, and pay postman $1.00 and postage on delivery. If after 30 days' trial you are not absolutely satisfied, write Mr. Hick and your money will be refunded.

J. J. R.—As the hen seems to be well, and has made the same coughing noise for some months, I should not think it could be anything serious. But it might be a good idea to dip a wing feather in a mixture of turpentine and sweet oil, push it down the windpipe, give it one or two sharp turns, and pull out quickly. She may have gapeworms, which she may not be able to discharge by coughing. I have had no experience with the lice cure you name.

H. F.—This seems another case of overfeeding, like L. C. S., answer to which please read. Have your ducks a dry sleeping place and plenty of clean bedding? Ducks make their sleeping place so damp that their bedding must be changed often or they get rheumatism. Try rubbing their shanks with equal parts of turpentine and sweet oil.

L. E. E.—Stop the mash entirely. Get commercial scratch feed, or mix cracked corn and cracked oats. Feed your chickens night and morning with this mixture, and keep a hopper filled with mash always before them. For the early baby chicks, chop up a boiled egg, shell and all, mix with a cup of stale bread-crumbs and one chopped onion. Feed two tablespoonfuls to each ten chickens once a day for the first week. For the other four feeds during the day use commercial chick food. Give sour milk in a pan for them to drink. Of course, I suppose you know that they must have nothing of any kind to eat or drink for thirty-six hours after hatching.

L. S.—We have no catalogue of stock for sale.

E.B.—You don't tell me if the chickens are young or old, or how you feed, so it is almost impossible to form any idea of the cause of the trouble. If they are mature hens, I don't think that the trouble was overfeeding, ending in apoplexy. If so, cut down on feed, omitting corn entirely, and put magnesia in the drinking water every three days for a month.

D. L.—The hen is egg bound. Hold her with the vent over a small pail of hot water for a few minutes, then insert sweet oil into the vent, and pour about a teaspoonful down her throat.

L. C. S.—This was clearly a case of killing by kindness. Ducks that are on free range should only have two meals a day after they are three weeks old, and these should be a mixture of bran and ground oats.

G. G.—Worms are one of the most common troubles in the poultry family. When only present in small numbers they don't seem to injure the birds much but unfortunately, unless checked, they multiply very rapidly, and affect the bird's health very seriously. Make a coop with wire netting instead of boards for a floor. Put in a perch and elevate the coop on legs, so that the droppings will pass through the wire mesh, out of the birds' way. Put in birds which you think are affected, in this coop, a few at a time, keep them without food all day, and late in the evening administer one tablespoonful of castor oil. In the morning, give only a light feed, and drinking water with permanganate of potassium in it. For quantity, see latter part of this month's article, at the beginning of the department, and give your whole flock the oil mash and same treatment as recommended for turkeys, stopping all medicine at least six weeks before eggs are to be used for hatching.

A. B.—Well-bred birds of the Rhode Island variety are supposed to make good broilers, but I think White Wyandottes are slightly better, especially if the market calls for broilers of from one to one and a quarter pounds. Light Brahmas are not good for broilers, though excellent, when mature, for roasters. They have large frames, and naturally don't put on flesh until they are full grown.

O. B.—Please read the beginning of the department this month.

J. O. J.—I am afraid, from the description you give of the liver and the white spots on it, that the rooster has tuberculosis. Doctoring is of little avail when the disease gets headway. The only chance is to destroy any birds which look out of condition, and then make a desperate attempt to banish the germs from the premises. Scrape and scrub, and use plenty of fresh lime in the yard or on the land where the poultry is in the habit of congregating. Remember that fresh lime will injure the poultry, so the birds should be shut up for at least three days after its use. Like blackhead, the disease is spread through the droppings, so this month's article will give you some idea of the importance of keeping the land clean.

October Garden Calendar

"WHEN the frost is on the pumpkin, and the corn is in the shock," we are all just human enough to want to enjoy the bracing autumn air and sunshine, take the old shotgun and hike off to some pond or river after the wily mallard or teal. Or is it rabbits hiding in the brush piles we are most interested in? Why, even the old doleful-faced hound knows it is fall, the time for hunting and real enjoyment.

But there are a lot of things to be done around the farm and garden, little things, perhaps, but things that are important and that cannot safely be put off until "sometime when we get around to 'em" in the future—that never comes.

The root crops, such as turnips, mangels and carrots, are ready to be dug, and the right time to do it is when the ground is fairly dry so that they will come out clean and free from dirt. Parsnips and salsify are not so important, as they are hardy fellows, but for convenience later on it is best to lift them now before the ground freezes solid. And, while we are speaking of digging the root crops, just a word about storage may be in order. Some rainy day, when we can't work outdoors, why not spend the time to advantage in the root-cellar? Whether it be in the cellar or built separate outside, it will need cleaning and perhaps a bit of repairing. Keep in mind that a clean and airy storeroom is the first big step toward successful winter storage of vegetables. Failure to remove all the old shriveled remnants of last year's hoard is sure to result in the smutting of any roots put in the same bins. Get rid of all the accumulated trash, see that ventilators are in good working order, that doors fit snugly (and are rat and mouse proof if possible). If these precautions are taken there will be little spoiling of any of the common root crops.

Cabbage, cauliflower and lettuce sown in September will be ready to transfer to cold frames toward the end of October. For those who have never made one, a cold frame is a simple construction of boards and glassed sash in which young plants are wintered over for early spring planting. Select a southern exposure; preferably one protected from the north and west by buildings. Using wide boards set on edge, form a frame wide enough to take the standard sash, the dimensions of which are five feet, nine inches by three feet and one-half inch. The frame may be made any length desired, but in multiples of three feet and one-half inch. Make the back 14 inches high, and the front six inches; this will give slope or "pitch" enough to shed rain and snow water, and will catch more winter sunlight. Place crossties or braces about six feet apart to give strength and stability. In extremely cold weather the glass should be covered with mats or old quilts, but under ordinary winter temperature the glass alone will give ample protection. Remove the snow after each heavy snowfall.

October is a good time to transplant lusty parsley plants to pots to be kept in the cellar or some other cool place for winter use; most housewives know how nice it is to have parsley always at hand for garneshing. Rhubarb and asparagus can also be set out this month, and early spring-blooming flowers should not be forgotten when a few bulbs set at this time will guarantee a fine display of color in the chilly, raw time that follows the melting of old Winter's snow.

Just one word more: Have the stoves been cleaned and made ready for use, and have the chimneys been freed of last year's soot? The time to do this necessary "chore" is now before cold weather sets in in real earnest. Not only is it necessary for efficient heating, but as a means of fire protection it should receive more attention than it usually gets, for fires in the country are more easily prevented than controlled once they break out. Just another place where "A stitch in time saves nine" holds true.

Preparing Bees for Winter

"Under normal conditions if bees have plenty of good stores and have been properly protected they will have required no special care during the earlier fall months unless it should have been necessary to stimulate brood rearing during September. Every beekeeper, however, should know what conditions are necessary for successful wintering, and he should see that they are provided, if he would have his efforts meet with success," says Prof. H. F. Wilson, apiarist of the Wisconsin College of Agriculture, who is the authority for the information we briefly summarize below.

To begin with, every colony should have a young queen less than one year old whose egg-laying period has not yet been reached. Then, if the bees show a tendency to stop brood rearing in the fall, stimulative feeding may be resorted to so that the queen may be kept laying well into October if the season is open and warm. The breeding of queens that not only produce a progeny which gather large crops of honey but that also continue egg laying late into the fall is an important question that has been but little discussed. During October plans should be made to provide plenty of good stores. At the same time the bees should be protected—the amount of protection depending upon whether or not they are to be wintered outdoors or in the cellar. If they are to be wintered outdoors it is best to provide two hive bodies for the brood chamber; if they are to be wintered in the cellar reduce the brood chamber to one hive body.

If the bees are given plenty of good stores and allowed to arrange their own brood nest, no special preparation of the hive is necessary, provided either that the bees are well packed or that the temperature of the bee cellar is kept near 50 degrees Fahrenheit. When the temperature outside the hive is between 45 and 50 degrees F. the bees move about in the hive more or less freely; and at 50 degrees F. and above, the cluster will spread itself out and the bees can regulate the ventilation according to their own needs. If the temperature is as low as 35 degrees F. moisture condenses on the cover and sides of the hive. Below 32 degrees F. this moisture forms ice whenever the warmth from the bees does not keep the temperature above the freezing point. Removing the cover and leaving the hive open at the top does not improve the condition of the bees, although condensation of moisture may not be in evidence. If the cellar temperature is in the neighborhood of 50 degrees F. it will do no harm to remove the cover, but below that point the cover should be tight in order to help conserve the warmth developed by the bees.

Removing the bottom boards or increasing the clustering space below is unnecessary except for constant temperatures of above 50 degrees F. For lower temperatures the smaller opening on the bottom board is best. Every cover should be tightly sealed and there should be sufficient stores in the hive at the beginning so that the bees will not need to be disturbed during the entire winter.

Packing Hives Outdoors

When bees are to be wintered outdoors, cases should be made and packing material provided well in advance of the time they are needed, in order that they will be on hand when cold weather sets in. Old open sheds are convenient places in which to pack the hives. No matter what method is used, windbreaks built so as to protect the hives from the north and west are essential to successful wintering, as they protect the hives from strong blizzards and drifting snows. Leaves make excellent packing material if they are raked while dry and stored in a dry place until needed.

The hives may be arranged in a variety of ways for packing. Where they set close together a great deal of work and packing material is saved, and warmth is considerably increased. Some of the best beekeepers pack as many as eight or 10 hives in one place. Occasionally single hives are packed, but this is not economical where there is more than one hive to be cared for.

A common practice among experienced apiarists in the North-Central States is to pack four hives in one case, using both straw and leaves for packing material. Four hives are set close together on a platform that is raised four inches above ground. They are then covered with tarred paper. Sides are next built around the four-hive group, allowing for a filling space of 10 inches on all sides. This space is then packed with leaves or straw. A layer of leaves or straw 12 inches thick is next placed on top on the group; over this is tacked tarred paper to make it shed water.

Some apiarists provide a two-inch slot in the side of the case for the bees to pass in and out of their winter quarters, but most experts agree that three or four holes three-fourths inch in diameter in the side of the case make a better entrance than a single slot.

Best Market Type of Hog

The large firms which run the great slaughter houses wish farmers to know that the market value of a hog depends upon the price for which his product can be sold. Consequently the hog which tops the market is the one which dresses a high proportion of the kind of pork which finds the most popular favor among consumers.

Over-finished, extremely lardy meat is too fat for the best trade. At the same time, thin, unfinished pork lacks the substance and maturity which is preferred. Moderate to good finish is most desirable and as a general thing will sell for the higher prices. Killing hogs should show smoothness, uniformity and fullness throughout. Heavy shoulders and shallow, narrow hams yield too great a proportion of bone and shank to suit the consumer. Low narrow backs cut out a pinched loin which produces a smaller amount of pork chops. Soft, wrinkled and seedy bellies never yield the trim, firm, attractive strips of bacon.

The best trade desires pork from good hogs which have been fattened at weights under 250 pounds. A 16-pound loin cuts chops weighing about one-half pound apiece. An eight- to nine-pound loin will yield four chops to the pound. Most families will pay more for a pound of pork containing four chops than for a pound containing only two. This naturally puts a premium on the lighter loins. The six- to 10-pound bacon strips carry a more popular portion of fat and lean than do the 14- to 20-pound bellies as cut from 300- to 350-pound hogs. The 10- to 14-pound hams are more nearly "family size" than is the 18- to 20-pound average.

At the packing centers pork is divided into fresh pork, four grades of smoked meat, dry salt pork, mess pork, etc., on the basis of quality and weight. These various classes are then diverted to the trade which will absorb them at the highest possible values. The hogs which produce the choice handyweight fresh cuts and the best quality of smoked meats naturally command the highest price on foot.

Sudden demand for light English sides or for lard and provisions naturally causes some variation in the kind of hog which tops the market. However, the smoothly-covered, well-finished butcher hog which weighs between 190 and 250 pounds is the one whose pork generally finds the broadest outlet at the best price and most profit.

The ideal farmer's hog must be a combination of good breeding, good feeding and good killing qualities. The coming fairs and shows will give every hog man an opportunity to see the various types and judge the best kind suited to his special needs. The most suitable type of hog should have length or "streteh" enough to be prolific; bone and size enough to feed economically; character enough to produce the more popular kinds and weights of pork.

Tanning Hides at Home

Though tanneries are equipped to make all the leather the country needs, and can make it better and cheaper than the farmer can himself, there are times when the producer of raw hides finds that the margin between the price received for the raw material and the price asked for finished leather is so great that home tanning becomes a practice worthy of serious attention. There are times when farmers in certain sections of the country can hardly give away the hides they have, yet leather in small pieces in these same localities costs $1.00 to $1.50 a pound! To help farmers meet such emergencies the United States Department of Agriculture has just issued Department Circular No. 230, "Home Tanning," which gives detailed directions for making leather for various purposes on the farm.

This circular contains explicit instructions for making bark-tanned sole and harness leather, chrome-tanned leather and alum-tanned lace leather on a small scale. It also contains valuable information relative to the usual practices, rates and methods of payment followed by tan-

Jack-O-Lantern Winks

By Peggie Poe

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

AWAY down South in Alabama, little Gingersnap, round and black, sat before the fire burning in the old grate. It was Hallowe'en night and somehow that fire made folks feel mighty comfortable and SAFE from THINGS out-of-doors where the wind was snapping the fig tree against the cabin and calling: W-O-O-O with every snap. Gingersnap's five little black pig-tails of hair bobbed about like they were afraid, and she was mighty glad that they were fastened on tight, because if they had been loose she was sure they would have been under the bed in the farthest, darkest corner, as Gingersnap felt like doing herself.

The old black cat came in and brought her speckled kitten and they sat down beside Gingersnap. The girl, the cat and the kitten sat there they did and watched the big coals gobble up the little coals, and then grandpappy ashes creep out of the smoke and snap up the red coals.

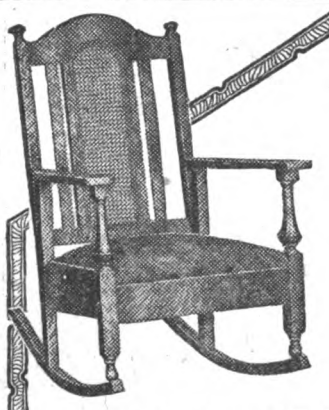
They listened to the fat yams (sweet potatoes) a sizzling in the old iron bake-pot under the hot ashes. Every so often the hair would stand up on the back of the black cat and little cold shivers would creep up and down Gingersnap's back.

All this time Gingersnap's Jack-O-Lantern sat on the little table by the window with light coming out of its fifteen snaggy teeth and two eyes. Gingersnap had made that Jack-O-Lantern herself and it had seemed a very friendly kind of a lantern out in the yard where Mister Sun was at work too, but now with a big candle in it and no light in the room and the BLACK shadows reaching into the tiniest corners and the wind acting so with the old fig tree. and old Mister Trouble with his pack sack of tears over his back, tramping down the Big Road and his dusty old brother Temptation, running up and down all the foot-paths to folks houses, it all made Gingersnap afraid of her own Jack-O-Lantern.

Just then her own comfortable Mammy Cleo came in and sat down in her squeaky hickory chair and asked Gingersnap why she didn't play with her Jack-O-Lantern.

"Oh! his face is too ugly," said Gingersnap.

"Pshaw! Honey, Jack-O-Lantern can't help that. Ever since that old witch woman made the first one, they have all looked ugly. She was so ugly herself that she made everything she looked ugly. That's why your mammy tells you to keep your face mighty sweet and smiling—'less you be like that old witch woman and turn so sour that folks won't like you.



"Oh! tell me about the first Jack-O-Lantern?" begged Gingersnap folding her feet beneath her red calico dress.

"Well, it was a long time ago. Folks in Dixie land were living that peacefully, that they would pass the cake and coffee to plum strangers except to that old witch woman, living down there, behind the cane-field all alone with her black cat, and her old broom that she was always using to sweep dirt before folks doors. Now that old woman was real happy with her spiders and her cobwebs, until one day she passed the Big House and saw the pink-and-white baby lying in its crib, right then that old woman decided that she wanted a baby exactly like the one in the Big House. She isn't asking how a nice pink baby is going to live in her old dirty cabin filled with litter, but she is so satisfied with herself she sets out to find her a baby. 'Course folks ain't going to give her their babies. They 'sic-ed' their hounds on her, but that old woman ain't to be fooled out of her 'wants'. She takes her old cat and her broom and the money in an old stocking and goes to visit that old fortune telling woman who lives in the cane-brake over by the lake. Now that fortune teller laughs when the old witch woman says she wants a nice pink fat baby, but she thinks she had better get herself some of that money in the stocking so she fools that old witch woman a plenty—she gives her a powder in a mole skin and told her to go out in the cornfield and sprinkle the powder over a pumpkin vine and then to go on and mind her own business and everybody's business, like she always does, until she heard Jack Frost coming out of the North after his mess of greens like he does every year; then the witch woman was to go to that pumpkin vine and take whatever she found there to her cabin and keep it, it was sure to make her a very suitable baby. Now the old witch woman was so pleased to get the powder that she paid the fortune telling woman a pile of money out of that stocking and hurried away to the cornfield where she sprinkled that powder over a fine pumpkin vine then she hurried home mighty anxious to hear Jack Frost coming down the road, but of course she had to wait a while; so that old witch woman went about her business, but at last Mister Crow stopped to gossip with her and he told her he had heard that Jack Frost was coming.

"Well that old woman was so anxious to get to the cornfield, that she shut the door on her cat's tail and cut half of it off. You can tell that is so, by looking at the bob-tailed cat. After she had let the cat loose she hurried away with ashes over her face. When she got to the cornfield she went to the vine where she had sprinkled the powder and there she found a big yellow pumpkin. Of course she was kind of disappointed, hoping as she had been to find a nice pink baby, but the fortune teller had told her to take home whatever she found, so she took the pumpkin under her arm and put it in her bed. Every day she would sing songs to that pumpkin and kiss it, hoping it would turn into a nice pink baby.

"Now about the time of October when the birds come down from the North that old fortune telling woman played a joke on the witch woman. She watched one day, and when the witch woman was gone she slipped into her cabin, took a knife and made a face on that pumpkin. She made it ugly like the witch woman, with long teeth, big eyes, then she covered that pumpkin up in the bed and went home. When the witch woman got home she ran to her bed to see if that pumpkin had turned into a pink baby and there was the very pattern of herself. Now that old woman having paid out her good money made herself believe that she was real satisfied that she had something different from other folks, so she took that pumpkin under her arm and goes calling about the neighborhood It ain't very long until she finds out that its head is hollow and she puts a candle in it so folks will think it is real smart and bright, then she goes about visiting with her son, which she 'done' named Jack. Course it ain't long until folks was laughing at her and all the boys was making the pumpkins into heads to look like her son and they called them Jack-O-Lanterns. After a while that old witch woman gets real mad and left the cane-brake, no one heard where she went, but all the Jack-O-Lanterns to this very day are related to that son of hers," finished Mammy Cleo taking a fat yam out of the hot coals.

"Oh! isn't that funny," laughed Gingersnap looking at her own Jack-O-Lantern, and would you believe it that old Jack-O-Lantern looked right back at her and winked its eye, for "yes"

Gate Top Mesh Purse

THIS is the new "Gate Top" mesh purse with a ten-inch wrist chain, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following much opposition as I can against such exhibits. Let all of our League do likewise. It is action in harmony with our rules and purposes. We are a Big Family and are a powerful one when we act together toward a common end. Let us strive in every way to give no pain to, and save from pain, every living creature which in its own way seeks for happiness. There are enough legetimate forms of amusement without making use of those inextricably connected with suffering for those who give us the amusement. Thanks again for your letter, Gomer.

SOUTH COULTON, N. Y.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Hello, Uncle! It's raining cats and dogs and I wonder if I dare to venture out? Maybe I can borrow Tom Thumb's boots and then I'll be "write" over. Yes, Tom says I may but I must be very careful and not get them wet. There, Uncle, I've got that far and maybe Billy will let me get farther. Don't tell Billy, but I'm dreadfully afraid of him. And say, I know Bill is good looking and all that, but that's no excuse for him—he's too hard on the flappers. I believe once upon his time in the past he had an "affaire du cœur." Thanks, Uncle Lisha, for standing up for the flappers. You're a prophet and I'll try and make your prophecy come true to the best of my ability. It's wonderful to see such faith in youth.

Don't the boys and girls give interesting descriptions of their towns? Do you know, my secret wish is that some future day I may travel and see every town and city in the state and every state, too. I'd rather see the good old U. S. A. than Europe. So many tourists see nothing of America's beauties, instead they spend their time grubbing in ruins of Europe. "America for Americans"—that's me!

Shirley Mae Smith, if you see this, I want to tell you you've a position I'm interested in. Reporting! That's a magic word. Well' here's hoping you succeed and become a star reporter.

I notice all the cousins give their writeups, so I shall follow suit: My eyes are hazel brown, complexion fair, and my hair is gold brown. I'm about five feet three or four inches short. Now I'd like to have all the boys and girls write. Please do!

Sincerely, FLORENCE WOOD.

Step in, Florence, and put your boots to dry over in the corner by the gas radiator. The wetter the day, the better it is to have cheerful company and someone who does not talk about their rheumatism and the world going to the bowwows. I mention no names, of course.

Now that you have started on your travels and got so far as Brooklyn, I hope you will keep on with your itinerant ambitions and not stop until you have covered all of the little old U. S. A. and its forty-eight stars. You can send us back stories as you go. As for travelers, there are loads of tourists who crossed to Europe this past summer, Flo. And if they wanted to grub among ruins, in addition to its regular stock of century-aged relics, Europe was able to display some special new samples lately completed and added to her line. Besides digging into these ruins, our American tourists had to dig deeply into their jeans, you may be sure. Europe owes us a lot of money, and the more she can collect from us when we voyage over there, why the easier it will be for her to pay her debts. Hotel proprietors and shopkeepers across the pond are remembering this and have made tariffs accordingly. We are not the only high tariff country, you see!

Florence, it was a delicate matter, but to settle things I asked Bill about that "affaire du cœur" you suggested in your letter. And what do you think was the result? "Uncle Lisha," said he, "you know I always avoid dogs when possible. I have found them most undiscriminating. But I do remember an affair with a cur in Kansas City who once chased me three blocks before I got my second wind." Flo, sometimes I think that for all his erudite airs, Billy does not know so much as he would like to make folks believe. At any rate, this answer of his would seem to tell us that a mastery of French is not among his accomplishments. And we are no wiser than before, you see!

RUSHVILLE, R. R. 10, IND.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Here I am back again after failing to get my first letter in print. I'm really glad, Uncle, that you did not print my first letter. I'll tell you why: In the first place it was not a very sensible letter for a boy of my age, and in the second place I said things about the "fair sex" that I was sorry for after I mailed the letter.

I will describe myself as all the cousins do: I am five feet, eight inches tall; weight 140 pounds, eyes brown, light brown hair, light complexion and I am twenty years old.

We have been readers of good old COMFORT for several years, but were not taking it at the time Uncle Charlie died, and were surprised to hear later of his death.

I live on a farm of three hundred and eighty-some acres—I don't know just how many. It is an awful hilly farm—yellow clay hills. Most farms around here are pretty level except this one. Most of the soil in this part of the state is black and seems to raise pretty good crops—corn and wheat being the main ones. There is also a good deal of long green tobacco and watermelons raised down here. Most of the farmers raise a good deal of livestock, too; hogs being the principal one. There is a farmer a mile down the road from us who is feeding between six hundred and a thousand this summer.

Uncle, I wish you and the cousins could have been down to our centennial last week, celebrating Rushville's one hundreth birthday. I know you would have enjoyed yourself. One of our bakers baked a cake weighing five hundred pounds, which was cut to feed four thousand visitors. Some cake, wasn't it?

I have been picking raspberries today and have got about four thousand briars to pick out of my hands and arms, so I will close for this time, hoping to see this letter in print. I will send Billy a big piece of raspberry pie if he will pass this letter. I would like to receive letters from some of the cousins, boys and girls both. I will answer all I can.

Your nephew, GEORGE SAGER.

George, the girls will all be glad to see you join the repentance squad, even if they can never know the fearfully cruel knocks you handed out in your first letter. When you wrote before, you were probably grouchy after climbing about that "awfully hilly farm" and getting yellow clay all over your five feet, eight and your white buckskin low shoes. Why did you ever let 'em stick you with a sticky, hilly farm, George, old boy, when all the other acres around you are black and level? Can't you swap it off somehow? I remember cradling rye once on a sidehill farm, with the thermometer 96 in the shade—only there wasn't any shade where I was. About three o'clock in the afternoon, I would have been willing to have traded that farm for a 1906 model, self-stopping Ford or a one-eared blind mule. So I know something of your troubles, you see. Anyway, if your yellow clay is good and sticky, it will prevent your crops rolling off any of the hill fields. There's no hill without some small grain, as the proverb says.

I would have been delighted to have attended Rushville's birthday, George, and eaten pieces of cake number 4,001. But Billy, the demon calculator, sniffed at that cake story of yours. He said that a 500-pound cake, cut for 4,000 people, would only mean two ounces of cake apiece. I leave you to imagine what Billy would say, or do, if anybody offered him two ounces of cake all at one time! I would not want to be around just then; I am too tender-hearted. Bill likes his cake cut with a long-handled shovel or a hay-knife. This applies to raspberry pie, too, George, if you decide to send him on a carload or two after you have the briars picked out of your raspberry hooks and the yellow clay cleaned from your white buckskins. But take my advice and trade that farm the first chance you get.

ENERGY, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND LEAGUE FOLKS:

Just an inconspicuous place in the western section of the League, please!

Isn't it strange how fickle are the fancies of human nature—or perhaps I should have said of some humans. I can remember the time, oh, some fifteen years or so ago, when I used to dream of growing up and owning a big candy store. Sure! Why not? An' every little boy an' girl would come and buy of me—and I would put just about ten times as much candy in their sacks as the store man down at the village did in mine!

Then, a few years later, when the teacher told me I had a real sweet voice for a child, and used to put me on the "program" to sing for the visitors on Friday afternoons, I began to dream of growing up and becoming a famous operatic star. But my career as a prima donna died a sudden and unannounced death one beautiful day, when I chanced to see and hear a group of Salvation Army girls on the streets of a neighboring city. So! I'd join the Salvation Army when I got old enough; that's what I'd do!

And there were other dreams—some of them fanciful and unpractical: such as being a poet (Eugene Field was playing a large part in my young life at that time); a trained nurse; but dad proceeded to put his foot down on that ambition, however; and last, but by no means least, I once aspired to the position of a millionaire's wife!

About the only thing I never dreamed of being—in fact, the vocation never did seem to "glimmer with glory" to me—was a schoolma'am; and yet that's precisely what I proceeded to turn out to be and what I am today. Although still young and good looking(?), I am not satisfied. I don't like the work. I wish I had a big cattle ranch 'way out west (with lots of cattle on it, of course), where I could hear the coyotes bark, I mean yelp, every night. Then, if I had a wild mustang pony (and knew how to ride him), and a good long lariat (and knew how to throw it), why I'd be right where I want to be! Of course I hope there would be a nice, good-looking young cowboy hidden away among the cactus somewhere, who'd come along sometime and maybe——well, I guess I'd just as well quit talking. It's nothing but another air castle, anyway, no doubt. I'll never be a cowgirl, nor an opera singer, nor a nurse—nor nothing much, maybe, but an "old maid school-teacher." But if I do change into something else, I'll come and tell you about it.

Good by. MARY A. ZSCHIESCHE.

I'm sure glad, Mary, that I have an Uncle's privilege to call you by your front name. If I didn't, I would have to wait until I had the hay fever before I would dare to address you with any hope of pronouncing your name straight.

As for "fickle fancies," the thoughts of youth are always long, long thoughts, Mary, as a poet has told us. Mounting over the distant hills of dream they go, little knowing during the happy flights of the flat dusty country that must surely be traveled in future years—sometimes over a hard road with the dream hills only fading farther and farther away in the distance of years. But this need not always be so, thanks be. For dreams have a way of coming true and air-castles often gain substantial foundations. Nothing was ever done without a dreamer in this world, and the most airy of dream castles is better than an empty corner lot—and brain!

But I'm sorry, Mary, that after you climbed so many hills of delightful fancy, you now have to plod along through what you think is unattractive country, so different from all the dream routes you had planned to travel. Yet no one who teaches need find her life empty or think her career wasted. Someone taught you, Mary, and you have it daily in your power to mould young lives and direct other youthful dreamers of dreams.

So if you never swing a lariat, astride of your cowgirl pony, or meet that good-looking cowboy among the cactus, you can still make for yourself days that "glimmer with glory" just the same. The best of light is that which shines from within. It is the art of happiest wisdom to live and not to be always looking forward to living. And sometimes, along the dustiest of roads, the most glimmery of dreams will come to meet us if we whistle as we go. Why, Mary, I used to think of myself as becoming a fat,

Makes a Family Supply of Cough Remedy

Really better than ready-made cough syrups, and saves about $2. Easily and quickly prepared.

If you combined the curative properties of every known "ready-made" cough remedy, you probably could not get as much real curative power as there is in this simple home-made cough syrup, which is easily prepared in a few minutes.

Get from any druggist 2½ ounces of Pinex, pour it into a pint bottle and fill the bottle with syrup, using either plain granulated sugar syrup, clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, as desired. The result is a full pint of really better cough syrup than you could buy ready-made for three times the money. Tastes pleasant and never spoils.

This Pinex and Syrup preparation gets right at the cause of a cough and gives almost immediate relief. It loosens the phlegm, stops the nasty throat tickle and heals the sore, irritated membranes so gently and easily that it is really astonishing.

A day's use will usually overcome the ordinary cough and for bronchitis, croup, hoarseness and bronchial asthma, there is nothing better.

Pinex is a most valuable concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract, and has been used for generations to break severe coughs.

To avoid disappointment, ask your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with full directions, and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

MY wish this month is that the past summer has been as pleasant for everyone of my girls as it has for me. Mine has been not only pleasant, but profitable for you as well, for you have been in my mind and my every action has been for your benefit. If I did something good it was because it would enable me the better to point out the right to you. If I did something not so good it was because I had to know the wrong as well as the right in order to advise against it. Isn't that a wonderful alibi? However, to relieve your dear worried minds, I've been a most proper and circumspect old thing all the time, and you needn't blush for my behavior. Just look after your own.

SARAH, Indiana.—Some women enjoy being made unhappy, and you, Sarah, appear to be one of that kind. If your first marriage terminated in a divorce, why marry again when the chances are good that the second marriage would end the same way? He is too jealous to be a good husband and divorces are expensive things.

SILVER STAR, Mich.—Personally, I don't like halfway answers. They make me hopping mad. A straightforward "Yes" or "No" is much better. If you love him say so when he asks you. If you don't love him, tell him so. You should endeavor to be kind and tactful in the latter event, but firm. Then there can be no post-mortems.

CATHARINE, Pa.—As housekeeper for your father you may have to work hard but you are assured of a home and while unmarried there is always the chance that you will meet and marry a really worth-while man. Married to the young man who spends all his money and isn't settled in his habits, you'd have to work as hard, if not harder, than at home, with no chance of bettering yourself by marriage. Next time he speaks of marriage and the fact that he wants a home, tell him you will listen to him when he has made a definite start toward saving for a home, real saving, and not the kind that deposits money in the bank one day and draws it out the next. Banks should issue toddle tops instead of bank-books to those who have a Put-and-Take system of banking. I have to watch myself carefully in that respect so I know whereof I speak.

RHODA, Missouri.—It is much worse to be unhappy in your husband's home than in your father's, as I have explained to Catharine, elsewhere in this column, so wait a while longer and believe that something good will come to you. The man who wants to marry you is too suspicious to be a very good husband.

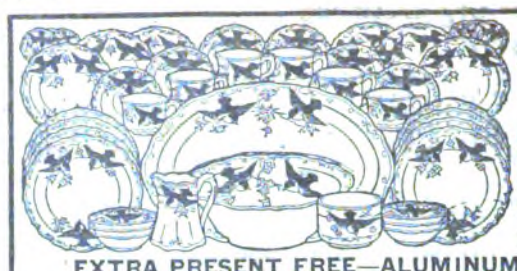
DIMPLE, Oklahoma.—If you are playing kissing games at a party you've just naturally got to kiss the boys. The moral is: Don't play kissing games.

BROWN ROSEBUD, New York.—I've been in New York and I never saw any brown rosebuds. Your sister's fiance doubtless looks upon you as a mere child and kissing you means no more to him that kissing your young brothers, as you say he does. Don't get the idea in your head that you are grown up. At fourteen you are too young to receive proposals and you should give the next letter to your father or mother and let them answer it. That ought to put a stop to future proposals.

C. B. VEHUL, Maine.—Just because a man "looks good" is no sign you'd be happy if you were married to him. In fact, I've noticed that the good-looking men are usually the most unsuccessful as husbands. I know there is something irresistible about a nice square chin, wavy hair and a general well-tailored appearance—old as I am, I fall for 'em strong—but for a husband give me one less ornamental and less selfish, though I can't really blame the handsome critters for being selfish. We women help make them that way.

WORRIED OF MISSOURI.—The young folks of today are as much of a problem to their fathers and mothers as the fathers and mothers were to their parents years ago, and, really, it is conditions and not people that have changed. Human nature is the same always. In future years the youngsters of today will be having difficulties with their children, though I am wondering "What Will the Limit Be?" You owe your aunt every respect and kindness in return for her love and care for you, and you are rather young to have a sweetheart, though there is no harm in being friendly with boys of your own age if you don't lose your head over them. If he is in the habit of accompanying you from church and entertainments he might as well call for you and take you there, and if you are with him Sunday afternoons, anyway, it is better that it should be at your own home. Include your aunt in your conversation and pleasures and carefully defer to her wishes. She may understand better then.

BOBBY, Okla.—My dear, it is not only improper but highly imprudent as well as dangerous, when returning from a dance (or anywhere else) to allow your escort to stop the car while he hugs and kisses you. However, if he does it at all it should be while the car is stopped. Not only is it more satisfactory that way but there is less danger of bumping into other osculating couples and getting broken mudguards and noses and windshields. It is much safer to refrain from love-making under such conditions and I am glad that it has never happened to you. Take care that it doesn't. (2) Bloomers or kickers, especially designed for women and girls, shouldn't be considered disgraceful when worn on appropriate occasions and a hike and picnic seems to be the time to wear them, but if knickers are not worn in Shamrock, then you were likely to be talked about. But there's lots worse things you might have done.



PETER'S DUTCH GIRL, Missouri.—Your name is most appropriate. You are likely to be in Dutch unless you devote more time to your studies and less to boys and dances. Letters like yours, and I receive a great many of them, make me feel like spanking the writers.

BETSY, Pa.—If he does not believe the untruthful stories told about you, he will continue to call as before. You don't want a half faith, I am sure, so unless he can show complete faith in you, you are better off without him. He is too young for you, anyway.

JOLLY GIRL, Ohio.—A pumpkin show must be a most romantic place. Fancy meeting your fate at one. If only there were pumpkin shows in Maine I'd never been an old maid. Won't you invite me to the next one? I think you should obey your mother. If she says you are too young for sweethearts then you are. She knows more about the date of your birth than you or I can ever know.

RUTH, Texas.—If you had meant very much to him he would have waited for you instead of consoling himself so easily with another girl, don't you think?

MAE R., Tennessee.—No, I don't think it would be right for you to marry a boy who drinks whiskey. The selfish thing! Go to high school instead.

THE PERRY G. MASON CO., 694 Culvert & 5th St., Cincinnati, O. Founded 1897.

LILLIE N., Texas.—There could be no harm in sending a birthday card to a boy friend on his birthday. I try to keep a record of the birthdates of my friends and send a card to each on their respective birthdays. I'm always glad when people remember mine provided they don't remember my age. Even when they say I don't look to be th— er, as old as I am, it hurts just the same.

GRAY EYES, St. Louis, Mo.—Your father knows men better than you do and if he objects to your boy friend kissing you, then don't let him do it any more. Fathers and mothers usually know best.

STAR, Jefferson City.—If you want to make him more conceited than he already is (if such a thing be possible) then ask him for his photograph. If I were you I wouldn't "go with him" and, thirdly, I don't think he loves you.

TROUBLED GIRLIE, N. C.—If I were in your place I'd arrange matters so my mother could meet the man in question and then abide by her opinion of him. Because the Matron said he was "worthless" doesn't necessarily make it so. Still, I can understand why a woman in charge of so many girls would use rather strong adjectives at times. Hers is a great responsibility and she doubtless feels it is better to be severe than sorry.

WALTER, S. C.—Don't depend upon your friend to "speak a good word" for you with your sweetheart. Do it yourself. You remember what happened when Miles Standish sent John Alden on such a mission to the fair Priscilla, don't you? He learned, to his sorrow, that "If you want a thing well done, you must do it yourself, you must not leave it to others. Apply it to your case. Do your own love-making. Your friend may be better looking than you are.

MRS. G. M. D., N. Mexico.—It would be better not to correspond with your ex-sweetheart though you should answer his letter. Explain kindly but firmly that you do not think it would be fair to your husband to keep up a correspondence with him and that you love your husband too much to wish to do so anyway. He had his chance and deliberately let it slip—irretrievably.

BROWN EYES, Nebraska.—Go to him in person and ask for your letters and photograph, or ask your father or mother to get them for you. In the future don't write anything that you wouldn't be willing for the world to read. This applies to everyone.

HOPELESS STRANGER, Arkansas.—Men aren't such helpless things as you imagine them to be. If he wanted to know you he would find someone to introduce him. Men possess initiative enough when they really want anything.

PEGGY, Wisc.—Shake, Peggy, I hate like the dickens to wear a hat, too, and I burn frightfully. Ask K. Booth about removing tan, but why bother with it until next winter? Have a good time this summer and let the tan take care of itself.

TROUBLED BLUE EYES, Mo.—Always, always, I've said, keep away from married men. These "handsome guys" are dangerous.

A. B., Ore.—If he persists in being cool toward you with no better reason than given in your letter, let him persist. You should manifest no concern.

I "gotta" go feed my Thanksgiving turkey now. Dieting didn't get a husband for me so 'm going to eat anything and everything I want whenever I want to. I'm not so very fat, anyway.

Hoping you are the same,
COUSIN MARION.

LOUISIANA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

My letter is to one and all and especially to Lena who has the jealous husband. This is a hard case but, as Mrs. Mullikin said, "love and kindness rule the whole world." It does not seem possible that anyone could read "Hearthroken's" letter and not profit by it.

I believe that misunderstanding has caused more heartaches than anything else. I have been married thirty-four years to as good a man as there is, I think, but we have had our troubles too. Jealousy was not the cause unless he was jealous of the children. He told me I cared more for them than I did for him and I did neglect him for them. He had cross and pouty spells that lasted most of the time. I decided he had ceased to care for me or never did. So matters went from bad to worse, and we both thought of a separation. One day he was taken very sick and I thought his days were numbered. I sat by him day and night. If I left him for a little spell he begged for me. No one could quiet him but me. Right then I awoke to the fact that I had neglected him. In my grief I cried to God to spare him. Seven years have passed and now he always comes first in my thoughts and the children second. All our children are married and in homes of their own but we are still young in our love for one another. Lena, if you love him as I love my husband you surely can sacrifice much by being silent. Let him know by your words and actions that he means the most to you and that you love him the best of anyone. He surely will be ashamed and if this does no good I would tell him I would go away until he could trust me but you will always love him and always be hoping he will come for you.

I most heartily agree with Texas Blue Bonnet about the downtrodden girl and the way the man is upheld who pulled her down.

Mrs. R. V. Long, when your boys disagree, separate them for a while. Do not let them play together. They will get tired alone.

I would like to receive letters from sisters in Arkansas.

ELIZABETH.

MICHIGAN.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have often seen inquiries as to how to bring up children and have wanted to write. In the first place, insist upon obedience. Don't sit and rock and tell a child what to do and still keep on rocking, never looking to see if they do what you tell them or not. But see that they do it. Never say "No" immediately when they ask you to go some place or for something but consider a while and see if it is expedient for them to do so. If so, let them. If you can't let them, say no and let no amount of teasing change your mind.

Now I am not an old maid who really knows what she would do; in fact, having brought up six children to manhood and womanhood, I really think I have had experience. If possible send them to bed happy. Take any other time in the twenty-four hours to find fault with them, but have a pleasant story to read to them or tell them at bedtime after they have repeated the bedtime prayer of "Now I lay me down to sleep." Try always to make them happy. Let them remember a happy childhood if it is possible. MRS. H. J. D.

LYNCHBURG, 1303 FORT AVE., VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I am a brunette of twenty-three years. My mother and father died when I was very young. I was married at the age of seventeen but have never regretted it. We have a little boy, five years of age, who is the sunshine of our home.

I wish to say to the mothers of small children that I do not approve of public work and leaving your little ones in care of someone else. I think if we do all we can to help save at home and try to do our duty to our loved ones there, as our Heavenly Father would have us do it, our reward in heaven would be much more to us than all the money we could earn. I do my sewing, washing, ironing, quilt making, soap making, housecleaning and cooking, so you see that is the way we can save money even if we don't earn it some other way. In case we should be obliged to leave our children we should leave them in the best of care.

I enjoy reading the sisters' letters and looking at so many baby pictures.

With love and best wishes to all,
MRS. JAMES DUDLEY.

AINSWORTH, NEB.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I've tried before to get a chair in your happy bunch but you didn't even look at me, and I am writing again.

I want to tell you how I made over an old room that was nearly beyond repair. You may not like my color scheme but I do. First I cleaned the room thoroughly and as the paper was broken and of several different kinds, I papered it in a deep yellow, with cream colored ceiling. The floor, woodwork and built-in cornerpiece was painted a French yellow which is a mixture between brown and yellow. After the paint was dry I moved my white enamel bedroom set in there. I had a small green and yellow bedroom rug, six by nine, that I used. At the windows I hung cream-colored curtains with big yellow roses. When I started this I was discouraged as the floor was very bad and the walls were worse, but I'm proud of it now.

As I am a young housekeeper I haven't any useful hints to offer as others have but I have made use of many that the sisters have sent to dear old COMFORT. I know Mrs. Wilkinson will read it and maybe she will fix her bedroom on the same plan.

MOLLY-O.

Molly-O.—Your sunshine room must be lovely but I'm a blonde and I'd look positively bilious in such a room, but the brunette sisters will welcome the suggestion.—Ed.

SOMEWHERE IN ARIZONA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have often thought I would like to write to COMFORT but never had anything to write about but in the March COMFORT I saw the long-looked-for Sisters' pin was really ready for us so I am ordering one right now. Would like the blue if you have plenty of them. I have another excuse for writing to you. It was requested that the sisters write of the worst fright or most thrilling experience they ever had and I sure had one. My husband and I live on a homestead in a canyon up in the mountains. It is three miles to the nearest neighbor but we have plenty of company, all kinds of wild animals and snakes. It is quite an interesting place if you are not a fraid cat. We don't have cyclones but we do have terrible sand storms and wind but we pay no attention to them, except to growl about them. Sometimes we wake with a start to hear a tub clattering over the yard but we soon go to sleep again. Pretty soon the wind changes and starts the tub in the other direction or a bucket takes a trip around the house. My husband says, "What do you mean by leaving those tubs and buckets loose in the yard?" I say, "Well, we have to have some excitement," and we are asleep again.

It is the poor, skinny range cattle that make things interesting for us sometimes. Since you don't live in Arizona, maybe you would like to know what a range cow is. They run in the pastures and on the ranges and raise their calves. If they are wild and poor and have a young calf they will raise you if you get in their path. That was what I did. My husband was away three months one winter. My niece, Jane, was staying with me and we had a lot of trouble keeping the range cattle out of our pasture. Jane, the three dogs and myself kept them chased out pretty well. But we finally got a poor, long horned one cornered. Jane went up the mountain a little way to head her off there. I was on the flat with a big club in my hand. The cow was about four hundred feet from me when I set the dogs on her. She started up the pasture but only went a few steps when she stopped and faced me. I began to look for a place of safety. My husband had told me to get behind a big mesquite bush if a wild or mad cow ever got after me. There was a mesquite near by so I soon got behind it and the cow started for that bush. She was a mad beast with the dogs on her heels and she kept coming right for me and I saw my finish. She just waded through the tough sticky bush right after me. I couldn't run, I was too frightened, and anyway she would get me before I could reach the fence. I stepped to one side as she went through the bush but to my relief the dogs were entertaining her and she looked neither to the right nor the left but went straight ahead. I think the dogs ran her out for I never saw the wretch again. Jane came down off her perch and said, "Why didn't you hit her with that club when she went by?" I said, "Not much, let her go while the going is good." It took me a few days to get over the fright. Jane and I had lots of fun and experience that winter. We would try anything once. No fear in us.

I wonder if any of the sisters have their union suits shrink or get too short in the waist? My last ones did and were very uncomfortable. I cut them in two at the waist-line. Then I took crochet cotton and crocheted a single stitch around the top half. I made four more double crochet and dropped a stitch here and there so it wouldn't be too large. I broke the thread and did the same on the lower half and joined them together. I had then a four-inch belt on my union suit and it was neat and comfortable. Sometimes I put new feet onto old stocking legs and crochet them together and there is no seam.

I am not going to leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson as this is housecleaning time and no time to answer letters.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

To remove label from pillow-slip or any piece of goods that is to be used before being washed, place a wet cloth on the wrong side and put a hot iron on it for a few minutes. Or hold over steam of teakettle and label will come off.

If tongue is burned by hot food of any kind, put butter in mouth and let it melt on burned place. This gives relief and prevents soreness.—MRS. ALICE J. Russell, East Sumner, Maine.

I have a wire basket hanging in my kitchen and I fold and lay in it all clean wrapping paper and bags. Many times they come in handy.

Scald and drain your dishes instead of wiping. This not only saves time but is more sanitary.

In my sewing-room there is a wall-pocket to hold each child's patterns. I never have to search for one.

Give each child a private place to keep its treasures.

Teach children never to say unkind words to poor children.—MRS. FLOSSIE MILLER, Benton, Ill.

Dust dry sulphur in stockings when going in deep grass or garden and the chiggers will not bother you.

To keep moths from woolen or furs, dust well with borax when folding away for the summer. Put in papers or boxes and cover tightly.

When spool of thread runs out on sewing machine, tie end of a full spool to it as soon as it leaves the spool. This saves threading machine again.—ELORA BLAETTNER, Wyaconda, Mo.

When the pattern has become worn from linoleum, paint it, giving it two coats of paint. It looks and wears well.

Use blankets, after they are much worn, for quilts. Cover with flour sacks, dyed. They make light-weight quilts and are easily laundered.—MRS. MARY DUNCAN, Jordan, Mont.

To remove mildew, make a paste of soft soap, one tablespoon powdered starch, juice of one lemon and salt.—SUNNY, Medicine Lodge, Kans.

When in need of a substitute for elastic for little girl's bloomers, etc., take an old inner tube that cannot be used any more and split lengthways. Cut rubber width desired and use same as elastic.—MRS. V. M. DEWERSE, Sperry, Okla.

Equal parts of gasolene and ammonia will remove stains from clothing. Keep away from fire.—MRS. ROBERT B. CROSBY, Salkehatchie, S. C.

To clean and shine nickel trimmings on stove, make a paste of Bon Ami and ammonia and rub with a cloth. Dampen a cloth in vinegar or coal oil and rub the body of the stove, doing this when stove is practically cold. This is easier than polishing and doesn't rub off so easily.—MRS. J. A. POISAL, Liberty, Mo.

"MARY'S SECRET"

7 miles from Lincoln Center, just off the main road, lives Mary. Mary seemed to have no young friends. She was lonesome. At the village parties, although she danced well, she was a wall flower. The boys merely said, "Where does she get her dresses?" In fact, Mary had worn the same, old fashioned party dress for three winters.

The HARVEST FESTIVAL was in full swing, when there appeared at the door, a delightful vision in a gown of Pink Crepe Georgette with Silver Tissue trimmings. It was Mary. Not the old Mary but a modern Mary. Her gown was just the right tint to harmonize beautifully with her eyes, her hair and her complexion. The lines were just right to show her well proportioned figure to the best advantage.

Rest assured, Mary was a wall flower, no longer. Her program was rapidly filled and a number of the boys had marked for the extras.

After that, Mary was lonesome no more. She had changed overnight. She always seemed to have a different dress for every occasion and her company was much sought.

One day, the sceret came out. "Why," said she, "it was simple. I found that I was out of date. I learned that although I lived on a farm, it was not necessary to be dressed out of date. I took up the wonderful Franklin Institute system of Dress Designing, Dress Making and Coat Making, learning the lessons, which are fascinating, during my spare moments. Those three delightful dresses cost less than one formerly cost. I am now making an afternoon dress for mother."

What Mary did, you can do, too. Over 13,000 women and girls have learned designing and making at their own home, during moments they would have wasted. Sign and mail the following coupon, at once—today. This two cent stamp will make you better dressed than ever at one-third the cost.

E. R., Jinks, Ky.—When and how fruit is served depends upon the meal of which it forms a part. At breakfast, it is the usual custom to serve fruit as the first portion of the repast. Grapefruit has perhaps the most popularity as a breakfast-starter in America. A half of the fruit should be placed before each guest—the fruit having previously been prepared with a sharp knife so that all segments are loosened from the skin so that they may be eaten with a spoon. Sugar is best not served on the fruit, but offered separately so that individual tastes may be pleased. Some hardy breakfasters prefer their fruit unsweetened. Oranges may be served in the same manner as grapefruit, or may be sliced in thin slices and served with powdered sugar—offered separately, as before. Apples, bananas, plums, peaches, etc., are best served whole, to be eaten and sweetened as preferred. Grapefruit may sometimes be served as the first course of a luncheon, or this or any of the other fruits mentioned may make the concluding course of a summer midday meal. At dinner, fruit is properly the last-comer. It may even take the place of a sweet course and serve as a dessert, or it may accompany cheese and coffee in the European manner of finishing off the principal meal of the day. We would all be happier and healthier if fruit, in its various forms and preparations, could be more generally substituted for the pastry and heavily-sweetened desserts too often served at the end of a full meal. (2) You may smile a word of 'Thanks" to any guest who compliments you upon the quality of the dinner you have served. No more formal expression is needed.

SUNSHINE, Colorado.—A gentleman tips his hat as a part of his bow of greeting to any lady. Your answering bow is the only necessary acknowledgment of this customary form. (2) As in greeting, a gentleman also tips his hat when leaving a lady whom he has met, or with whom he has been conversing in a car or other place. As stated in your first answer, your own bow is a correct response and the only one needed.

A BRIDE-TO-BE, Pennsylvania.—Wedding announcements are sent out as coming from the bride's parents. They are quite properly mailed to any of the groom's friends and relatives whom he may list—even though any or all of these are unknown to yourself or your parents. Any stationer from whom you may order your announcements will show you samples of the usual form used in wedding announcements. You have COMFORT's best wishes for your future happiness.

BOBBY, Ossipee, N. H.—On no occasion does a gentleman "take" a lady's arm in the same manner that custom has decreed she should take his. In crossing a street or in any crowded place, a gentleman may place his hand upon the arm of a lady with him, to lead or direct her, but he does not properly "take" her arm in the manner your question denotes. Modern custom uses little linking of arms, and woman walks independently as she has begun to do in so many ways—actually and metaphorically. We hope this settles your argument.

UNDECIDED, Summerfield, Ill.—Yes; a girl of sixteen may attend dances when accompanied by her mother. Have your "joyous good time" and let your friends be as critical as they like. If your mother approves and acts as your chaperon, there is no ground for criticism. We agree with you about the "unsightly" dances—and we call them ungraceful, too.

TEXAS BLUE BONNET.—It makes absolutely no difference who speaks first when a boy or girl who know each other meet on the street or any other place. (2) A girl "takes" a boy's arm, he never takes hers, although he may, upon occasion, grasp her arm lightly in order to offer lead or direction in a crowded or difficult situation. See above reply to Bobby, Ossipee, N. H.

LILY, Arkansas.—Most assuredly the right sort of boys will not think less of you, nor avoid you because your family may not have a generous share of this world's goods. You are right in knowing it is what you are and not what you have which sets the true standard. Those who accept any other standard of merit establish their own in so doing. Be honest yourself, keep your self-respect and you will be worthy of the respect and admiration of those whose respect and attentions are really valuable and enduring.

M. L., Ravendale, Wash.—Although there would be nothing very incorrect in your kissing your fiance farewell as you stepped on a train to leave town, yet it might be just as well to have this intimate "good by" beforehand and not in so public a place.

E. S., Bristol, S. D.—We think you should ask this girl frankly to tell you what has suddenly set her parents against you. She must know, and if she loves you and is interested in clearing up the difficulty she ought to be able to tell you what part of your conduct has proved objectionable to her family and how you should act in the future to remove this prejudice. Let her understand that you seriously care for her and that the situation troubles you. If you wish, you may ask her to marry you—but you should plan to make any engagement outlast her school term, so that she may properly finish her education. It may be that this girl's parents do not regard your attentions seriously and think you are wasting their daughter's time and interfering with her classes. A frank and manly statement on your part, both to her and to them, may clear up the whole situation. At any rate, you would have known that you acted correctly and honestly. Go ahead and speak your piece. We wish you luck.

OUR STUDENTS SAY

First Hawaiian Conservatory of Music.
Chas. P. Holland,
Dear Sir:—
I received my Guitar in good condition and am now on my ninth lesson. I am having no trouble at all, and must say that I am more than pleased with the course and the simplicity of it. Any person who will just half try will sure succeed. I have never studied music of any kind. Consequently did not know one note from another and thus far I have committed all my lessons to memory. I am in a way handicapped by the loss of the index finger of the right hand, but by little practice I found no great difficulty in playing or picking the different changes: so I say any person who has all of their fingers, with a little practice, should experience little or no difficulty by your wonderful method. I will be pleased to recommend your course to my friends.
Very respectfully,
B. R. South.

MRS. I. McD., Shickshinny, Penn.—A girl should thank any boy who courteously picks up and returns any article she has dropped. (2) When a boy and girl meet it makes no difference who is the first to speak.

A. M., Pueblo, Colo.—When your boy caller presents his box of candy, you should thank him, open it, and pass it around to those present. Older persons and your girl friends who might be of the party would be favored first with the sweets, but if only other boys were present, it would be most correct for you to offer the box first to your caller who had given it. You can empty the candy into a dish or bonboniere before offering it, if you wish, but this is not necessary as most modern candy boxes are attractive enough in themselves as containers and the contents well arranged.

MIKE, Freetown, Ind.—If a young man is introduced to a considerable group of persons at once, it is not necessary that he should shake hands and greet each of the group individually. He may acknowledge the introduction by a bow and smile given as generally as possible. (2) Should a young man be presented to a group of girls, it is well if he can bow and greet each one individually, unless the introduction is most hastily and informally made by the one responsible. Introductions nowadays mostly lapse into a simple announcing of names so that handles may be given for conversation, and this would be most particularly true of any group introduction when any other course would be slow, appear stilted, and result in holding up the party, so to speak. As a general rule, the acknowledgment of introductions, as in the case of invitations, is best governed by the circumstances and manner of the making.

A. M., Athens, Ga.—A birthday cake is always brought in with the candles lighted, to give it as festive an appearance as possible. These candles are generally blown out, with considerable fun and form, by the recipient of the natal honors. Necessarily this is done before the cake is cut and served. (2) Because the guests bring their presents to a birthday party, it would rather interfere with greetings and the duties of the host or hostess, if the gifts were opened at the time of arrival. It is best, however, that they should be opened and viewed before the party breaks up, and any appropriate time may be taken for this, depending upon the amusement program of the party. Generally speaking, immediately after the serving of refreshments would be a suitable moment for this pleasant part of the program to begin.

E. C. C., Cookeville, Tenn.—While there is a decided difference in having a young man swear at you or only having him only tell you how he has sworn at another girl, yet we think you were correct in being offended at his having used such language before you. Or rather we might say that it would almost seem best for you to remain permanently offended with any boy who would use such language in a boy-and-girl quarrel. He may not lack sense—as this other girl told him, but he certainly lacks control of his temper and has not even the elements of good manners. Yet some girls will love boys of this sort and are willing to take chances of being sworn at—so if it is you that he swears at next time, why, remember we warned you. (2) This boy should keep his arm from the back of the seat while sitting with you in church. Tell him this, if necessary.

SALLY FROM CALIFORNIA.—A girl need not rise when a boy is introduced to her. (2) You would not need to write any long or formal letter to your political friend should he win out in the next election. It would be pleasant and suitable to say: "Please take my sincere congratulations on your well-deserved success. The news pleased me so much." You could send this or any other message by wire, if you prefer. Promptness is worth much in congratulatory matters.

DON'T KNOW, Oklahoma.—It is not good manners, strictly speaking, for a boy to squeeze a girl's hand while dancing with her—but if the girl admits to being "very fond of him," she is certainly giving him some excuse for the liberty. Hand-squeezing might well be called a "sign of love," but you must remember during the squeezing that many boys hang out plenty of signs which do not mean just what they say. However, it is you who must read these signs and not us. If he is "a nice boy," as you say, the signs ought to be nice, too. Anyway we hope so for your sake.

"Tom Laughs at Strikes"

"For two years, Jane and I had been engaged. However, we held off 'the happy day' until I received my expected promotion and increased salary at the works.

"Just then business became poor, and it became necessary to close the factory and instead of a promotion, I was LAID OFF.

"I then determined to get a permanent well paid position. So I learned a trade. Jane and I then started to prepare for the wedding, when suddenly I was called out on strike.

"For four months I had been idle and my bank account had again become practically exhausted, when one day, I read a very interesting advertisement of the Franklin Institute, telling how easy it was to get U. S. Government positions. I immediately took up their system of training and last week received my appointment as Railway Mail Clerk.

"This is a steady job, at last. Strikes or layoffs are unknown in this service. I get $1600 the first year, and steady, sure raise until within five years I will draw $2300 a year.

"The day after getting my appointment, Jane and I decided on the 12th of next month, as we will now have nothing more to upset our plans. We have the Franklin Institute to thank."

What Tom did, you also can do. Hundreds of young men have taken up the Franklin Institute courses and have been successful. You cannot afford to go on without knowing fully regarding these courses. Just fill in the coupon and mail it today—at once.

Tobacco for Worms

WE have been asked whether tobacco mixed with salt is of any real value as a preventive or destroyer of intestinal worms in lambs and sheep. The evidence on this subject is somewhat conflicting, but we consider it safe and correct to state that a mixture of one part of powdered tobacco leaves and two parts of salt kept constantly before the sheep tends to lessen worm infestation. We think, however, that more good will be done by allowing free access at all times to the Wisconsin "lick" for sheep, composed of salt, 280 parts; dried sulphate of iron, 16 parts; powdered wood charcoal, 12 parts, and flowers of sulphur, eight parts. The better way to give tobacco as a worm destroyer, as recently proposed, is to add it to the bluestone solution which has, of recent years, proved so deadly to stomach worms. The new formula is as follows: Dissolve eight ounces of pure sulphate of copper in two gallons of hot water, then stir in a tea made of eight ounces of snuff or finely-powdered tobacco leaves steeped in half a gallon or more of hot water overnight. Strain the mixture and then add enough water to make five gallons. The doses are the same as for the original one per cent. solution of bluestone, viz., one and one-half ounces for a lamb, and from that dose up, according to age and size of animal, with three and one-half ounces as the dose for an adult sheep. The medicine is given after withholding feed for 24 hours, unless in the case of very weak lambs, and should be repeated in 10 days and again once or twice during the season.

Tobacco, in California experiments, has also proved effective for the expulsion of roundworms from poultry. Finely powdered and added to dry mash in the proportion of one pound of tobacco to 50 pounds of mash and fed daily for two or three weeks it gives good results. A single dose of one pound of tobacco dust in dry mash for each 100 birds also proved effective. The experiments indicate that it can be safely fed daily in the proportion of one pound of tobacco to 50 pounds of mash, from the time the chicks are 70 days old, and for periods of 3 days, with an interval of 20 to 30 days. Oil of chenopodium also proved effective for expelling these parasites when mixed with moist mash and used at the rate of one teaspoonful for each 12 birds.

BRONCHITIS.—I have a collie dog, ten months old, that had a distemper which left her with a rattling in her throat. She coughs as though she were choked.
J. W. D.

A.—You will find glyco-heroin effective for this form of chronic bronchitis following distemper. It may be bought at any up-to-date drug store and the dose is one teaspoonful as often as seems to be necessary. If you cannot buy the medicine mentioned, give any simple cough syrup suitable for a child. The druggist can supply that.

HARD MILKER.—Last year I bought a cow that had just had her second calf. She is quite a hard milker, especially in her back teats and it takes all my strength and the milk flows in a small stream. What is the cause, and cure if any?
MRS. F. N.

A.—The openings in the teats are abnormally small or may be partially obstructed by warty growths which a veterinarian could remove with a special instrument. He might also dilate or stretch the ducts by means of a dilator of glove-stretcher pattern which is introduced several times daily and opened wider and wider daily until the milk flows freely when the teats are manipulated in the usual way at milking time. Teat plugs or dilators may also be whittled out of a piece of flattened lead pipe and tied in the teats between milking times. Such instruments may be bought of any dealer in veterinary supplies or of a mail-order house. In obstinate cases the veterinarian cuts down through the obstruction or stricture in four different directions, with a teat slitter or bistoury. Then some milk should frequently be stripped out during the healing process.

STRONG MILK.—I wish to know regarding the milk we have in the hot weather during the last half of July and in August. I have had trouble for a number of years and have sold different cows thinking they may have been the cause, but it is the same thing over again with other cows. The trouble is this: The milk has a rank odor, is very offensive and butter churned from this cream tastes much as the milk smells, not being fit for use. The cream seems like clabbered cream, even on sweet milk, and as soon as cream is lifted, or milk stirred in, the odor leaves to some extent. I have washed all vessels, first with cold water, then with hot, also use soda in hot water at times, then rinse with cool water. I have tried different ways of keeping the milk but the results are the same; have lifted the lids on crocks that air might circulate and it is not quite so bad; have changed pastures, thinking it might be something eaten by them. It comes about the same time every year and it isn't always the hottest weather when we have the trouble.
A. B.

A.—Bacteria germs are the probable cause of the abnormal condition of the milk and cream, but it is also possible that the warm milk is absorbing taints in the stable or elsewhere. In hot weather, cows standing in a pond, creek or stagnant water, or wading or lying in mud or filth may acquire bacteria which contaminate their milk. It will be necessary to immerse all milk utensils in boiling water containing a washing powder or an ounce of hypochlorite of soda per gallon. Do not wipe the utensils after washing but simply dry them in the sun. So far as possible, keep the cows away from ponds and other watering place and see that the drinking water and that used for washing the utensils is pure. The milk should be cooled and aired as quickly as possible after milking. Ice might help. You might try skimming the new milk with a hand separator.

FITS.—Please tell me what is the matter with my dog. When I unchain him he will run and bark and when he gets hot he will fall over on his side and kick as if he were dying. He is eight months old and a good hunter. He is all right when chained. Is there a cure?
L. C. T.

A.—Excitement induces the fits or convulsions. It would be better to let the dog have plenty of exercise instead of keeping him closely chained. Run an overhead smooth wire from one tree or post to another one at a distance. Put a large light ring on the wire and into it snap a hook from a light chain running to the dog's neck-strap. This will allow him to run back and forward the length of the wire. As worms often induce fits, treat the dog for them as follows: Withhold food for 24 hours, then give one dram of fluid extract of male shield fern and 20 grains of powdered areca nut in one tablespoonful of simple syrup for every 25 pounds of body weight. Repeat the treatment in four or five days. Burn the droppings.

MANGE OF CAT.—I have a cat, eight years old. He has sores on his head, back and front legs, the hair coming out where the sores have been. What will cure him?
M. M. H.

A.—The skin disease described may be a form of eczema but is much more likely true parasitic mange. Clip the hair from the affected parts and wash the skin clean with green soap and hot water, removing all scabs and scales. When dry, rub in some compound sulphur which, with the soap, you can buy at the drug store. Repeat the application as often as found necessary. Put a cap of strong cloth on the cat's head to protect it against scratching. Feed milk that is 12 hours old and skim it before feeding. Make cat live outdoors as much as possible and forage for a living. Kerosene rubbed into affected skin sometimes proves effective. Only treat a small part at one time.

BLOOD IN MILK.—The first time my cow freshened she gave bloody milk out of one of her back teats; at the second freshening she gave bloody milk out of the teat. There seem to be little bunches in her udder.

A.—As there are lumps in the udder, you should have the cow tested with tuberculin for tuberculosis is sometimes the cause of that condition. If the disease is present the milk is dangerous for use and the cow should be disposed of in the manner suggested by veterinarian who applies the test. Growths in the teat, not due to tuberculosis, often bleed from irritation at milking time but that does not unfit the milk for the feeding of a calf. The growths may be removed when at or very close to the opening of the teat but not when high up. If the cow is not tuberculous and has not had garget her milk may soon clear up, but it would be well to have her tested. Indeed, every dairy cow should be tested with tuberculin to make sure that her milk is safe for use.

AILING COW.—I have a cow six years old that freshened last January and now has lost the use of her hind parts and gives very little milk. Please tell me what to do.
MRS. E. J. A.

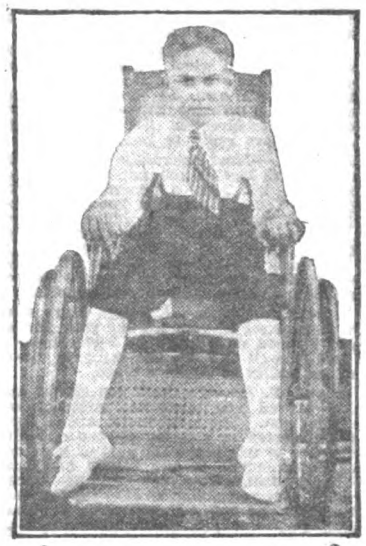
A.—If you mean that the cow has gone down paralyzed and cannot stand when raised it is quite unlikely that treatment will succeed. A cow may become paralyzed from lightning shock, from semi-starvation, from prolonged constipation or from any chronic disease causing weakness, emaciation and affecting the brain or spinal cord. In some supposed cases of paralysis examination shows that fracture of a bone is the cause. We cannot assign the exact cause in this case without making a personal examination. Therefore it would be well to employ the local graduate veterinarian if the value of the cow warrants going to that expense.

COUGHING MULE.—I have a mule four years old, and when working she has a hacking cough and seems thick winded. I feed fodder corn and oats.
WILLIAM.

A.—If you notice when standing behind the mule that there is a double bellows-like or heaving motion of the flanks and if she also passes gas from the rectum when she coughs, heaves is the cause. That disease is incurable when confirmed but the distress may be relieved by mixing in each feed a teaspoonful of a mixture of equal quantities, by weight, of powdered stramonium leaves and chlorid of ammonia. Let her live on grass in summer and in winter feed oat straw or oat sheaves and corn stover instead of sheaves. Also feed oats and bran in summer and winter if she has to work. Wet all feed with lime-water. Have her teeth attended to by a veterinarian.

FITS.—I have a young dog that has spells of running and barking as though he were mad. Some days they come on him, and he can't run, he just works his feet as if he were running. He seems to suffer.
E. E. C.

A.—Intestinal worms probably cause the fits. To destroy them withhold feed for 24 hours and then give the dog, for every 25 pounds of body weight, one dram of oil of male shield fern and 20 grains of powdered areca nut in a tablespoonful of simple syrup and repeat the treatment in four or five days. Burn the droppings.



Three Wheel Chairs in September

653 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

It is gratifying to note such a substantial gain in the results of our Wheel-Chair Department as compared with those reported for the previous month; it indicates that we are again getting into the swing of our usual fall pace.

The three September wheel chairs go to Miss Bertha Amelia Adair, Minden, Nebr., 170; George Orendorff, Grant, Okla., 114; Mrs. Zonie T. Peacher, 2709 Tampa St., Tampa, Florida, 75. The figures following their respective names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by these recipients or by their friends for them.

Miss Bertha Amelia Adair, age 20, has been a cripple all her life, due to dropsy of the brain.

HERMAN ROGERS ENJOYING HIS WHEEL CHAIR.

She cannot walk and has no use of her right hand. She has a wonderful memory and spends most of her time in reading, as she is unable to sew or do any kind of work. She suffers severely from nervousness and her friends express their belief that "the comfort of this wheel chair will benefit her health by enabling her to get out of doors."

George Orendorff, age 10, for three years has been afflicted with a very distressing form of rheumatism which has so crippled him that for the past ten months he has not been able to walk.

Mrs. Zonie T. Peacher, age 50, mother of eleven children, has been a long time confined to her bed by milk leg following childbirth. Her friend writes that Mrs. Peacher is a great sufferer and that this wheel chair will mean some sunshine in her dreary life.

You will be interested in the two pictures of Herman Rogers and Amy Belle Singer reproduced here and in the letters of thanks which accompany them.

My good friends, I hope you will continue to push forward the noble work of our Wheel-Chair Club.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT,
Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

COMFORT Wheel Chair a Great Help to Crippled Boy and to Those Who Have the Care of Him

Cave City, Ark.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

We have received the wheel chair for Herman Rogers and are truly thankful to you and our many friends for kindness in helping us to obtain it. I enclose a picture of Herman enjoying his wheel chair which is a great help to him and to those who have to wait on him.

Sincerely your friend,
Mrs. John C. Rogers.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address, The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MISS A. T., Commerce, Texas.—Your "bad breath" can be benefited by having your teeth cleaned and washing out the mouth with Dobell's solution several times a day. Of course you must regulate the bowels and avoid sweets of all kinds or any foods that seem to disagree with you.

MRS. W. R. C., Dubuque, Iowa.—The "shoulder pains" are of neuralgic origin. Apply Sloan's liniment to the parts, and take a five-grain tablet of salicylate of sodium after meals. Avoid sweets of all kinds and keep the bowels open.

MISS E. M. A., Morehead, N. C.—Your condition may be a pigmentation due to heredity. Apply to the brown spot once, in one or two weeks, white precipitate ointment. This ointment must not be used too often as it is poisonous and may cause salivation.

MRS. R. C. L., Norris, South Dak.—You have inflammation of the bladder. You better consult your family physician and have him wash out the bladder with a teaspoonful of saturated solution of permanganate of potassium dissolved in a pint of hot water. Have the bladder irrigated every day. Take also, after meals, a five-grain tablet of urotropin. You must also drink plenty of good spring water, or rain water. Your husband's headache does not come from the hemorrhoidal condition, but rather both conditions come from a congested liver. Have him take a teaspoonful of phosphate of sodium, well diluted, before his meals. He should also avoid sweets of all kinds, including pastries. He should also drink plenty of water, as suggested in your case.

MRS. S. G. V., Ripon, Calif.—You should have an examination. You may have intra-uterine granulations which need to be curetted and gotten rid of in this way. You might, at the same time, take a tablespoonful of Basham's mixture, well diluted, after meals as a tonic. The condition of the mouth is also due to a run-down condition. Touch the "mucous spots" with an alum-stick and rinse the mouth out with Dobell's solution three or four times a day.

MR. A. E. A., Monroe, Pa.—Ulcers on the inside of the mouth are due to some infection. Touch them with an alum stick and rinse the mouth out with Dobell's solution. Have your teeth cleaned and use good tooth-paste to keep them clean.

MISS N. C., Fairfax, Ga.—For your asthma, avoid the use of snuff in any form. Take, internally, respirazone in teaspoonful doses three times a day after meals. Your teeth have nothing directly to do with the asthmatic condition.

MRS. O. P. L., Adams, North Dak.—For "poison ivy," the best-known remedy is fluid extract of grandelia robusta. Use it diluted—about one teaspoonful of the drug to four ounces of water.

MRS. I. R., Mt. Vernon, Ky.—Chronic colitis can only be relieved by the use of high-up saline enemas. You should also keep the bowels free by the use of teaspoonful doses of fluid extract of cascara sagrada at night. Diet must be confined to pasteurized milk. Avoid sweets.

MRS. J. A. C., Myrtle Creek, Ark.—You should take, for your kidney and bladder condition, a five-grain tablet of urotropin after meals. The baby should have some lime-water added to his diet—about a teaspoonful three times a day—to make bone and build him up.

MISS N. T., Westernport, Md.—Probably some good tonic would prick up your appetite and, indirectly, cause you to put on flesh. Try Basham's mixture, in tablespoonful doses well diluted after meals.

MRS. L. B., Irvington, Ill.—Take one-sixtieth grain of strychnia sulph. after meals.

Remit the $3 you collect and we will send you this 350-shot Air Rifle. This is a wonderful offer.

C. M. THOMAS, 337 W. Madison Street, 10 D 5, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, U. S. A.

Complete Crochet Outfit Given

THIS offer is for the woman and girl who "loves her crocheting" and insists upon having the best of everything to work with. In this outfit we give you any desired quantity of Dexter Cordonnette "Silko" crochet and tatting cotton, and three of the highest grade crochet needles. There is no better crochet and tatting cotton than Dexter "Silko"—a fact already known to thousands of our women readers. It is made of the best Sea Island cotton with a twist that makes it lie flat, is highly mercerized and actually improves with washing. It is smooth to the fingers and will not kink. With Dexter "Silko," crocheting is more easily done—and the finished pieces are far more beautiful and useful than if made with cheaper grade cotton. Dexter "Silko" for crocheting comes in all the popular colors—white, ecru, pink, rose pink, light blue, delph blue, king blue, sapphire and sea green, and in sizes 3, 10, 30, 50 and 70. The tatting cotton comes in the same colors and of the size always used for this work.

The three steel crochet needles are the finest made, 5 inches long, nickel plated, perfectly formed and balanced, with flattened finger hold, and a nickel cap that slips on over the end, protecting it when not in use. This cap also prevents the sharp point from doing any damage when carried in the pocket, handbag or work basket. We give you three different sizes of needles—8, 10 and 12.

We believe that our crochet workers will appreciate this offer, as it means a considerable saving to be able to secure such an outfit as this without expense. We will send you this complete outfit, also additional quantities of the crochet and tatting cotton free upon the terms of the following special offers.

Offer No. 8563. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the three crochet needles, one ball of Dexter "Silko" crochet cotton and three balls of Dexter "Silko" tatting cotton free by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give color and size wanted. Reward No. 8563.

Offer No. 8251. We will furnish you with extra balls of the crochet cotton at the rate of two balls for one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, sent by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give color and size wanted. Reward No. 8251.

Offer No. 8261. We will furnish you with extra balls of the tatting cotton at the rate of four balls for one one-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, sent by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Reward No. 8261.

See The Wonders Of War Through The Pan-Chro Scope

FEW of us will ever travel to Europe and there, with our own eyes, view the actual scenes of the mightiest conflict in history. But you can see them through the Pan-Chro Scope, which is almost as good. The Pan-Chro Scope is a new invention—something like the stereoscope—fitted with twin-stereo lens of wonderful magnifying power. With this Scope we send you 48 different War Views, taken with the camera. You place the View in the Scope, and immediately you find yourself face to face with an astonishingly life-like scene that resembles a section of a moving-picture film. First you are aboard an American warship—next you are looking into a trench "somewhere in France," then you are among the barbed wire entanglements in "No Man's Land," again you are watching house-to-house fighting in a captured French town, and many other scenes of actual warfare just as interesting and exciting—48 of them in all. The different views take you direct to Belgium, France or wherever the place may be and show you the scenes almost as plainly as though you were there yourself. This Pan-Chro Scope and Views is one of the most wonderful souvenirs of the great war yet produced. Everybody is fascinated with it—men, women, boys and girls alike. We have but a few left—but you can feel sure of getting one if your order is mailed at once.

CLUB OFFER. We will send you this Pan-Chro Scope with 48 all different War Views free and prepaid for three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each. Reward No. 8833.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

L. R., Kansas.—We do not think that marriages between first cousins are prohibited by the laws of Colorado.

MRS. M. V. W., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of an unmarried man, leaving no will, and leaving no descendant and no parent, his real estate would be inherited by his collateral relatives capable of inheriting, whether of the paternal or maternal line, the inheritance going to such of the collateral relatives being of the blood of the first purchaser, but where the person last seized is the first purchaser, or the blood of such purchaser is extinct, collateral relatives of the half blood shall inherit equally with those of the whole blood and the degree of relationship shall be computed according to the rules of the common law.

MRS. H. W. F., California.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the property of the man who died was subject to a mortgage, the holder of the mortgage could enforce his lien against the property covered by the mortgage before there would be any distribution of the estate among the heirs.

MRS. J. B., Georgia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children not exceeding five in number, the widow would share in the estate equally with the children, but if the shares exceed five in number the surviving widow takes one-fifth. We think the widow's share in the estate as well as any other property she may own would be liable for her debts, except that, of course, she would be entitled to the exemptions from execution, as provided by law.

MRS. S. T. B., Louisiana.—Upon your statements, we think you should have an examination of the records made in order to determine whether your father transferred the property you mention to the company you mention, and in order to determine just where the title to this property now stands and in order to determine whether the statute of limitations has run against any right you may have in the property.

X. X. X., South Carolina.—We can form no opinion as to whether your husband has a vested interest in fee in the property you mention without an examination of the instrument through which he received his title, but if he has absolute title to the property, we think he can sell same if he so desires, and that he can, by will, disinherit any or all of his children.

J. A. S., Pennsylvania.—If the man you mention continues to threaten you without any justification, we think you should make a complaint against him before some justice of the peace or local magistrate.

E. W., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it will be necessary for you to obtain the consent of your local authorities before opening up the street for the purpose of fixing your drain.

MRS. E. S., Alabama.—We do not think you can now recover any part of the estate left your ancestor in England if your ancestors have neglected to prosecute their claim to same for a period of one hundred years.

MRS. I. J. P., Pennsylvania.—We do not think the amount involved would justify you in going to the expense of a litigation against the Company in Illinois employed by you to repair the burner to your flatiron.

C. W. G., Pennsylvania.—We think that if there is no provision in your divorce decree providing for the support of your children by the wife from whom you procured a divorce, and if there is no court order in existence providing for the method of their support, your former wife would have no claim upon you for their support, if they refused to live in a suitable home provided for them by you.

MRS. B. N. M., Indiana.—We think that if the man you mention circulated a malicious slander, without justification, against the young woman you mention, he would be liable for damages in the proper slander action brought for the recovery of same.

E. B., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your father had a legal right to sell his real estate and that the signature of his children to the deed was not necessary for the conveyance of good title to the property; we think it would have been necessary for your mother to have survived your father to have acquired any vested interest in the property if the property stood in your father's name.

F. W., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that any person of sound mind, not being under twenty-one years of age, may by will dispose of his or her real or personal property, provided the will is legally drawn and executed, and provided the testator is not under undue influence at the time of making the will, but in the case you submit, if as you state, the contest has been decided by the court and the will upheld, we think that your only chance of defeating the will would be through an appeal to a higher court, provided the facts as shown by the evidence on the trial would justify the expense of such an appeal.

MRS. M. P., Alabama.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the wife's title to real estate, owned by her and standing in her name, is not affected by her husband's death, but would remain as before her property; we think such property as the husband may himself own would descend or be distributed as his estate in a manner depending upon whether he left a will, and if he left no will, depending upon who was left to inherit from him.

MRS. L. A., Arkansas.—We do not think you can now recover any part of your grandfather's estate if you have failed to prosecute your claim for a period of forty-one years.

MRS. C. F., Wisconsin.—We do not think that the failure to join hands at the time of the performance of a marriage ceremony would invalidate the marriage.

MRS. C. F., Ohio.—We think the holder of the mortgage you mention has a legal right to foreclose same upon the default of any payment as provided in said mortgage.

H. W., Pennsylvania.—We do not think that the laws of Alabama, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas or Washington prohibit marriages between first cousins. (2) We think the consent of parents is necessary for the marriage of females under 18 years of age in the above named states except Kentucky and Rhode Island where such consent should be procured if the female is under 21 years of age.

MRS. M. E. B., West Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of your husband, leaving no will and leaving children surviving him, you would be entitled to dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, and one-third of his personal estate, absolutely, after payment of debts and expenses. (2) We do not think your children by a former marriage will have any interest in your husband's estate, unless some provision is made for them by will. (3) We think the widows of Civil War veterans who fought on the Union side are entitled to a pension from the U. S. Government upon the death of the husband, provided the proper application is made for such pension.

Reader Takes Newer Form of Iron—Feels Years Younger

"Six weeks ago I saw a special offer in the paper telling how thousands of people grow old in looks and energy long before they are really old in years, because, as examinations by physicians have shown, an enormous number of people do not have enough iron in their blood. I have been taking the newer form of iron known as Nuxated Iron for two weeks: the results are simply astounding. The roses have come back in my lips and cheeks, and I can conscientiously say that I feel ten years younger."

The above is a typically hypothetical case showing the results that have been achieved by a great many people since we started this "satisfaction or money back" offer on Nuxated Iron. We will make you the same guarantee. If, after taking the two weeks' treatment of Nuxated Iron, you do not feel and look years younger, we will promptly refund your money. For sale by all druggists.

The Modern Farmer

neries making a business of tanning small lots of hides for farmers. It is the custom among some tanners to tan hides for farmers on a "50-50" basis—that is, the farmer sends in a hide and gets back one-half of it made up into leather, usually paying the shipping charges both ways. A list of tanneries that will tan one or more hides for farmers may be obtained from the Bureau of Chemistry, U. S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

In addition to this new circular, the department now has ready for distribution bulletins on every step in the handling of hides from the skinning of the animal to the care of the leather in the finished article, such as harness, belts, boots and shoes. Farmers' Bulletin No. 1055, "Country Hides and Skins; Skinning, Curing and Marketing," has recently been revised and reprinted for the third time. It tells how to perform these operations in the most efficient manner. In Farmers' Bulletin No. 1183, "The Care of Leather," also revised and reprinted, directions are given for making leather last longer. Any, or all, of these bulletins, including the new circular, may be obtained free by writing the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Sweet Potato Seed Selection Important

Perhaps the most important factor in successful sweet potato production, next to the selection of a variety suited to the locality, is the selectfon of seed stock, but it is a sadly neglected practice. While field selection of seed corn is quite generally followed throughout the South, selection of sweet potato seed at digging time in the field is a very rare practice. It is a practice, however, which must come into general use if the Southern producer of this valuable crop ever expects to maintain profitable production. As in corn, the individual plant, or hill, forms the basis of selection. The seed should be saved from fields free from disease, and preferably from land on which sweet potatoes have not been grown formerly. A disease-free crop can be best obtained by planting disease-free cuttings on new land.

An ideal hill from which seed should be saved would have the following characteristics: freedom from black rot, stem rot and scurf; high production of marketable-size potatoes; trueness to variety type. In saving seed from such hills, it is best to dig by hand; in this way the hills can readily be kept separate, and each judged separately. Test each hill by splitting the stems, discarding those whose stems are streaked with black inside. This method is being followed by the Mississippi Agricultural Experiment Station, as well as by truck farmers who find it practicable even where large acreages are to be planted. It is certain that if the potato growers expect to produce large yields of the type of potatoes demanded on the market, they will have to adopt the method of hill selection.

As a regular practice for systematic seed selection, a small patch of potatoes should be planted each year, grown from vines only, and in a location where potatoes have not been grown for at least four years previous. From this planting potatoes from the best hills only should be saved, handling very carefully at digging time to avoid bruising, and placed in well-ventilated crates for storage through the winter. These crates should be plainly marked so that they will not be mixed or confused with the field run crop. In judging a hill for its production of marketable-size potatoes refer to the tables of U. S. Market Grades obtainable upon request from the Federal Department.

Another Serious Insect Pest

The rapid spread of the pea moth in the pea-canning regions of Wisconsin is causing grave apprehension on the part of both farmers and canning companies, as well as others engaged in the production of dried peas. In fact the spread has been so rapid as to threaten the future of peas as a commercial crop. Already the acreage is being reduced. In 1909 there were 78,000 acres of dried peas grown; in 1919 this had decreased to 66,000 acres; in 1921 it had dropped still lower to 56,000 acres!

At present the pea moth is confined to the northeastern counties of Wisconsin, and it is hoped that its sprad throughout the state and to adjoining states will be prevented. Actual counts made showed that from 10 to 50 out of every 100 pods examined were injured by the pea moth larvæ.

For some time it was feared that little could be done to combat this serious pest, but now entomologists feel confident that it may be checked if pea growers will only cooperate in following the preventive measures outlined. None of the spray mixtures has much effect on the moth or larva, and as yet no successful trap has been devised. The most effective method of control yet attempted is to allow neither the adults nor larvæ food or shelter. The following methods of control recommended by Prof. C. L. Fluke, of the Wisconsin College of Agriculture, have proved satisfactory in extensive tests:

1. Select the best early maturing varieties of peas.
2. Plant as early as possible in the spring.
3. Thrash the peas as soon as possible after harvesting.
4. Burn every bit of straw after thrashing.
5. Bury the larvæ by deep fall plowing.
6. Never plant peas twice in succession in the same or even in adjoining fields. Rotate the crop.

New Lime-Sulphur Formula

A simpler method of making lime-sulphur for spraying trees has been worked out by Prof. G. C. Starcher, formerly at the Virginia Agricultural College, but now at the Alabama Agricultural College.

In the new formula hydrated lime is used instead of rock lime, and boiling water furnishes the heat. Results are the same, and there is much less of the objectionable sediment that caused difficulty in using the old sort of spray.

To make lime-sulphur in the new way, use 10 pounds of hydrated lime, eight pounds of sulphur, eight gallons of boiling water. Mix the lime and sulphur dry and sift through a piece of ordinary window screen having 16 meshes to the square inch. When mixed and sifted, add the boiling water and stir for five minutes. Then add the remainder of the eight gallons of boiling water, mixing or stirring as the water is added. Strain the mixture into the sprayer tank, and dilute with cold water to make 50 gallons.

Unlike in the old plan, no heat is used under the vessel in which the material is made. This new solution is what might well be called "boiled lime-sulphur"—which has not been boiled at all, however. But according to Prof. Starcher and others who have tried it, it surely does the work, and is a lot easier to make. Before making his important discovery known, Prof. Starcher experimented with it and used it extensively for a period of five years.

How Tuberculosis Spreads

In an attempt to discover the true reasons for the spread of tuberculosis among dairy stock, the United States Department of Agriculture recently conducted a thorough and careful investigation. Here are the chief reasons found. How many of the twelve causes of the spread of tuberculosis summed up below do you violate?

1. Unrestricted range or common pasture.
2. Common drinking pool or trough.
3. Introduction into herd of untested cattle.
4. Nosing of cattle at fence lines.
5. Close, foul housing in unventilated stables.
6. Milk of infected animals fed to calves and hogs.
7. Trading of untested animals.
9. Dead animals eaten by dogs or hogs.
9. Breachy stock and poor fences.
10. Breeding to a common bull.
11. Serving cows outside the herd.
12. Conditions unfavorable to health, as drafty dark barns and underfeeding.

Crowing Christmas Trees

The idea of growing Christmas trees on a commercial scale for market is by no means new, but with the rapid diminishing of the "wild" trees and the steady increase in price due to this cause, the production of these necessary Christmas ornaments that mean so much to the hearts of our little ones should receive more than passing consideration from farmers who are situated in regions where these trees will grow well and profitably.

European farmers have been producing groves of Christmas trees for years, thereby making a comfortable income. In this country hundreds of farmers are already growing them, and the idea is steadily spreading, for there is considerable profit in supplying trees of the right size and kind for the winter market. Trees four to five years old sell for around a dollar. They require but little care after planting if they are given a good start. Perhaps the commonest cause of failure in transplanting young evergreens is the failure to keep the roots covered and well watered during the planting process. This is due to the fact that all of the evergreens have a resinous sap; this congeals quickly on exposure to air, and once congealed the trees soon die. If the roots are kept well watered, and if the planting job is done quickly, using plenty water throughout and following the operation, there is no reason why transplanting should not be successful, however.

The commonest and most desirable tree to plant for the purpose is the Norway spruce. This tree does best if planted in rows three feet apart and three feet apart in rows. Cultivate the trees every week or ten days the first season. In three years the trees will grow to a height of from two to five feet, depending on the soil, moisture and climatic conditions. They will then be ready for sale. In cutting or digging take alternate trees; those left will bring a better price the next year, as they will grow rapidly.

Poison Baits for Farm Pests

Farm pests can usually be controlled if the remedy is applied before they get "out of hand." Delayed action kills little but time, but prompt attention will keep their numbers from passing the danger mark. Keep the following list of poisons at hand for ready reference and use it at the first signs of trouble.

GRASSHOPPERS.—Bran, 25 pounds; white arsenate or Paris green, 1 pound; salt, 1 pound; banana oil (amyl acetate), 12 teaspoonfuls; water, 10 quarts, or sufficient to make a stiff mash. Broadcast in infested fields in the early morning or evening. This amount will cover five acres. Instead of banana oil, six whole oranges, run through the meat chopper, may be used successfully. (Use also for cut-worms.)

ARMY-WORMS.—When feeding in growing crops use a mash consisting of bran, 50 pounds; Paris reen, 1 pound; vinegar, 1 quart; cheap molasses, 2 quarts; water sufficient to make a crumbly mash. Broadcast in the evening where worms are doing damage.

When worms are traveling, check by throwing furrows toward them; dig post holes in the furrows and kill worms by burning with kerosene.

PLANT LICE.—Spray affected plants with a solution of 1½ teaspoonfuls of nicotine sulphate, or "Black Leaf 40," in warm soapy water. (Use also for leaf hoppers.)

FLIES.—Mix 20 quarts water to which has been added 1 teaspoonful arsenate of lead paste or 1½ of powder and 2 quarts of molasses. Select fence posts or tree trunks somewhat removed from farm buildings and spray or paint liberally with the mixture. Flies will be attracted to the poison and killed.

The common barn flies and horse flies cannot be poisoned, as they are blood feeders, but they can be kept from annoying stock by spraying twice a day with a solution of 1 gallon kerosene, 3 ounces of powdered naphthalin and 1 pound laundry soap, dissolved in hot rain water and diluted to 4 gallons. The various commercial coal tar dips and sprays are good also, but it is imperative that they be used strictly as directed by the manufacturer.

ANTS.—Large black ants, or carpenter ants, are attracted by sweets. They can best be poisoned by placing a mixture of 1 part of tartar emetic and 20 parts of extracted honey in some out-of-the-way place in the infested pantry. This poison not only kills the grown ants but destroys the ant larvæ in the nests also. Keep out of the reach of children and pets.

Ant hills in yards and lawns may be removed by burying small bottles of carbon bisulphide. Use large-mouthed bottles such as those that vaseline comes in. Place 1 ounce of bisulphide in each bottle. Tie cheese-cloth or fine wire screen over the top to permit gas to escape but exclude the dirt. Shove a pitchfork handle into the loose dirt of the hill and drop in a bottle right side up. Tamp dirt down securely. The fumes of the buried poison will do the rest.

FIELD MICE, GROUND SQUIRRELS AND GOPHERS.—Dissolve 1 ounce of strychnia sulphate in 1 pint of boiling water. Add 1 pint of molasses and 6 drops of oil of anise. Soak grain in mixture for 24 hours, dry well, then place where vermin are doing damage. Keep out of reach of chickens by putting poisoned grains in mouths of burrows or under shingles or boards placed near runways.

FOR EATING INSECTS IN GENERAL.—Use arsenate of lead poison as a spray or in the form indicated for grasshoppers.

FOR SUCKING INSECTS IN GENERAL.—Use nico-

"Are you going to the movies tonight?" he asked.

"Yes," replied the girl, "I'm going to 'The Devil.'"

A Forgotten Love

her very best fine-lady manner, sailing into her private sanctum, where the new maid stood waiting. "You can stay now, if you like. Have you brought your box?"

"It is at the station. I can stay, certainly," the girl spoke very nicely—as a lady speaks—but Mrs. Gibbs did not notice.

"You can have your meals in your sewing-room," she said; "one of the under housemaids can take them up."

"Thank you, madam," the last word came with an effort, as if it were an afterthought.

"Do you want these references?" Mrs. Gibbs asked suddenly, looking full at her.

"No—yes—I don't think so!" she stammered. "Just as you please."

The housekeeper laughed.

"Better keep them," she handed them to her; "such references aren't picked up every day. Don't look so frightened, child; I'm not going to ask you any questions. Come with me to Miss Hamilton."

She led the girl through many passages, upstairs into a wing cut out from the rest of the house by red baize doors.

"All this flat is Miss Hamilton's," she remarked. "She is a lucky girl, if ever there was one! It might have been fitted up for a princess. Just wait here—I'll find out if she'll see you."

The girl stood obediently in the wide stone passage that was thickly carpeted with dull velvet pile, its cold, stone walls hidden with tapestry. At the sound of the voice that bade Mrs. Gibbs come in, she started, and locked her hands hard. How languid it was—how flat!"

"I have engaged a new maid for you, Miss Hamilton. Will you see her?"

It was a wet, desolate day, and Gillian sat trying to read, her mind one turmoil of anxiety.

"What! Already?" Her voice was full of blank dismay; she dropped her book as she turned to face the housekeeper. "I won't keep her if I do not like her," she said haughtily, recovering herself.

"Just as you like, Miss Hamilton," smoothly; "you can settle that with Mr. Marchmont."

Gillian, with a deadly tremor, knew that, for some reason or other this maid and no other was to succeed Pierce. But she hated Mrs. Gibbs and she would show nothing before her.

"What is her name?" she asked indifferently, stooping to pick up her book.

"Mary James," shortly, and at the words Gillian's face turned scarlet. But the housekeeper did not see.

"I'll send her in," she said, not too civilly. "I hope she'll be better than that Pierce. Do you want me to wait?"

"No, thank you!" It took all Gillian's might to speak carelessly. "I dare say she will do quite well."

She stood leaning against the mantlepiece as Mrs. Gibbs loftily motioned the girl to go in. The new maid closed the door behind her and stood waiting, her fingers on her lips.

For an instant the two stood looking at each other, both silent and strange-eyed.

"I am Mary James, madam," the maid said loudly: "I trust I can suit you," she pointed vigorously to the door behind her as she spoke.

"I—I think so." Gillian's voice was hoarse, broken.

She passed quickly out and down the passage to the baize doors. There was no one there; she caught the sound of Mrs. Gibbs' high-heeled shoes tapping calmly down the front staircase. Then she flew back and locked the door, just in time, for the new maid had her arms round her, laughing and crying.

"Jacky! Jacky!" Gillian whispered, clinging to her. "You don't know how frightened I was! I never thought of Gibbs engaging you. I thought you'd ask for me. When she said she had a maid, I was sure I was lost."

"I thought it was the best way." Jacky, oddly pale under a thick, black lace veil, was staring hard at her sister. "What's the matter with you?" she said. "I should hardly know you—you're so thin; you look so tall!"

"I don't know. Only I don't like this house. I haven't any real reason, but I'm frightened in it," in a nervous whisper.

"Isn't he kind to you?" fiercely, remembering those words about "a devil incarnate."

"Yes—in his way. But—I don't know why—I'm sure," her voice very low, very cautious, "he isn't what he seems to be. I don't think any one in this house, except the under servants, are what they look. I think they are all here for a purpose, and that I'm part of a plan, without knowing it."

"What do you mean?" Jacky pulled off her demure black toque and thick veil, and Gillian started.

"What have you done to your hair?" she cried under her breath. "It's red!"

"Just a little henna," composedly. "And do you like my complexion? Mrs. Rays' Face Bleach! I think I have just the skin for a red-haired girl!"

"Why," Gillian stared at her, "why did you do it?"

"Because Mr. Marchmont never saw me," returned the new maid calmly, "is no reason for thinking other people wouldn't recognize me. We're only twenty miles from the old place; suppose someone from the village were to see me! Miss Jacqueline Hamilton's career would be short when Mr. Marchmont heard of it. Don't I look awful?"

Gillian sat down, weakly.

"You do!" she said, with a laugh that was full of tears. "I never should have known you. I would have passed you in the street. Are you sure you can get it off?" anxiously.

"Oh, easily! You don't think my old neighbors would know me?" surveying her white face and dull-red hair with approval in a glass.

"I know they wouldn't. But—oh, I ought not to have done it! I was a selfish beast to bring you here."

"Nonsense!" promptly. "It's a lark. And I needn't have anything to do with the other servants. Your housekeeper says I'm to have my meals alone."

"You'll never see the other servants," Gillian returned, "or else we couldn't manage. That was one reason why Pierce left. She said she was too lonely."

"Gill, where do I sleep? And do maids wear caps and aprons? I've bought a black satin dress."

"You sleep here." Gillian opened a door into an adjoining room. "You and I are alone in this part of the house. Your sewing-room opens out of your bedroom with a door on the outer hall. No, you don't wear a cap. Just plain white collars and cuffs."

"I'll take my things off," she said, gazing about the neat room made ready for her. "Someone might come. Do you have to go down to tea with Mr. Marchmont?"

"I don't today. He isn't well; he didn't come to lunch. They will bring my tea when I ring. You must be starving."

Jacky nodded, adjusting the scrupulously plain black satin gown that made her look so slight and smart.

"Four pounds, this cost," she said. "I got it where the shop girls at the grand shops get theirs. It took all my money, except a second-class ticket down. But I dared not come in blue serge."

Gillian looked at her; truly no one would have recognized the old Jacky Hamilton. The neat, red hair, brushed smoothly back, was not like the rippling waves and rings of burned gold that had been her greatest beauty; the dead-white skin told no tales of the peach color beneath.

"How do you get your hair like that?"

"Vaseline. There's only one thing wrong about me, Gill—my eyes! I daren't look up; they are so deadly blue with this hair. See?"

Gillian nodded. Jacky with her eyes cast down was an ordinary red-haired girl; looking you in the face she had an uncanny, artificial beauty that would have made her fortune on the stage.

"Never look at Mr. Marchmont," the elder girl cried in a sudden tremor of fear. "Promise me! And oh! do be careful. Keep out of everyone's way. I ought never, never to have brought you here!"

"You didn't; I came! Was that a knock?"

"At the sewing-room door. Your tea. Go and take it from the maid!" Gillian prompted breathlessly. "When she's gone I'll ring for mine, and we'll have it together. We can today."

The new maid was no fool, if she had red hair. She used the cup and plate sent up for her so that the china would tell no tales, and having an excellent appetite dispatched her own tea as well as a share of Gillian's.

"Now tell me," she said, "what you mean about this house? Why are you frightened?"

"The night before I wrote to you," said Gillian slowly, "I let Pierce go out. I was going to bed, and I hadn't anything to read, so I went downstairs for a book, in my dressing-gown. I thought Mr. Marchmont had gone to bed. It was only good luck that made me go quietly by the smoking-room door."

"Well?"

"It was half-open," said Gillian, with a curious glance at her sister. "Inside sat Mr. Marchmont, the housekeeper and the butler, playing cards and smoking."

"What!" cried Jacky, staggered. "He must have a taste for low company."

"I don't think it was low company—at least, I think he isn't any better than they are. I think he is just an impostor, who for some reason wanted to get into county society."

Jacky whistled.

"That's why he adopted you, then," she mused. "Tom Hamilton's daughter could open all the doors when she was adopted by a rich man, though the doors were shut pretty hard to her when she was just a poor, friendless girl. I think we'll get out—at once! I don't like the look of things." Her eyes were half-closed, as though she were seeing something very far away.

Was that what Lesard had meant when he said Marchmont's was no house for any woman? She would have repeated those words to Gillian, but she remembered in time that it was Lesard's confidence she would be betraying. She wondered a little how he knew about Marchmont.

"Go?" Gillian's voice broke in on her abstraction. "We can't go! I signed those papers making him my legal guardian till I'm twenty-one. He could bring me back, whether I liked or no."

"Why did you?" said Jacky, very low.

"I don't know," desperately; "I think he made me. It seemed all right then."

"It doesn't matter," recovering herself. "We can run away. He'll never find us."

"He'd find us anywhere," earnestly. "I don't know why, but I feel as if I were in the center of a great, fine spider's web, and could never get away from the threads. I believe Mr. Marchmont has eyes everywhere, like the spider."

"You're nervous," the new maid said wonderingly. "You'll forget it when we're gone."

"How far do you think we should get—walking?" despairingly. "Perhaps five miles, before we were caught, for he won't let me go; I know it. You've spent all your money; I haven't any. If we even got to London, it would do no good."

"My room is paid for," Jacky said, "but"—her face fell—"I won't have any more money till the first of March. We can go then."

"Do you think we can keep up this farce for a month?" staring listlessly at the fire.

"Yes," stoutly. "But you must get into the way of calling me James. Ladies' maids never have any Christian names. And I'm going to get on the right side of Mrs. Gibbs, you see if I don't."

"That horrible woman! Oh, you can't!"

The new maid's lips straightened into a hard line.

"You'll see," she remarked coolly. "Look here, where did you get those references you sent me from the Countess of Ernescliffe and Mrs. Powers? Because Mrs. Gibbs jumped like anything when she saw them, and forgot her grand airs altogether. I'm afraid she has seen Lady Ernescliffe's writing and knew the note was a sham. If she hadn't gone out of the room that minute I should have been found out. Did you write them?"

"Me?" cried Gillian. "No, I found them! They were in that old desk of father's. I don't know where he ever got them."

"Father's!" Jacky stood staring. "That's queer!" she ejaculated. "But the thing's served our turn. I don't believe I should ever have been engaged without them. They simply worked a miracle."

"Grand ladies' recommendations generally do," Gillian returned.

"Yes," Jacky said dryly. Somehow, she was quite sure that there was some underlying reason for the effect of her references on Mrs. Gibbs; but she said no more. Gillian was nervous enough already, and Jacqueline remembered, uncomfortably, that her father had been a friend of Mr. Marchmont.

"Pray the saints those letters haven't just got us into a trap!" she thought devoutly as she helped Gillian to dress for dinner.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

E. L. W., Kenton, Ky.—Marriage between first cousins is forbidden by law in all states except Alabama, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Georgia, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia and Washington. There is no prohibition concerning the marriage of second and third cousins.

MRS. O. E. F., Texas.—We do not like to be too skeptical, but we must tell you that because you have read in the newspaper that two and a half millions of gold are buried somewhere in the Arkansas Ozarks is no reason at all for believing such a treasure really exists. We fear this is the sort of story enterprising journalists like to unearth and print with more or less elaboration for the sake of entertaining their readers. So we warn you not to plan to spend any of these Spanish dollars before you have them dug up. (2) Old Spanish gold coins would have a bullion value according to their degree of fineness. Any U. S. Assay office, should you come into possession of this mythic hoard, would be glad to aid you in converting your ancient gold into new crisp Treasury notes. (3) Any treasure found upon leased land would naturally become the property of the owner of the land and not of the lessee—provided, of course, that no valid claimants appeared for the money or other property.

W. L. A., Gassaway, W. Va.—There are over seven million acres of vacant public lands in the state of Colorado, and some of these many acres are not far, as Western distances go, from Delta, the town you mention. You should write to the Register of the U. S. Land Office, Montrose, Colorado, for further information. Montrose is some thirty miles from Delta, and on the same line of railroad. (2) States having considerable vacant public land still open for settlement are: Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.

A COMFORT SUBSCRIBER, Fond du Lac, Wisc.—Authors' manuscripts should best be typed, double spaced, on ordinary typewriter paper of the usual size (8½ by 11). It is well to leave a margin of at least an inch—for any necessary corrections—and four to six spaces can be considered as constituting the ordinary indention for paragraphs, etc. All pages should be carefully numbered at the top, and the author's name and address should be placed on the first page, in the upper right-hand corner. (2) In typing the title of a poem or story, it is customary to capitalize only the important words—that is, articles, prepositions and connectives (unless one of these begins the title) are not given a capital letter. For instance, here would be correct typing of a pair of titles: The True Tale of the Cruise of the Nancy Lee. Three Men of a Far Country and a Fair Sky. Leave as many spaces as you prefer between your title and your first line. We think three spaces make a suitable interval, although four or five would not be too many. You should leave at least a two-inch margin at the top of the page and at least a one-inch at the bottom.

MRS. R. I. L., Great Divide, Colo.—The phrase, "Pennsylvania Dutch," refers to descendants of Hollanders who settled rather thickly in that state at one time in its history. The words in no way mean Germans, or those of German descent. Some of the richest and best-managed farms in the Keystone State are owned by "Pennsylvania Dutch," whose thrift and industry would appeal greatly, we think, to that famous Philadelphian, Ben Franklin.

MRS. H. W. H., Wolf Point, Mo.—We are sorry to have to tell you that opals such as the one your husband found in this coal mine have but little value as a precious stone. If this stone is of any marketable worth at all, your jeweler should be able to tell you where you can have it sold, or cut and polished for your own use. We recommend the latter course, as the stone would not command much of a price, in any event.

MRS. E. T., Dickson, Tenn.—Mrs. Margaret Sanger, well known for her advocacy of birth control, is the editor of the "Birth Control Review," which is issued from 104 Fifth Avenue, New York City. You can address Mrs. Sanger, care of that publication, from which you can also secure the other data you wish concerning theories advocated by Mrs. Sanger.

L. J., Hardin, Mont.—Your two dinners, to be prepared from five varieties of canned food each, do not constitute such a difficult problem, and many appetizing combinations are possible. Our own suggestion would be as follows:

DINNER NUMBER ONE.

Canned Breast of Boiled Chicken
Canned Sweet Potatoes
Pickled Tomatoes Canned String Beans
Canned Strawberries

DINNER NUMBER TWO.

Canned Fried Ham with Milk Gravy
Canned Mashed Turnips
Pickled Cauliflower Canned Sweet Corn
Canned Pineapple

It seems to us that, with the proper "fixins," the dinners above would be fit to set before any king, although we fear that what few kings there are left in the world have appetites and digestions too poor to appreciate such good fare as your canning club will be able to offer its lucky members.

MRS. R. E. S., Newport, R. I.—Surely there are "trained fleas;" these lively and too-intelligent insects have long done duty in various side-show exhibits and in other places. Any one who has ever experienced the tricks that can be done by the untrained insect will well understand the capabilities of a robust adult flea when properly educated. Your friend is not mistaken, and the cultured flea exists, both in moving pictures and in reality. These exhibits are rarer, however, than in the days of the old "dime museum," where trained fleas almost always formed part of the program.

H. D. DeC., Missouri.—You should apply to the U. S. Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C., for particulars concerning the requirements for the position of railway mail clerk, and for information concerning the dates of future examinations.

Miss Mildred Clark, Harrisburg, Ark., is desirous of obtaining some old-fashioned home-woven blue-and-white bedspreads. Will COMFORT readers having these for sale please write to Miss Clark direct?

I. M. E., Spring Hill, W. Va.—The area of the Argentine Republic is over a million square miles, and the country contains some eight and a half million inhabitants. The population, then, is about twice as dense as that of Canada. In the last two decades, Argentina has received a great flow of immigrants—from Italy in particular. Beunos Ayres, the capital of the country and the principal port, is a beautiful and most modern city of cosmopolitan growth and aspect. It is well situated on the River Plata, about 180 miles from the sea. The city has a population of 1,637,000, making it a little smaller than our own city of Philadelphia. A great portion of the Argentine consists of two great unbroken plains—the southern of which is arid and sandy, while the one to the north is able to boast plains of magnificent pastures, fine timber lands and numerous rivers. The River Plata itself is one of the greatest rivers of the western hemisphere, and can be ascended by steamer for over 2,000 miles. The climate of the Argentine is good, but of considerable variety because of the size and natural features of the Republic. In the north, the temperature ranges higher than in the south. The climate of Beunos Ayres may be likened to that of cities of southern Europe, although much dampness prevails in the Argentine capital, caused by winds which reach the city after blowing over salt marshes. You would not be able to get a "ranch on the seashore" in the Argentine, nor would such a location be suitable for ranching operations. You should situate yourself inland on some of the productive lands of the northern plains. The Republic has a shore-line of 854 miles, but practically all of this is low and sandy, without good harbors. For further particulars regarding favorable opportunities and inducements for setlement in the Aregentine, write to our U. S. Consul at Beunos Ayres, and to the Argentine-American Chamber of Commerce, 64 Broad Street, New York City.

M. D., Clanton, Ala.—More important in editors' eyes than the paper stories are written upon is the actual construction of the manuscript. This part of it we are sure you will be able to do better after you have completed your high school course. At present your letter shows you lack experience in spelling and punctuation which would cause any work you might submit to be regarded with disfavor.

Poems Requested

The Village Choir

(A Parody on "The Charge of the Light Brigade.")

Half a bar, half a bar,
Half a bar onward!
Into an awful ditch,
Choir and precentor hitch,
Into a mess of pitch,
That led the Old Hundred.
Trebles to right of them,
Tenors to left of them,
Bases in front of them
Bellowed and thundered.
Oh, that precentor's look
When the sopranos took
Their own time and book
From the Old Hundred.

Screech all the trebles here,
Boggled the tenors there,
Raising the parson's hair,
While his mind wandered;
Theirs not to reason why
This psalm was pitched too high;
Theirs but to gasp and cry
Out the Old Hundred.
Tenors to right of them,
Tenors to left of them,
Bases in front of them
Bellowed and thundered.
Stormed they with shout and yell,
Not wise they rang, nor well,
Drowning the sexton's bell,
While the church wondered.

Dire the precentor's glare,
Flashed his pitchfork in air,
Sounding the fresh keys to bear
Out the Old Hundred,
Swiftly he turned his back,
Reached he his hat from rack,
Then from the screaming pack
Himself he sundered.
Tenors to right of him,
Trebles to left of him,
Discords behind him
Bellowed and thundered.
Oh, the wind howls they wrought;
Right to the end they fought!
Some tune they sang, but not,
Not the Old Hundred.

A Saloon Bar

A bar to heaven, a door to hell,
Whoever named it named it well.
A bar to manliness and wealth,
A door to want and broken health;
A bar to honor, pride and fame,
A door to sin and grief and shame;
A bar to hope, a bar to prayer,
A door to darkness and despair;
A bar to honored useful life,
A door to brawling, senseless strife;
A bar to all that's true and brave,
A door to every drunkard's grave;
A bar to joys that home imparts,
A door to tears and aching hearts;
A bar to heaven, a door to hell,
Whoever named it named it well.

Two Pictures

BY ANNIE D. GREEN (MARION DOUGLAS).

An old farmhouse with meadows wide,
And sweet with clover on each side;
A bright-eyed boy, who looks from out
The door with woodbine wreathed about,
And wished his one thought all day:
"Oh, if I could but fly away
From this dull spot the world to see.
How happy, happy, happy,
How happy I should be!"

Amid the city's constant din,
A man who round the world has been,
Who, 'mid the tumult and the throng,
Is thinking, thinking all day long:
"Oh, could I only tread once more
The field-path to the farmhouse door,
The old green meadow could I see,
How happy, happy, happy,
How happy I should be!"

All Things Bright and Beautiful

BY CECIL FRANCIS ALEXANDER.

"All things bright and beautiful,
All things great and small,
All things wise and wonderful,—
The Lord God made them all.

"Each little flower that opens,
Each little bird that sings,—
He made their glowing colors,
He made their tiny wings.

"The rich man in his castle,
The poor man at his gate,
God made them, high or lowly,
And order'd their estate.

"The purple-headed mountain,
The river running by,
The morning, and the sunset
That lighteth up the sky.

"The tall trees in the greenwood,
The meadows where we play,
The rushes by the water
We gather every day;

"He gave us eyes to see them,
And lips that we might tell
How great is God Almighty,
Who hath made all things well.'

Locked in the Breast

BY THOMAS F. PORTER.

Whatever heart longings to me are denied,
How many bright prospects of mine turned aside,
It will not be in me to grieve or complain,
If I in the humor can calmly remain,
That, when day is o'er and I go home to rest,
A grudge against no one is locked in my breast.

In everyday life we are always beset
With trials and crosses that vex us and fret;
When in anger we speak words cutting and hard,
Because at the time we were quite off our guard,
But ne'er may there be when the sun seeks the west
A grudge against anyone locked in my breast.

We intend to do right and then we do wrong,
This is true of the weak, often true of the strong,
But of all the errors we thoughtlessly make,
May we never forget this sound view to take,
Should there be a feud there may be an inquest
To follow a grudge locked up long in the breast.

A grudge in one night will gnaw, fester and grow,
But to what proportions the morrows will show,
For days and for months it may many annoy,
Or the peace of a life forever destroy.
Heaven pity the mortal who, when he would rest,
Has a grudge against someone locked in his breast.

Some Queer Submarines

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

SUBMARINE navigation, so far as recorded in history, was conceived during the famous siege of Syracuse in 212 B. C. Trained divers were employed, but they were unable to remain under water more than a few minutes. Centuries lapsed before we hear of anyone attempting to build a boat that would be invisible to an enemy.

M. Delpeuch states that some English ships were destroyed in 1372 by fire carried under water. In 1620 Cornelius van Drebble, a Dutch natural philosopher, worked along this idea, constructing several boats which he made watertight by greased leather stretched over the hull. By 1727 no less than fourteen types of submarines had been patented in England alone.

It was left to a young American, David Bushnell, to invent the first practical submarine, which he did in 1771, when a freshman at Yale. In principle it was essentially the same as the "water bugs" that prowl the seas today in search of prey. This may sound far-fetched, but it is a fact vouched for several years ago by Commander Barber of the United States Navy. "It seems to have been the most perfect thing of the kind," said the commander, "that has ever been constructed before or since the time of Bushnell."

As late as 1905; the noted constructor of the British navy, Sir William White, said: "It cannot be claimed that any new principle of design has been discovered or applied since Bushnell. He showed the way to all his successors in the particulars of bouyancy, stability and control of the depth reached by submarines. Although alternative methods have been introduced and practically tested, in the end Bushnell's plans have in substance been found the best."

Not only did Bushnell invent the submarine boat but the submarine mine as well. His professors laughed at his contention that gunpowder could be exploded under water. They even ridiculed him for advancing such a theory. But the student took his professors and other learned gentleman out into New Haven harbor, where he produced such an explosion.

Soon after the opening of the Revolutionary war Admiral Lord Howe began a blockade of New York Harbor. The colonists were perturbed—and with cause. They realized that England controlled the situation for the time being at least, and that if the hostile fleet could be destroyed the war would be ended—then and there. But how to destroy the fleet was a question. The colonies had no ships that would bring victory in battle with those of Lord Howe.

The thoughts of some patriots turned to David Bushnell and his submarine mine. Granting that it was a wonderful invention, how, they asked could it be placed under a ship? Bushnell readily gave them an answer: By means of a submarine boat. He had invented just such a craft for just such a purpose.

The name bestowed upon the queer looking craft was "Turtle." Instead of the whalelike lines that characterize these latter-day sea fighters, Bushnell's submarine was shaped something like a "clam," its longest distance being placed vertically. This so as to accommodate a single operator in sitting posture.

The Turtle was submerged by letting water into a tank, raised by allowing the water to drain from this same reservoir. The motive power was furnished by a wooded propeller placed in front, which the operator turned by means of a crank. It gave the boat a maximum speed of two miles an hour.

Foxfire wood, which emitted a phosphorescent light and at the same time did not exhaust any oxygen so precious to the operator, was the means of illumination. An ordinary rudder steered the vessel. Bushnell provided an air chamber in which the operator could remain for half an hour, and practical methods for gauging the depths and retaining the stability of his craft.

Bushnell completed his studies at Yale in 1775, but previous to that year the Turtle had made several successful voyages. One of the patriots, Israel Putnam, learning of this sent for Bushnell and his submarine boat. After a brief conference, during which the young inventor explained the workings of his craft, The Eagle, flagship of the British fleet, was picked as the first victim of Bushnell's genius.

Bushnell was never a strong youth. While other boys of his home colony played games and improved their physique, he spent his time indoors, mapping out the many ideas that raced through his imaginative mind. So when the opportunity arose for him to demonstrate the practicability of his great scheme he confessed his inability to navigate the Turtle himself, because of insufficient strength.

So that his submarine was entrusted to another, one Ezra Lee, who propelled the Turtle to where the British flagship lay off Staten Island. Bushnell had made it possible for whoever navigated his boat to detach the torpedo, which was held in place by a cable, and fasten it by a screw to the hull of the ship to be destroyed. Having done this the Turtle was to leave. Within the torpedo was a time clock set for thirty minutes. After that time the explosion was to occur.

But at the point of the hull of the Eagle where Lee had planned to attach the torpedo a sheath of copper prevented him from screwing his weapon of destruction. Lee did his best to overcome this difficulty but he worked in vain and failed to sink the British man-o'-war.

This was a great disappointment to Bushnell's friends. The name of the Turtle became a name to be laughed at and ridiculed. Bushnell, discouraged and sick at heart, the result of years of hard work vanished in a day, disappeared from his old haunts.

A quarter of a century elapsed before the submarine was again taken at all seriously. Napoleon Bonaparte, with all the powers leauged against him, had one great ambition—an invasion of England. The first step in this direction was to get rid of the English navy.

In the midst of his deliberations, Robert Fulton appeared. And to demonstrate his boat gave an exhibition in the harbor of Brest. His craft was a development of Bushnell's idea, and showed improvement over the latter.

Fulton's boat was called the "Nautilus" and had the form of a cigar. It was made of wood sheated with copper and hooped with iron. It was twenty-one feet and four inches in length. With three companions Fulton sailed his craft five hundred feet while twenty-five feet beneath the surface of the water. On one occasion the four men remained below four hours. Napoleon was greatly impressed with the action of Fulton's boat. A shallop was placed at the disposal of Fulton by the French admiralty for his experiments and became a mass of debris after the Nautilus had attacked her. Every experiment was successful, and Fulton was ordered to set sail against the British fleet, just off Brest. But the English had been forewarned and ran away. The ships of the British absented themselves from the coast of France, and though Fulton watched and waited, he received no opportunity to prove the value of his invention.

Napoleon, angry, dismissed him from the service, realizing later that he had committed a grievous error—throwing away his great chance of crushing England and saving his empire.

Even while the American was carrying on these experiments in the harbor of Brest, the English had invited him to London.

On the rejection of his plans by Napoleon, Fulton forthwith made the trip across the channel, where William Pitt received him with open arms.

The intention in England was not to develop the submarine but to suppress it, they not wanting it to fall into the hands of the enemy. Accordingly they offered Fulton a fortune to forget his invention and return to America. This offer was refused and Fulton returned to America and turned his genius on his steamboat.

At Kiel, in 1850, the submarine again came into prominence, but no success attended the venture.

In 1863 McClintock and Howgate constructed a semi-submarine hand-propelled boat for the purpose of attack on the federal fleet but it sank four times, each time drowning the entire crew of eight men.

But after Fulton the greatest advance in submarine construction was made by the confederates in our Civil War. They combined the uses of steam and electricity. This "David," as submarines were then called was about sixty feet long and manned by nine men, eight of whom worked the screw-shaft by hand, while the ninth acted as pilot. On the night of February 17, 1863, this little craft went out to attack the Housatonic, a Federal ship anchored in Charleston Harbor, exploding a hundred pounds of powder under the keel of the ship. The Housatonic fairly jumped out of the water and then lurched heavily to the bottom. During the confusion of rescuing the survivors the David apparently escaped, for she could not be found. This was the first case of a submarine destroying an enemy. After the war when divers went down to the wrecked ship, they found the David wedged into the very hole she had made, evidently sucked in by the rush of water. The effect of the David's torpedo proved that the submarine was worthy of respect.

The "Whale," recently on exhibition in the Brooklyn navy yard, was built in 1864, and by strange coincidence, one of her constructors bore the same name as the first inventor of a submarine—Bushnell. His full name was C. S. Bushnell. In conjunction with Augustus Rice he built the boat at Halstead, N. J. She is about twenty-nine feet long and has a depth of nine feet. Her sides are made of twelve-inch boiler plate.

The craft of today is practically of the same design of a century ago. There is increased efficiency and wider range of action, because we now possess materials of construction, which are lighter and stronger and which can be better manipulated. The modern submarine is a maze of machinery. It lives in the dark, striking without an instant's warning like an adder.

In the struggle for naval supremacy, the inventive genius of the American, the practical experience of the English, the application of the Russian, the exact science of the French, and the profound thought of the Germans are being constantly put to the test. The desire and passion for military strength is so great upon the part of all powers, that there is no hesitancy upon the part of any, to copy from the other any plan or process which makes for increased military efficiency or wider field of action.

Naval experts of the nations early realized that the submarine had to be reckoned with. In its present state of efficiency, it is the most powerful weapon of offence and defence, and its value has long bene recognized by the best known students of naval warfare.

It was many years ago that Jules Verne wrote of the adventures of captain Nemo and his fabled submarine, the Nautilus. People accepted the adventures as good reading—nothing more. But now it is known that Verne, dreaming his unbelievable vision, was even then pointing a prophetic finger to the most dangerous engine of war in the history of the world.

Letitia's One Adventure

By Nellie R. Donnel

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

LETITIA Otis stepped up to the post-office window with misgiving in her heart. What was the use of asking for any mail. She never received any letters. "No one cares at all," she said to herself, but habit was strong, so she asked just as she had been doing for years: "Any letters, Mr. Gadsden?"

"Yes, Miss Letitia, one letter," and he laughed as he added: "Wouldn't be s'prised if 'twas a love letter. Looks like a man's handwrite."

Letitia said not a word, but went out with the letter clutched tightly in her hand. "Who could it be from?" she wondered as she hurried home. She could hardly wait until she reached the flower-bordered path she and Tabby called home. The path led to a small cottage. Once inside the door she closed it tight, and with hands that trembled tore open the letter and read:

"My Dear, Dearest Letitia: Am sending the garments you picked out by parcel post registered, so you will be sure to receive them. Put them on and meet me at the Old Stone church tomorrow (Wednesday) night. Do not fail to come.

"With lots of love,

"ROBERT."

She read the words with astonishment. Must be some mistake somewhere. It sounded as if from a lover, so it couldn't be for her. She looked at the envelope again to make sure. No, there it was in black and white: Miss Letitia Otis, Perrysburg, Ohio. It certainly was strange. She had no lovers, and who could Robert be, anyway? It must be an elopement.

A sudden quick knock roused her, and she went to the door. There stood the delivery boy with a big box under his arm.

"Please sign here, to show you received the parcel," said he, pointing to the line where she should place her signature.

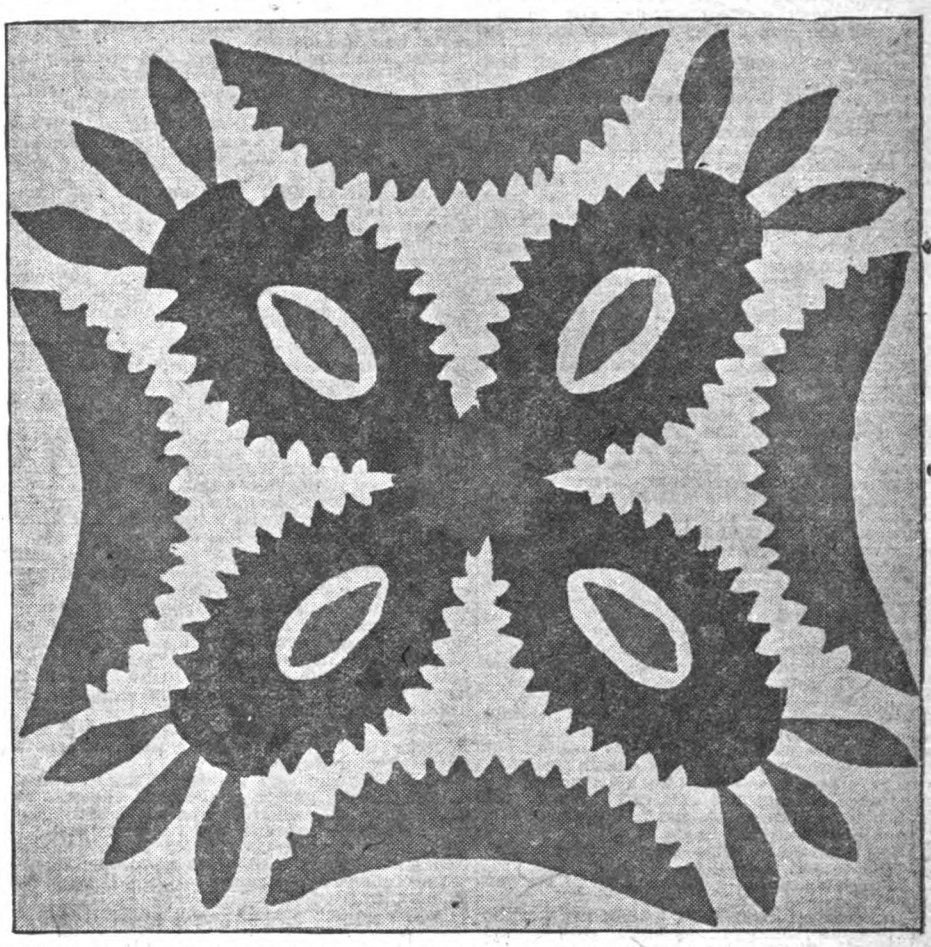
"Yes, but——" began Letitia, intending to explain.

"I'm in a dreadful hurry, ma'am. And before Letitia knew it she had signed her name and the boy was gone.

She looked at the address on the box. That was the same as it was on the letter. "That's queer," she thought.

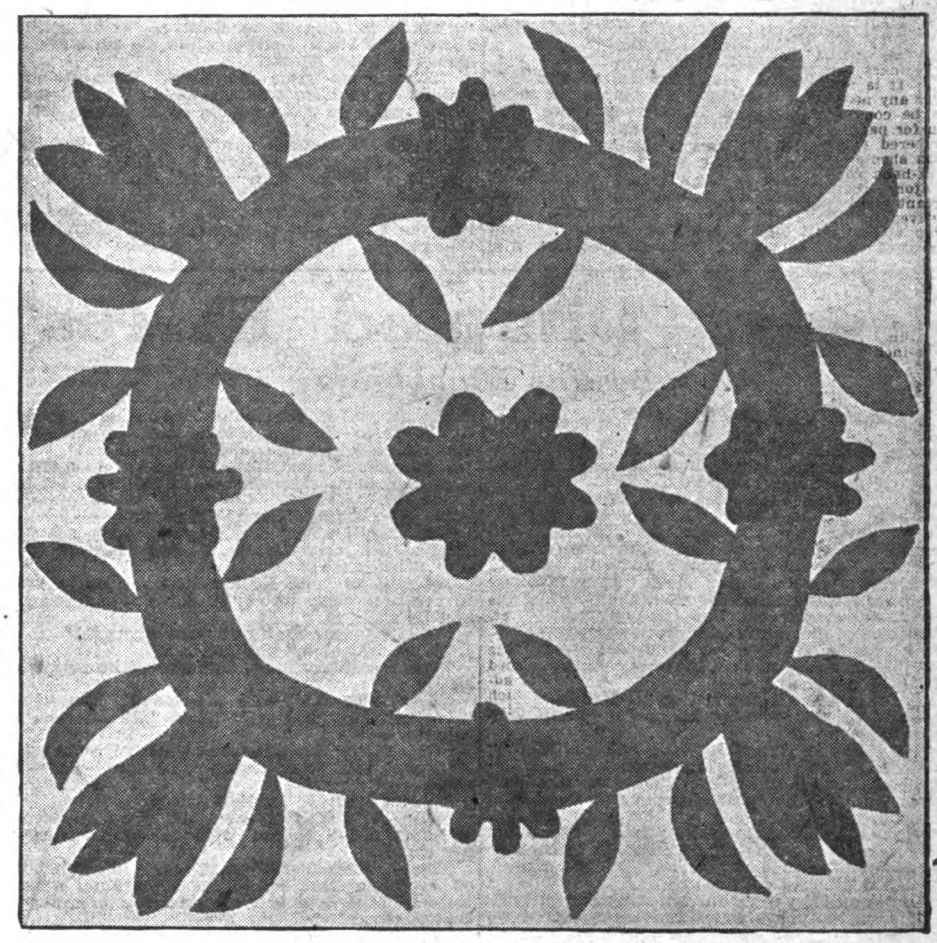
"Well, there won't be any harm in opening it, anyway," she said to Tabby, who had curled up in the rocker for a nap.

So she cut the strings and lifted the lid, and there laid the loveliest pink blouse. Underneath that she found a hat and a veil and a pretty jacket suit of navy blue.



"They are lovely," said Letitia, "but I wouldn't dare." Then, after thinking a little: "And why should I not? They were sent to me."

"No, I can't," and she cried with disappointment. It seemed that her life had been full of disappointments. She had had her girlish dreams long ago, and her life must always be empty, just as it was now. Letitia never owned to any one but herself that she would soon be forty-two. Her prince came when she was eighteen, but Father and Mother were ailing and needed her, so she had said, "No." Now all were gone and she was left alone.



"Oh, if I could only go. Just to see how it is to get away from home once. I believe I will. It must be some young things who hardly know their own minds. As for me, I'll get out of it some way. Now if I can only wear these clothes."

Letitia's One Adventure

So she tried on the waist, and, joy of joys, it fitted. The skirt seemed a trifle short, to her notion, but she forgot that when she looked in the glass.

"I'm not so terribly homely, after all, and clothes do make a difference." She took the garments off and laid them lovingly back in the box. She could hardly wait until the next evening for her wonderful adventure, now that she had really decided to go; yet when the time arrived she found her heart all a-flutter.

She nervously fastened the last clasp, adjusted the veil, and after putting Tabby on the back porch with extra rations, hurried down the street. She was fearful of meeting someone, so she went down a back street to the old Stone church, the trysting place named in the letter.

She had not long to wait. Someone was coming around the corner of the church. The moon shone dim, so all Letitia could see was a large, burly form. She changed her mind all of a sudden and started to run but didn't get far until she felt the pressure of arms around her and a voice in her ear.

"Oh, Letitia, dear, you're not going to back out, are you? I was afraid you wouldn't come. You're a dear," and then a hug that left her horrified and speechless. She hadn't counted on this, and could only pray that the veil hid the mortification and embarrassment she felt. Oh, to be at home now. What a fool she was to come. But she had borrowed plumes and must wear them now. What would he say if he knew? It was too much to expect anyone to forgive a joke of this sort. But she couldn't tell now, there would be an easier way out after a while. But he seemed not to notice her and went on:

"I left the car down the road a ways and came on foot the rest of the way so no one would suspicion. Did you have a hard time getting away?"

"N-no," faltered Letitia, afraid to trust her voice above a whisper. Who was at home to care anyway? No one but Tabby.

"Here we are," said he, and he helped her into a big roadster that stood by the side of the road. Soon they were on their way, with nothing but the drone of the motor to drown their thoughts. Where to? Letitia wondered but dare not ask.

Only once did his arm steal around her, and Letitia uttered a groan as she felt the pressure.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"N-nothing," said Letitia so low that he had to bend to hear her. Then:

"I love you dear with all my heart. Do you love me?"

"N-no, I mean I don't know," whispered Letitia.

"Don't know? Yes you do, you're only excited running away like this, and no wonder."

Letitia was terribly afraid he was going to kiss her, and he did, right through veil and all. Oh, when would he discover his mistake and what would he say? It was comfortable to have someone who cared take care of you, but——

"Letitia, you're crying," said he. "You're not sorry you came? Oh, don't say that!"

"Y—n-no," mumbled Letitia.

"Never mind, when you have rested you will feel much better. I engaged a room at the hotel for you. Father and I have lived there ever since Mother died. I will take you there."

Letitia felt miserable, but concluded she might as well make the best of it now. They were coming to the lights of the city and she stole a glance at him. She saw he was a manly looking fellow, perhaps twenty-two, and her heart smote her. If she only had a son like him how proud she would be. It wasn't right to fool him this way and she crouched in her corner of the seat, as if to hide.

"Letitia, kiss me just once before we get there."

"I—I can't," sobbed Letitia.

"And why can't you?" he asked, beginning to feel a trifle irritated and wondering what on earth was the matter.

She could bear it no longer, and throwing back her veil she cried out: "Don't you see? I'm a fraud. Oh, if I only hadn't come. I wish I was back home."

It was his turn to look astonished. "H-holy smoke, who are you? I thought you were Letitia."

"I am Letitia, Letitia Otis." Then the whole pitiful story came out. "Oh, I see it is all a terrible mistake now. But my life has always been so lonely. I am sorry I came, but when I received the letter and found that the clothes fitted me I decided to come because, well just because——" and the tears started anew.

But he felt no anger, only pity for her, when she had finished, and he said: "That's all right. You were a good sport, anyway. I'll make it all right with the girl."

"I thought there was a girl in it," said Letitia. Then, wishing to justify herself, she added: "But how did it happen to be addressed to me? The letter and the box, both of them were. No one else of that name lives in Perrysburg."

"Well, she is just visiting there at the Andrews," said he. "Her name is Letitia Otis, too. Her father doesn't object to me but thinks we are both too young. So we planned to elope. But come in and stay for the night, anyway, and we will talk it over in the morning." And Letitia accepted because there was no other way out.

In the morning she was up bright and early, and, thinking to escape without seeing him, she was hurrying out when Robert saw her. "Just step into the sitting-room a minute," said he.

There was an older man in the room who Robert introduced as his father. But before he had finished his father said: "Why, if it isn't Letitia," and before she knew it he had both her hands in his own. Letitia blushed crimson. How brazen he would think her.

"Where have you been all these years?" asked Robert's father. "And where did you get acquainted with Robert?"

So Robert had said nothing about it, and she cast a grateful glance at the boy, who was now standing by the window. But she said: "Oh, it is all a terrible mistake, and I must be going."

"I asked for you at the old place," went on Robert's father, too eager to notice her answer. "They said you had gone away. No one seemed to know where."

"After father died, I went to Perrysburg to take care of Aunt Lizzie. I have lived there ever since. There was no one back home that needed me. But I must be going," and the tears started to trickle down her cheeks.

"You are going, but not back there. You are coming to live with me," said Robert's father. You will forgive me, won't you?" he asked.

"There is nothing to forgive. It is all the other way," began Letitia, while the tears started anew down her cheeks.

"This is no time for tears," said Robert's father. "We have wasted enough time already. The courthouse will soon be open. Come, let us hurry."

And as they passed out, Robert, who had been forgotten by them, muttered: "Well, if this isn't the limit. Elope with a girl and have father walk away with her right under my nose." Then he laughed as he added: "It isn't every one who has the chance to choose his own stepmother, though."

Peggy "Dimpled Knees"

By Ray Humphreys

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE pretty blonde looked up into his eyes bashfully when he asked her if she was going home his way.

One glance and she nodded.

He helped her into the sporty roadster and the next minute they had wheeled into the line of traffic and were headed out Santa Fe Boulevard at a smart clip.

She looked at his clever shoes. They matched his brown overcoat, and the coat, she told herself, was the same adorable shade as his eyes.

Ordinarily she didn't ride with strangers.

But when a stranger—a handsome stranger—drives up to the curb in a blue-gray chummy and swings open the door——

"The cars are all jammed up at Norwich Avenue—and if you're going home I'll gladly give you a lift."

"But I live in Avondale," she had smiled.

"So do I," he promptly answered.

And the next minute—well, she was admiring his shoes and thinking of his eyes and wondering what the girls would say if they could see her.

"Seems," he broke the silence finally, "that I've met you somewhere before; weren't in Paris during the scrap, were you?"

The girl blushed a little.

"You know," he went on, watching her curiously, "I seem to place you there—over there—we might have met, you know, at a hut dance, or——"

"Yes," and she struggled up to the occasion, "I was over there in Red Cross work, but——"

"I knew it," he exclaimed, "I remember you—I was with the 134th Infantry,—1st lieutenant—and—you, you don't happen to remember me, do you?"

"Not exactly," said she, remembering that the only officer she ever met was Patrolman O'Shay, who sent her a box of candy now and then and took her to the Bijou every Saturday night.

"Well," said the stranger, "my name is Rogers—Mansfield Rogers, Jr.!"

It took her breath away.

Mansfield Rogers, Jr.! She was riding home with the only son of the greatest governor the state had ever known,—the richest, the mightiest, the proudest, the—— She wondered if her name would be in the society column next morning.

"Oh," she stammered, "I'm glad to meet you!"

"Same to you," he smiled, "and your name?"

"Peggy," she said, "Peggy Williams!"

She felt him give her a quick glance.

"Pretty name—that," he murmured, and she looked sharply at him but his face was straight. He was watching a traffic officer ahead.

They worried their way through the congested zone.

Up past the square they spun, and out the long drive that led to Avondale—where the mightiest of the mighty mansioned.

"You must have been away somewheres," she broke the silence, nodding at the grips that occupied the back seat of the chummy.

"Yes," he smiled, "just back from Europe—oh, no, I didn't come all the way in the car. I picked this boat up in Hoboken and I've driven her through—classy, isn't she?"

"Yes," said the girl.

"And so you,"—he turned and looked her square in the eyes—"are Peggy Williams! The girl who made 'Dimpled Knees' famous! Aren't you appearing in films any more?"

"Oh, yes—but I'm resting now, you see!"

"I saw you in 'Dimpled Knees,'" he glowed, enthusiastically. "I didn't know you then. I—I—my, but that was a wonderful piece of acting you did there—I hand it to you."

She crimsoned properly.

"Oh," she said, tossing her blonde head, "that wasn't so much—I've done better—and, really, 'Dimpled Knees'——"

"I suppose," he offered, "that it was rather chilly for you in that hotel lobby where you had to appear in—in that abbreviated costume—that scene from which the plot got its name!"

Again she blushed furiously, and she tugged at her tight skirt, conscious that she was a bit embarrassed.

"Well, 'Dimpled Knees,'" he began——

"Oh, Mr. Rogers," she begged, "let's not talk shop all the time—really, I hear so much of it that it bores me!"

He said no more for a minute, while he tried to see how close he could shave a coal wagon, and then:

"Didn't I hear that you were engaged?"

"Why, why—oh," she faltered.

"Just another rumor, I suppose," he suggested kindly.

"Yes," she said, and glanced at him coyly, "I'm not engaged—yet; there are rumors, of course——"

"Of course," he answered gallantly, "but I'm glad that you're not engaged, because—well—because——"

"Because why?" laughed the girl.

"Oh—I'll tell you some day," he answered, while a million dollars' worth of pink rushed to her cheeks.

They had reached the park now and the heights of Avondale were before them. Around a bend they whizzed and she clutched the brown-overcoated arm.

"There's my—our—house,"—she pointed it out to him—"up there in the trees; just drive to the gate here, please, Mr. Rogers, and let me out there."

He didn't answer. He seemed lost in thought and she wondered if he had heard her—but he stopped at the gate.

"I thank you," she said simply, as he helped her from the car, "and some time we may meet again,—Mansfield!"

He smiled, and took her extended hand. It was soft and he squeezed it just a bit.

"Good by," she said.

"I'll never forget you—Peggy," he said.

She walked away and up the drive. Rogers threw his car into gear and shot away in a cloud of gasolene vapor. Around the curve he whirled and suddenly clamped on the brakes. Hastily he jumped from his car and ran back toward the gate, crouching behind a huge rock.

The girl, like a queen, stood on the great steps of the house and glanced back toward the road, then, deliberately, she walked to a side door and entered. It seemed as if the sun had gone down.

Rogers waited a moment. He counted ten and then ten more and then, jauntily, he came out from behind the rock and went through the gate and swung up the path. He mounted the steps confidently.

He touched the knob. It turned. He walked in. Cautiously he stood for a second and then bounded into the spacious library.

A vision in fluffy skirts, with jet black hair, and with a huge solitaire sparkling on the third finger of her left hand confronted him, and then, delightedly.

"Why, Mansfield! when did you come——"

"Just got in, Peggy, but say—when did you get that new kitchen mechanic?"

"Why don't those grand opera stars accumulate more money?"

"Their expenses are heavy."

"Eh?"

"I've seen one wearing a milkmaid's costume that must have cost two thousand bones."

Comfort's League of Cousins

prosperous stock-broker, and never fancied that I would turn out to be the Happiest Uncle at the head of the Biggest Family in the world. And I wouldn't be a-broker now for all the stocks and bonds in Wall Street. No; not if J. P. Morgan himself offered them to me on a platter of Sub Treasury bullion. So you see, Mary, sometimes the dreams we never dreamed are the ones that can come true and be the best of all.

Be sure to write us again, Mary, when you get your lariat and pony, and tell us if you met a body comin' through the cactus.

SOMEWHERE IN VIRGINIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA, BILLY AND EVERYBODY:

Hello! Will you let a Virginia reader into your Happy Family? There now, never mind, Billy has been kind enough to get up and give me his seat right next to Uncle Lisha. Wasn't he nice? As you have been so kind as to let me in, I am going to tell you where I live, 'way back up in the big, lovely cool mountains. Do I get lonesome? No; you're wrong there; not a bit of it. For the birds keep me company and then I have to work, as I raise chickens, lots of 'em—White Leghorns. There now, I have got off and am telling you about chickens when I should have been telling you about the mountains. I live near a summer resort, and you can stand on top of the mountain above our house and see seven other mountains without moving. And, my, Billy, I am anxious for you to come down and stay for a few weeks so we can fish for those wonderful mountain trout. My, but they're good. Um, um!

I would like to hear from doctor cousins, unmarried, between the ages of 18 and 80. I am leaving my address with Uncle Lisha.

I guess you are all wishing I would take off this sunbonnet and these miserable glasses so you could see who has been giving you so much nonsense. My, my; aren't you fooled. Goodness, Billy, what a face you are making! You see only a big, round, ugly face, topped with dark brown hair and blue eyes. Oh, I know what you are all laughing at—my big mouth. Isn't it large? Looks like a railroad tunnel, doesn't it, Bill? And what a nose! It's almost a broomstick. I know I've done wrong to take my bonnet off. Now I am going to let you guess how much I weigh, but please don't ask Uncle Lisha. He would say "a ton," as I have been sitting on his lap so long.

Now, Billy, if you do not eat this up, I'll send you a lovely bunch of my pansies, or a big piece of candy. Which do you wish? I mostly have more burns than candy, though.

So now I'll run back to Virginia and my mountain home and feed my chickens. By, by, everybody! With a kiss for Uncle Lisha and a special big hug for Billy, I leave you all. SUNSHINE AND SMILES.

You were as light on my knee as the wing-feathers of a veery, Cousin Sunshine, and I would have been glad to have had you sit there longer, you may be sure. I'm glad you find the birds such good company—not only the woodsy sort that St. Francis loved, but also the more domesticated variety that give us the raw material for omelets and "ham and." Leghorns may not sing so well as the wood thrushes of your "big, cool, lovely mountains," but they are mighty satisfying warblers so far as filling the egg-basket goes. I don't know what we would ever do for fried egg sandwiches if it were not for the noble Leghorn and the eight-hour days they are willing to put in turning out fried eggs. Fortunately, with all the present-day spirit of organization in labor circles, the hard-working hen has not yet gone on strike or demanded shorter nest hours and a higher corn scale. But I think this may happen any time, if a lively young Leghorn laborite should start about the country, making speeches in every henhouse and organizing Leghorn Locals.

I don't see why you consider those stationary mountains of yours so wonderful, Sunshine. Why I've seen lots more than seven peaks that stand "without moving." What I would really think remarkable would be a mountain that would come when it was called, or that you could push aside when it got in the way of a sunset.

Why this desire to hear only from doctor cousins, Sunshine? Your letter doesn't sound a bit ill and I, as a layman, should consider all your symptoms were most favorable. However, I hope there will be steen thousand of our young and handsome pills and sawbones who will send you prescriptions. I'll give them your address, S & S.

Oh, by the way, I must tell you that Billy does not like to be hugged—not that he's bashful about it, but he says he always gets hair in his mouth and once he got a hatpin in his right eye. He has been hug-shy ever since.

POPLAR BLUFF, R. R. 2, BOX 212, MO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

We have been taking COMFORT ever since I can remember, and I sure enjoy reading the letters from the cousins.

Uncle, I would like the words of a song:

"She went to a tailor shop and dressed up as a man,
And then unto the sea captain and asked to hire as a hand:
'Your arms they are too slender, your fingers are too small,
Your cheeks they are too rosy to face the cannon balls.'"

If any of the cousins will send me this song I will return the favor if possible.

I am a farm boy and like farm life fine. I have no use for the city. I am between the ages of 18 and 22 and will leave you to guess my age.

I would like to receive letters from any of the cousins and will try to answer as many as possible. Well, Uncle, please keep this letter from Billy as it is my first and I don't see many letters from Missouri.

With love to all,
Your nephew, MONROE R. DAVIS.

That's a remarkable and fetching song of which you send us one verse, Monroe. Like you, I would be glad to know the further adventures of this she-sailor and the tender-hearted captain who refused to accept such a fair addition to his crew. For fear that there may be a delay in your receiving more words of your sea-song, Monroe, I'm giving you a second verse myself, written with a last line that may, or may not, be approved by that talcum-teaser, Cousin Gus Trick of Muncy, Pa. Get your mouth-organ, for here goes:

Cried she, "Oh, Mr. Captain, I pray you change your mind!
My heart it will be broken, if I am left behind;
My arms you may think slender, but they are long and tough,
And if my cheeks are rosy, I'll buy a powder puff."

Now if some song-writing cousin will contribute a third verse, I'll furnish a rollicking chorus and you'll have a complete song, almost as good as new.

I agree with you, Monroe; the country is the stuff and I have no use for the city—but the darn city keeps hanging around and I don't know how to get rid of the blame thing. It is so noisy, too, and eats so much. If I could get it to turn its back for a minute and shut at least one of its six million pair of eyes, I believe I would just light out for good and leave the old city to look out for itself. Who knows?—I might land in Missouri, up among the Ozarks, with three peach trees in my front yard and a cunning little mule and a bright-eyed, bob-tailed Ford in the barn. How is the outlook for Uncles about Poplar Bluff, Monroe? If it's good, I might settle there instead of going further up in the hills.

CORNING, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Howdy, one and all! Will you let an Ohio breeze in for a little while? Sh, don't anyone sneeze and awaken Billy.

I'll begin by a description of myself, for I always read the descriptions before I read the rest of the letters. So here goes: I am five feet, four inches, in my stocking feet, gray eyes, auburn hair (not red, mind), and I will soon be seventeen. We have taken COMFORT in our family for over thirty years and I think it is a jim dandy.

I have just finished high school this spring. How many of the other cousins who graduated this spring are going to college? I hope every one, because it's a wonderful thing to have a college education. I intend to go this fall to the Ohio University. Many say: Of what use is a college education to a girl when she usually marries before she is through college? A college education is a good thing to have even if one is married. It is just as necessary for the girl who expects to get married as for the girl who expects to earn her own living for many years. To make good citizens we must be educated, and the better educated we are, the better citizens we make. There may come a time, too, when the girl who marries may be left alone and will have to earn her own living. Then her college education will surely help her out. I say for all who can possibly afford: Go to college, and while there have your good time, but work—for you will never have that part of your life over again. And to those who have their high school days yet to come, I say: Work; have a good time, but don't neglect your studies. When you are through your school days you will realize then, and not until then, what your school and classes really meant to you.

Uncle Lisha, let me thank you for what you said about flappers. There are many girls who are classed as flappers who have no idea what a flapper, a real flapper, is. Billy condemns the rouge many American girls use on their faces. So do I; but while I condemn the rouge, I do not forget the hair oil so many American boys use on their hair to make it look like patent leather. Some rave about the modern dances. I'll bet when our grandmothers first danced the waltz, their grandmothers shook their heads, and said: "My, my, what are the girls of today coming to! Now in my day——" etc. Talking just as most do at the present time.

When a farmer goes out into his orchard and notices a rotten apple lying on the ground, he does not go to his friends and neighbors and tell them that all his apples are rotten. He goes on and looks for better ones. Why can't we look for the good, sensible American girls? There are plenty of them—just as many and more, too, as ever was in this old world, only we never hear of them. One always hears of the bad before one hears the good.

I thought I saw Billy's ears move, so I think I'll take my departure. I would like to hear from all cousins between the ages of 16 and 25 who care to write. I'll try to answer as many as possible.

Your niece, MARY WEAVER.

Of course, there are a lot of good, sensible American girls, Mary; and when I read your letter through, I said to myself: "Here's one of 'em!"

Not everyone—either boy or girl—makes good use of a college course, as you know. What is carried out of a university gate is largely governed by what was taken in. Today our universities, with the benefits of years and endowments, are able to offer remarkable and diversified opportunities to ambitious students. To the don't care and good-time-seeking matriculator there are just as many, or more, chances for anything but profit in the manifold college activities—the manifoldness of which are an evil of latter-day university life and a product of the age and size of our big institutions—too largely populated and organized. Just how many of the new opportunities, and which ones, will be grasped and made use of, depends wholly upon the student and the brain, character and ambition brought with him through the university portal. If he or she comes to college, accustomed and ready to work, knowing the value of the education to be gained and that it can only be best acquired in the few young and malleable years, then can be taken into life at the end of the course something of lifetime worth and more than four years of a leisured "good time" and tastes for luxury and amusements that neither brains nor hands are able to gratify once outside of college days into the hard outside world.

You should gain much from your coming college course, Mary, because you have not dropped "work" from your vocabulary, or are ready to let it be blotted out by the words "good time." Specked apples will almost always rot (to use your simile), and rotten ones are useless and wasted; but the clean red-cheeked fruit is always ready and marketable, as it deserves. Yes; there are loads of first-grade fruit on well-loaded boughs of American girl orchards, Mary,—for eyes that are not focussed to only see the spoilt or spoiling specimens.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for October

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Mrs. Dan Pierson, Clifton, Ohio. Bedridden for five years with paralysis, this shut-in asks for postcards and other reading matter. Give her this shower of cheer and cure for loneliness. Mrs. Virgie Mills, Tomahawk, Ky. With a husband unable to work, this poor woman asks that second-hand clothing or money be sent her. Mrs. Tessie Martin, Stella, Va. This mother has six girls, the oldest being only ten years of age. She asks for second-hand clothing to aid the struggle in her burdened home. Catherine Fraisure, Lulu, R. R., 2, Box 31, Fla. This poor shut-in is a woman of 71 who has not walked for the past five years. She asks for second-hand clothing or any other aid. Minnie D. Freeman, Peebles, Box 223, Ohio. A crippled woman who has been a shut-in for forty-nine years. Well recommended. Give her a shower of dimes and cheer. Mrs. A. Terhunen, Palmer, Box 55, Mich. This mother of a large family is crippled and unable to work. Asks for second-hand clothing and financial aid. J. A. Mills, Wampee, R. R. 1, Box 25, S. C. Helpless from tuberculosis of the spine, this poor sufferer has a mother of seventy as his only care and support. Help this worthy case.

What of a harvest time that always means only a gathering of dark hours and of pain? Think of being shut in this and every autumn from the changing leaves and bright frosty mornings! Any help given can be but a lightening of heavy burdens that these shut-in sufferers must bear, not today and tomorrow, but season after season. From whatever your harvest of cheer or cash may be this fall, give to these whose names are listed and who are unable to even come to glean for themselves.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C." a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Horse-Power Energy of Falling Water and Hydro-Electric Development

Two cubic feet of water, which weigh 125 pounds, by falling six feet per second, produce one horse-power of energy. Falling water in early days was used to turn water-wheels to operate chiefly flour mills. Now the falling water is guided by concrete penstocks to turbines, which whirl electric generators, and the horse-power thus developed in electric current is transmitted hundreds of miles over copper wires to cities and towns to operate manufacturing plants and street railways and to furnish light and heat. These are known as hydro-electric plants. It was the introduction of the turbine water-wheel about 1835 that started the utilization of the flow of streams for mechanical purposes. But not until the alternating current system for the transmission of electrical energy was introduced in the early nineties, and the discovery of electrical transmission of power over long distances, did the development of water power become one of the great factors in industrial life.

In the recent Super-Power Report submitted to President Harding by Secretary of the Interior Fall, the North Atlantic coast region was thoroughly covered, because of the enormous industrial activity in this district extending from the coast approximately 150 miles inland and embracing parts of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland and all of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island and New Jersey. This area is two per cent. of the nation, contains 22 per cent. of the population of the United States, and supports 96,000 industrial plants, 315 electric utilities, and 18 steam railroads. The total coal saved annually through hydro-electric power under conditions reasonably expected to develop by 1930 will be 50,000,000 tons.

Make Your Own Wireless Telephone

WIRELESS telephone receiving sets are comparatively easy to make. The man or boy with any mechanical ability whatever should be able to construct his own receiving apparatus by following the instructions in this book. The different parts that go to make up Radio receivers may now be purchased in almost any hardware or general store. Many of the parts can be made at home. Forty-Mile Trap-Line

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN Tubs left Lon to set a trap-line around the mountain, he did so feeling highly elated that his trapping partner should place so much confidence in his ability thus early in the season. He proceeded several hundred yards, dividing his attention between watching for set locations and wishing some opportunity would come along whereby he might demonstrate his skill as a woodsman, and prowess with the gun.

A quarter of a mile from the starting place, Tubs reached a point of a ridge dividing two ravines. Here was a conglomeration of fallen trees—a windfall—and a sentinel snag was visible at a distance. "That's just the kind of place Lon said to prospect for sets," mused Tubs to himself, aloud, thus having readily acquired the trapper's habit. He bore off toward the point and inspected the snag which, as the trapper had surmised, was hollow to its top. The cyclone that had struck the point years before had broken the tree off and the stump had rotted out in the center. Tubs took his belt axe and soon had a hole through, and after rounding it up placed the venison bait in the back of the hole and set a trap in the entrance. While making this set he was pleased to find abundant fur signs around the windfall and in the way of claw marks on the logs, tracks in rotten wood dust and bunches of fur that had caught on projections of bark. He was not sure about the animals that made these signs, but later when the place was described to Lon, he was assured that nothing but the valuable marten could have made them.

Several hundreds yards farther Tubs made a cubby pen set on the bank of a small mountain brook where raccoon tracks were numerous. The location also seemed like a general crossing place for fisher and other fur bearers, so Tubs placed a lot of confidence in this set and spent considerable pains to place the trap without disturbing the surroundings.

The deer-head drag was now seemingly getting heavier all the time, and Tubs often glanced back as if he expected to find it caught fast to a small log. So when the trapper came to a patch of the finest blueberries he had seen, it was the most natural thing in the world to stop and start feeding his face, using both hands to pick the luscious fruit. For once he forgot about being in the woods and on the alert for a chance to prove himself a Nimrod. He was making a most systematic clean-up of the berry patch, with the juice smeared from ear to ear and his rifle stood up against a tree several yards back. In fact, he had actually eaten a clear trail a couple of yards wide through the bushes, and only when reaching the scattered bushes on the outer edge of the patch did he stop, blink his eyes hard and then drop a handful of berries he had spent five minutes in collecting; simply because he discovered another berry picker not twenty-five feet away in the thick bushes. When Tubs suddenly halted, a loud "woof" issued from the bushes and a huge black bear reared up on its hind feet, head and massive forepaws in plain sight. While Tubs did not know it, the wind had been blowing from the bear in his direction, and the animal had been so intent on eating, it was hard to tell which was the more surprised when each discovered the other.

Tubs gasped and great beads of sweat popped out on his forehead and perhaps it was weakness more than bravery that caused him to hold his ground. The bear began to growl and smack his chops menacingly. Tubs by a great mental effort recalled that his gun was standing against a tree about forty feet away. Now that seconds might mean the difference between life and death, he could not for his life remember whether there was a cartridge in the barrel or not.

Without calculating on how many jumps it would take to carry him to the gun, and trying to calm his nerves so he could work the lever smoothly without danger of "jamming" a cartridge, the delay had got on the bear's nerves, evidently. Tubs noted with extreme satisfaction that she began to turn her head from side to side, uneasy like; and soon the trapper and the bear were backing away from each other cautious enough until Tubs stumbled over a log and fell crashing through the bushes.

This fall gave the bear a fright and she proceeded to put miles between her bearship and the now thoroughly frightened Tubs. The young trapper could almost feel the bear's claws and teeth when he fell into the bushes, and was positive he heard the fierce animal growl with rage and come tearing toward him. With wild motions he floundered toward his gun, part of the time on hands and knees, as he would stumble over a stone or ride down a small bush, never stopping to look back. Time was too precious! Finally he grabbed the gun, worked the lever and threw the only cartridge in it out onto the ground. Then he drew up and aimed hastily at a fast-disappearing and panic-stricken bear, perhaps now two hundred yards away. Of course, the gun snapped on an empty chamber, and soon Tubs discovered his error and filled the magazine with cartridges; then collecting his senses, he realized that his big opportunity to prove himself to his Pard had come and was gone.

Now it was that Tubs made the record run of his young life, a run which made his school days' cross-country sprintings look like child's play. Tubs didn't know bears, and that one genuinely scared will run forty miles without halting. But luck was with the trapper. The bear had at once taken to a large swamp or bog, and Tubs, thinking she would go right through, circled around to station himself on a hillside overlooking a sort of valley a hundred yards across. He knew enough to take to the side where the wind would favor him. Tubs had exercised considerable presence of mind and utilized his hearsay knowledge of bear hunting methods, by aiming for such a strategic point. He had not waited long before the bear came out of the swamp, and flitted across a narrow opening, headed straight toward him.

Fortunately Tubs had cut across to the right spot, perhaps accidentally, and the bear had followed its custom by circling around in the bog to confuse anything that might be on its trail. Now it was evidently making tracks for another state.

Tubs waited, gun cocked and nerves surprisingly quiet. It was now getting dusk and he felt some concern about the light being bright enough to outline the gun-sights. Suddenly the bear appeared right before him, and turned diagonally across an open space, affording a shot at thirty yards. Then Tubs proceeded to empty his gun, taking calm and deliberate aim with the last cartridge just as the bear disappeared into some bushes. Tubs knew at least one of the former shots had hit the bear, having noticed it flinch, but he could not tell what effect the last shot may have had. Nor did he feel inclined to go investigating into the bushes where the wounded bear was last seen.

Tubs reloaded his gun and sat down to await his partner, who he knew would come on hearing the shots. He had not waited long before hearing a whistle on the opposite hillside, and Lon came running up, out of breath and demanding the reason for the shooting. In a few minutes Tubs had related all the details of the bear incident, and Lon agreed that the bear must have been hit, and proposed they camp on the spot and take up the trail at daylight the next morning. They sat quiet for some time and, not hearing any noise such as a wounded bear would make, decided the bear had either been killed or wandered on out of hearing.

Before it was really dark, Lon had constructed a lean-to and floored it with balsam boughs. Now the boys built a fire in front of the camp and fastened a couple of pieces of venison on spits near the fire to broil. They enjoyed a hearty repast of fresh meat and lay for some time on the comfortable bough bed listening to the barking of foxes on distant hills and the cry of loons in a nearby lake. Soon they dropped off to sleep.

The next morning the first thing the boys did was to inspect the bear trail. Tubs was the first to find the bear lying "dead as a door nail" only about twenty feet into the bushes. The bullet had struck just back of the shoulder and ranged forward, shattering the bones of the opposite shoulder.

"The best kind of shot," exclaimed Lon, adding, "I couldn't have done better myself. My! His coat is thick for this season of the year. It will sure come in handy for making a warm robe to sleep on."

It was all the boys could do to turn over the carcass to skin it out, and the hide made a good back-load for Lon; while Tubs struggled under the weight of some of the best portions of the meat which would compare favorably with the venison for eating purposes. That night the meat froze and for the next week the boys enjoyed excellent roasts of bear meat.

"We just have time enough to set a line of traps near camp this afternoon," Lon said, pushing back from the camp table at noon, after their hard trip bringing the trophies of the bear killing. "Back of camp is a balsam swamp. Suppose you set about a dozen rabbit snares, using that spool of brass wire in my kit. We'll need a lot of bait in setting out our trap-lines and rabbit is hard to beat for fisher and lynx, if any of the latter animals are in these woods. Better take your little .22 pill-slinger along; you'll have the chance to shoot several rabbits and maybe some partridges. Birds will go well for a change from bear meat and venison. One thing sure, we'll have a variety of fresh meat in camp all the time. Now while you do this, I'm going to run a little mink line down the stream; I'll set the traps blind, mostly, in trails and burrows."

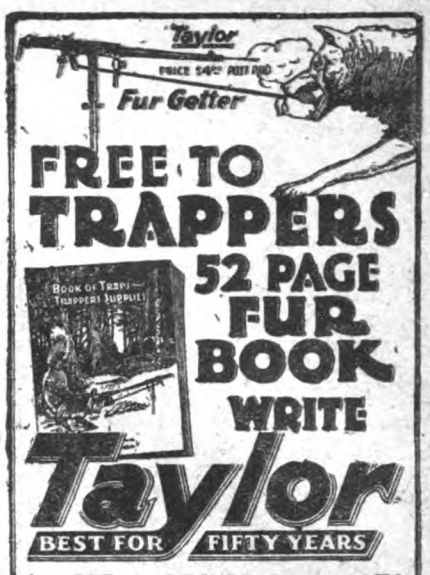
As instructed, Tubs prepared to build snares the rest of the day, and John followed his schedule of establishing the first mink line. Most country boys are familiar with this small, dark-furred and sly fur bearer which is so eagerly sought after by the trapper because of the fine quality of the fur. They range along the banks of streams and lakes and are most numerous in spring-watered localities. Their food consists of frogs, crawfish, trout, birds, rabbits, squirrels and other rodents. Muskrat meat is a good bait for them, but it is doubtful whether the mink makes a habit of attacking full-grown rats. A large muskrat will weigh more than a mink, and put up a fair fight.

The mink were now following the edge of the water, wading up the middle of tiny rivulets, and shallow springs, perhaps looking for crawfish or frogs. They dived into every hole on their route and seemingly went out of their way to take in stone piles, drift debris and old muskrat burrows. All these places Lon noted on his ramble down the stream with a pack of traps, and the load was lightened at frequent intervals. The traps were usually set in the edge of the water, so there would be no human scent to warn the keen-nosed animal. When setting on dry land, Lon kept his buckskin gloves on and stepped on stones or logs. Sometimes he even went to the pains to lay bark down to stand on, and removed it after the set was made. The traps were stiff No. 1's for the open sets and No. 1½ under-springs for the burrows and other sets in narrow places. Lon placed traps on all the narrow shelves along the banks, and in other places where he knew mink would invariably go each trip. Every trapper knows the mink covers the same route about once a week and follows it as closely as a woodsman sticks to his trail. This is a trait worth knowing. It takes the speculating out of mink trapping.

Like most successful trappers, Lon was quiet while in the woods, and he was often rewarded by seeing animals in their natural haunts, thereby learning much about their habits. This trip, he had been making out of dead sticks a cubby pen against a tree standing within a few feet of the stream. For a hundred yards or more he had followed mink and 'coon tracks, without finding a desirable place for a set. Now the tracks led to a rock bluff which came perpendicularly down to the water's edge. The water was too deep for a set, even next to the bank, and as fur bearers might either take to the water or walk into the woods around the bluff at this point, Lon knew this was just the place he should guard with a cubby pen set. Later he would bait the pen with fresh fish, which would make the set attractive to mink, raccoon, fisher, marten or lynx. Now as he had no fish, he placed a small piece of venison in the back of the pen, covering it over with leaves so as not to attract the bluejays and other pests. Fur bearers locate bait mostly by smell and a small piece of fresh meat would induce the first passing mink to investigate.

The trapper had just stepped back to view the set with satisfaction when a movement on the point of a ridge a hundred feet away caught his eye. Instinctively he grabbed his gun and was just in time to get a hasty bead on a red fox which was leisurely trotting down to the stream, perhaps to take a drink of water. At the crack of the gun, Lon saw the fox tumble over, and he mentally reckoned that the pelt would be as good as ten dollars and the gun had the credit of the first fur of the season.

At this moment a rustle in the tree by the cubby pen attracted attention and Lon backed away and sat down to await developments. Soon a bright-eyed marten came in sight and finally spiraled down the trunk to the cubby. Out of curiosity, Lon sat quiet, gun in readiness in case the animal should run; but, as the trapper anticipated, the little marten saw the newly-made pen, smelled the venison and could not resist the temptation to investigate. There was a snap and the trap proved only a little ways behind the gun in fur getting. Lon mercifully dispatched the marten with a club and reset the trap; then he went over and picked up the fox. It was prime and fairly dark for the season. Lon skinned the fox and hung the carcass up to the lower branches of a balsam to attract fisher and such animals. With this rare good luck, the afternoon soon passed by and the last trap was set in time for the trapper to reach camp before dark.



Tubs was frying venison steak when Lon came in and threw down two valuable pelts thus early in the season.

"How's this for trapping? A bear skin, one fox and one marten in one day. Why, I never heard of such good luck before. Tomorrow we set the big line, the first lap of the big circle. It'll be a three days' trip to go over, requiring two over-night camps. We'll take in Seward Mountain, Twin Lakes, Wolf Pond and a half-dozen big balsam swamps. You can work one end, and I'll take the other, or we'll both go together, or maybe run separate lines. Anyway, that's a forty-mile line, and the way fur signs look to me, and if our luck holds out, we're going to make some catches, old boy!" all to which Tubs listened with full confidence in his partner's predictions. But he little dreamed of the adventures in store for him on the Forty-Mile trap-line.

Protect the Muskrat

UP until a few years ago there was a general prejudice against muskrats among farmers whose bottom lands they inhabited. The farmer's chief complaint was that they burrowed under his fields and occasionally nibbled his crop, thus causing him losses.

And seldom stopping to consider that the muskrat pelts would more than pay for the trifling annoyance the animals caused, the farmers often set about to exterminate them.

For every case where it is shown that the muskrat attacked crops on lands near marshes, there is another which shows that he left crops entirely alone, even though they were near at hand.

It has taken the American farmer a number of years to realize just what a money-making asset the possession of muskrat marshes on his lands is to him. Time was when he either ignored muskrats (save for the sport of catching them) or actually drove them out while subject to the belief that they were pests.

Now the more astute American farmer looks on the presence of muskrats in his bottom lands just as he regards the cornfields of the higher slopes—as a crop.

He encourages them to breed, protects them during the mating season, traps them only when the law permits and makes every effort to promote their growth as a crop—not for any purely humanitarian motive, but because muskrat farming pays—and pays well.

It is no unusual thing for a farmer to trap 50 muskrats in an acre or two of useless marshlands.

To the man in the country who, up to this time, has been indifferent to the muskrat's existence, the animal's new status should be of interest, especially since fashion has taken up the "rat" and the market for his pelt is broader than ever.

But as a final word of caution—don't trap out of season—don't violate game laws—regard the muskrat as a crop that should be guarded and protected, and it will return you big profits.

The "Why" of Fur Conservation

In the struggle for existence, only the fit survive, and man has proved himself the fittest of animals. If man sets out to exterminate a certain animal, the chances are against the animal, as witness the extinction of the great auk and the American bison.

But man is wise enough to protect those animals that are of real value to him. This is the reason for livestock on the farm. Now fur-bearers are one form of livestock, but are distinct from other farm animals because they are wild and confined to no boundaries.

Why conserve the fur crop? First, because it is extremely valuable to the man or boy of the country. Second, because conservation increases its value by increasing the number of animals and the harvest. Third, because lack of conservation means an actual loss to the very man who wants to make the most money out of trapping.

Game laws are more for your protection than for the protection of the animals, because by protecting the animals during certain periods they protect your own wealth and help put more money in your pocket at trapping time. But game laws are not an absolute insurance of conservation. Because of their general nature, adapted to several districts at one time, they often permit trapping during the breeding season—the time when trapping is most detrimental.

The trapper should be his own legislator. By using a little business sense you will see that to harm the fur supply is like throwing away money that actually belongs to you. One female pelt taken during the breeding perid may mean six good pelts lost forever. There is everything to say in favor of conservation and nothing against it from the trapper's standpoint. The fur supply is a natural resource that can be developed to much greater proportions and hence become a source of bigger income for you.

tine sulphate spray mentioned above for plant lice and leaf hoppers.

Observe the following cautions in using poison baits of any sort: 1. Measure amounts carefully; do not guess. 2. Mix ingredients carefully as directed. 3. Scatter bran mash broadcast; do not place in piles. 4. For best results scatter in early morning or late evening. 5. Wash barrels or buckets immediately after using—(the calf may lick them clean if you don't). 6. Keep poison in any form out of the reach of young children, for they cannot be expected to respect a poison label. 7. Do not scatter poisoned grain where it will be found and eaten by chickens or wild birds. The latter are helping control the "bugs" free of charge, and richly deserve protection.

Home Tanning Mole and Squirrel

Tanning pelts at home is really a comparatively simple matter for anyone who is willing to follow exactly a few simple rules in skinning and handling, and who will regard care as essential to success. Unless this is fully understood at the start, both the furs and time will be wasted.

Home tanning naturally falls under the following heads: (1) Skinning; (2) Stretching; (3) Scraping; (4) Salting; (5) Washing, and (6) Oiling. With only slight differences, which we will try to point out as we go on, the suggestions given below will apply not only to moles and squirrels but to any other small animals.

To skin small animals, only a single cut is needed, and that is made with a sharp knife along the inside of the hind legs up to and passing under the root of the tail. The tail bone is then pulled out and the skin is gradually drawn back over the body, for all the world like taking off a sock. To prevent tearing circle the eyes, ears, nostrils and mouth with the point of the knife before the skin is drawn over the head. The skin will now be turned inside or flesh-side out; leave it thus. Skins removed in this manner are known as "cased" skins, as contrasted with "open" skins, or those which are split up the belly and spread flat to cure. For home use either manner of skinning may be employed as a matter of personal preference.

Stretching and drying is done by placing cased skins on a stretching board which fits inside and keeps them stretched smooth. These boards are usually made out of pieces of shingle for the smaller animals; they are about eight inches long and two inches wide for moles, and for squirrels about 12 inches by three. The sides taper somewhat and the head end is rounded. For those who have never seen a stretching board, its shape may be compared to that or a tiny ironing board familiar to everybody. When skins have been placed on stretching boards, hang them up in a moderately warm place where there is a free circulation of air.

Scraping is seldom necessary with a mole skin, nor are they thick or tough enough to stand much scraping. Squirrel skins should have the excess fat removed, for which purpose an old blunt knife is the best tool. Here is one place where slow and careful work is necessary, for rough handling and deep and careless scraping will tear the skin or pull the fur "through by the roots."

Salting is done in either of two ways: Usually a mixture of equal parts of saltpeter and alum is rubbed into the slightly oily skin, using all that will be taken up or will adhere because of the moisture present. The other is to apply with a small brush all of a saturated saltpeter-alum solution that will be taken up; this is more frequently used for hides that are dried out. Either will do the work. Leave for several days until the mixture has thoroughly worked into the skin.

Wash skins in rain water to remove all salt and alum. Do not be afraid to use plenty of "elbow grease," but rub and squeeze and rinse just like you would do with dirty clothes. Dry slowly in a cool, shady place to prevent shrinking, hardening and cracking.

Oiling is usually done by repeatedly painting the flesh side of the skin, and continuing until no more oil will be taken up, rubbing in thoroughly after each application. Neat's-foot oil serves best for this purpose, but castor oil may be used with good results. For applying, use a small paint-brush with stiff bristles or an old tooth-brush. Mole skins will need but little oil; squirrel skins considerable. Knead and stretch to make skins pliable. Keep oil off fur side. Remove excess oil by covering skin with bran, allowing it to soak up oil, then repeating until no more oil is taken up.

Questions and Answers

SHRUBS FOR THE LAWN.—Will you please tell me what shrubs I should plant for ornamental purposes in my yard; ones that will grow in this part of the country. I have been told that it is against the law to plant the barberry. Is this true? Are evergreens hard to grow? MRS. J. V., Michigan.

A.—The varieties of shrubs from which you can safely choose for beautifying your yard are very large in the part of Michigan where you live. Perhaps the best possible way for you to choose those that will always be a pleasure for you to look at is to go to some park in one of your larger cities, Grand Rapids, for instance. There you will find shrubs of all kinds and descriptions. Perhaps they will bear small tags or wooden markers telling their names. If not, you can usually learn same from the gardener in charge. If you are a bird lover it is well to keep in mind the fact that many shrubs not only bloom beautifully in the spring but bear berries in the fall which are a veritable "hoard of plenty" for innumerable song-birds. Nor are these same birds so likely to make inroads on the cherries or currants or grapes if other berries are provided. The Japanese honeysuckle is one of the best of these; weeping mulberry, which is really a small tree, is another. As to the barberry, you can plant the Japanese or "single berry" variety if you desire; the common or native barberry is prohibited by law, as it harbors one stage of wheat rust. Evergreens are not difficult to grow if you choose those that are suited to your locality. The main thing is to get them started. One mistake that is commonly made is to expose the roots to the air and sunlight while they are being planted, and to fail to saturate the roots and the surrounding ground thoroughly during and after planting. If planting is done quickly and according to these directions, seeing that the soil is tamped securely afterwards, they should grow nicely. They are, however, almost impossible to grow in the grimy, smoke-laden air of our larger industrial cities, but as you live in the country you should succeed.

DESTROYING GOPHERS.—Please tell me how to exterminate pocket gophers. I have tried trapping them but with little success. I have heard that there is a liquid used for this purpose by putting on cotton and inserting it in the gophers' holes.

M. G., Brainerd, Miss.

A.—The liquid is bisulphid of carbon which is used to saturate cotton batting to be inserted deeply in the holes. The holes must then be stopped to hold in the gas. Bisulphid of carbon is very inflammable, so handle it where there is no open light or fire. If you could devise a plan of conducting the fumes from an automobile exhaust into the gopher burrows that would poison them as it does woodchucks.

HOLSTEIN OR FRIESIAN.—I keep Holstein cows and know that their right name is Holstein-Friesian. Is it right to call them Friesians as some folks do, or is this another breed of cows? A. B. W. Vermont.

A.—In the United States the correct name for the breed commonly referred to as Holstein is Holstein-Friesian. In Great Britain the same breed, or at any rate cows descended from the same stock in Holland, are called "Friesians," and the British herd book of the breed is known as the Friesian herd book. There seems to be some reason to favor the British name, as the breed was originated in the portion of Netherlands called Friesia. Holstein, in northwest Germany, does not rank with the former as a cow-producing country, nor did it play an important part in the origin of this great breed.

The Piano on the Farm

IN the cities, where there are chances to hear music daily, the piano is considered necessary in every home where it can possibly be afforded. If the piano is so important in the cities, it should be even more important on the farms, where life is apt to be monotonous. The farm people, old and young, usually appreciate music; and the old folks, especially, like to hear played their favorite songs that they learned in the long ago. The young folks like to hear the new hits, and want to try them out on their own instruments. They want to learn to play the piano, as is the fashion in the cities, and there is nothing wrong in the desire, for the farm folks work hard and deserve everything that can make them pleased and happy.

There is hardly anything between work and play that gives so much pleasure as music. The boys delight in baseball, but like music, too, and the girls simply must have it in one form or another. The piano is now no doubt the most popular musical instrument, having almost entirely replaced the reed organ which was once very much in style. The phonograph is also a popular musical instrument, and a very good one, but the piano gives the young a chance to study music and develop their musical talents. Everybody is proud of his own achievements, and as soon as the young student has learned to play a few songs, he finds the study easier and more interesting. I know girls who, after learning several songs, keep on playing and practicing entire evenings, and no one can deny that they derive pleasure from the exercises.

Often the old folks feel like singing, too, and if there is a piano in the house, one of the daughters can then sit down at the instrument and play the tunes, sacred or otherwise, thus making singing easier, and leading the faltering voices on through hours of sweet enjoyment. In many farm homes nowadays the wife is a good musician herself, and then she can do the playing, and can also teach the children. Moreover, she can make some extra money by giving music lessons to those in the neighborhood who are desiring a teacher.

Learning to play the piano is not so difficult as some may think. Of course, a few lessons from one who knows how are necessary to give the student a start, but after that he can proceed for himself by practicing when he has the time. Practice does the most. I am acquainted with a young violinist who has already won laurels for his art, and he says that the trouble with most musicians is that they do not practice enough. He often plays his violin a while in the morning before he gets out of bed. Lessons can be taken from a teacher in town or from a friend in the neighborhood. Now when almost every farmer has a car, getting to town at least several times a week is not difficult, and only half an hour or an hour is necessary for each lesson. I know farm girls who have learned to play the piano well after taking only ten lessons. They can play all the new hits, and are very popular wherever there are listeners and a piano. As sheet music is cheap, anybody can afford to get the best pieces.

The piano will provide good entertainment when there is company in the home, or when there is a house party. It can also furnish the music for the lady's sewing society, the young people's society and the Sunday school class, which so often meet in the homes on the farms. And every girl likes to entertain, with music on the piano, the admiring youth who comes to see her.

The Start of Spiritualism

It was in 1848 that Hydeville, a small town in Wayne County, New York, sent out the startling message that one of its respected residents, J. D. Fox, as well as his wife and daughters Kate and Margaret had established communication with the world beyond this life by means of raps, table tipping and similar manifestations.

The tale of the solution of a murder mystery through the instrumentality of spirits conjured up by the Fox family became a topic of excited discussion in an apparently small circle immediately after the story had been told for the first time.

But spiritualism as a cult did not gain a foothold until the two Fox sisters moved to Rochester and the intense agitation over their performances spread the movement all over the world in a few years.

Of course, years before "animism" and "animal magic" the outgrowth of the teachings of Mesmer, had gained considerable ground, but it was due to the Fox sisters' assertion that anyone could talk to the spirits if only certain rules were observed, that the propaganda met with its phenomenal success.

Good Bye Gray Hair!

Science Shows How Any Man or Woman Can Now Quickly Restore Hair to Its Own, Original Color

GRAY hair is simply hair without color! Science has discovered that if a certain natural process in the root were not affected by worry or by advancing age, the hair would never become gray, but retain its natural color throughout life.

A remarkable new discovery now makes it possible for the original color of the hair to be restored quickly and easily through a simple, natural process. Hair acquires its color (blond, black, brown, auburn, etc.) from the presence of coloring matter of pigment in tiny cells found at the root of the hair. This coloring matter is given off at the tip of the papilla, enters the root, and is dissolved in tiny corpuscles in the middle layer of the hair. The process is known as pigmentation. (See diagram).

How Hair Loses Its Color

As long as the process of pigmentation continues, the hair remains black or brown or whatever the original color happened to be. But as soon as this process is affected by advancing age, or by shock, worry, or illness, the pigment supply lessens or fails—and no coloring is sent up into the hair.

The result is that the hair becomes streaked with gray. This gray does not indicate a change in color. It indicates an absence of color. The hair has simply blanched.

How New Discovery Restores Natural Color

Tru-Tone, the marvelous new scientific discovery, quickly restores the true, original color to gray hair—to hair that has blanched. It is not an ordinary dye, or stain, or tint. It is pleasant to use—none of the muss and trouble of ordinary color restorers.

It makes no difference whether your hair was black, brown, blond or auburn—Tru-Tone works equally well, making your hair appear the same as it was before it had even a trace of gray in it. It makes no difference how gray your hair is—Tru-Tone will restore it and no one need know you are banishing your gray hair if you don't want them to.

Wonderful for Thin, Falling Hair

It was only after extensive research and experiment that Tru-Tone was discovered. It is just a clear, pure liquid—almost colorless. It contains tonic properties that stimulate the natural growth of the hair. Tru-Tone, therefore, not only restores the natural color to your hair but makes it thick, glossy and beautiful at the same time. You can use it with absolute confidence, knowing that it cannot possibly discolor the hair or harm it in any way.

Why Gray Hair Is Simply Hair Without Color

The hair shaft (A) springs from a tube-like-depression in the scalp called a follicle (E). The bulb (F) rests on a tiny tip of tissue called the papilla (H). The color of the hair is due to a pigment given off at the tip of this papilla. When sickness, worry or shock interferes with this pigment supply the hair blanches. To restore it to its natural color the pigment supply must be restored through a natural process. In the diagram B is the root, C the oil gland, D the root sheath, and G the fat cells. Study the diagram and you will see for yourself why gray hair is simply hair without color.
